New Thoughts on the old Year.

THIS Season was particularly devoted by our ancestors to all kinds of festal proceedings; but we, in this age of progressive improvement, are not contented with such proceedings only once in a year; but during the course of every revolving Moon, are in a perpetual pursuit of pleasure, from January to December. It is from this strong impulse to spend every month in the year, as well as the last, in frolic and festivity, that we find so many persons, at the end of an old year, in no situation to begin a new one with their accustomed spirit. Few men, indeed, in this age of unlimited dissipation, give themselves time to look into the state of their affairs. It is no wonder, therefore, that they gradually run into confusion; and many, dreading an inspection into their finances, are at length thrown into embarrassments from which they cannot disentangle themselves.—The number of persons whom we see degraded in the Gazette is not at all to be wondered at; but it is matter of some astonishment that the catalogue of them is not increased, as the majority of mankind live far beyond their circumstances, and take unwarrantable liberties with the property of other people, to supply their own unnecessary expences. No man, with any pretensions to Taste (that equivocal word by which thousands are deluded, and thousands undone) can now exist without a large, well-furnished house, a genteel table, to which every body, with very little distinction as to character, is admitted; smart liveries, spare beds, and a handful of guineas always at command for Card-tables, Play-houses, Balls, &c. not forgetting the great sine qua non, a Carriage for the conveyance of his body (his mind is quite out of the question) to the above-mentioned places of variegated entertainment.

With regard to a carriage, many people deem it indispensibly requisite for the support of their consequence in the polite world. Mrs. Tape, the wife of a (not very eminent) haberdasher of small wares, talked her husband into this way of thinking about a month ago, by telling him, that she “could not possibly do any longer without a carriage, as every body was come, or coming to town.”

While I was walking soberly on, a few days ago, in my furlout, being apprehensive of a shower when I set out, I was somewhat surprised at being saluted from a smart chariot, by a smart young fellow, bien poudré, who, pulling the check-string, asked me, if he should give me an airing in the Park? I started and looked up to January, 1777.

see from whom I was addressed to me.

Tape himself) in spite of I keep up the fine Gentleman, which he had too hastily assumed at my discovering him in a which neither Nature, Education, nor Fortune had qualified him to shine. I had certainly reason to be ashamed of my situation; and I could not help thinking my own mind, that he was driving to destruction. However, I accepted of his polite offer, though I believe at the same time, that it originated from vanity, more than from good-nature. I accepted of it, merely because I wished to be acquainted with Tom's motives for a procedure which had the strongest appearance of indifference. On my seating myself by his side, I began by telling him, I was glad to see him in a condition which would justify his setting up a carriage; adding, I hoped that he had not been too precipitate (as young tradesmen were sometimes in too great a hurry to appear in such a stile of life), and that he had a good bottom to build upon. “To be sure (replied he, rubbing his eyes, and throwing his eyes about with a satisfied air) I have taken care of that, and it is worth a thousand pounds! I have taken the two last words in a new sense, that one would have been possessed of a Plumage worth a thousand pounds, sir, will amply suffice, to set up a carriage.”

“I have,” he subtly (said I); but a thousand pounds enable you to do more. The first expence is considerable, but is trifling when you reflect on the larger demand which will be made upon your pocket for the support of it, with all the taxes annexed—hay, corn, oats, servants, &c.”

“True, Sir (answered he, looking down as if he was somewhat at a loss, and as if he really had not considered till that moment, that his cattle and his coachman would be in the least expensive to him. At last, raising his eyes, as if just recovered from a profound reverie, he added) Why, as you say, these here things are expensive, but you know we cannot have every thing about us handsome without money; and you must know, that as my ticket came up a Thousand Pound Prize in this Lottery, my wife would not let me alone till I rid in my chariot; as she said, and sensibly enough too, that what signified people's having money, if they did not make the most of it.”

Here I could no longer keep any gravity, in my countenance. I therefore told Tom, laughing, “That I was afraid he

 I shall improve it; but then, one has one's penny-worth for you know, sir, (continued he, with a supercilious smile) can ride in two carriages at once, tho' he may ride upon three horses at the same time."

"Why no (answered I), we are not yet arrived to such a pitch of ingenuity;
 but there is no saying how soon we may in this age, remarkably distinguished for its character out of the common road. I am of opinion, therefore, that the man who cannot be contented without a carriage, stands a very poor chance for happiness, especially with one, as so many people keep four or five, and are yet at a considerable distance from a state of felicity."

"You are in the right, I believe (replied he, rubbing his hands); but if I am obliged to lay my carriage down, I shall only be where I was, as you know."

"That is not quite so (said I);
 you may, possibly, be where you never was before in your carriage."

 fairs, by his success in the Lottery! And, indeed, repeated experience sufficiently convinces us, that the man who appears to be a very fortunate being, is often in a fair way to be one of the most unlucky fellows in the creation.

The Storm. A moral Tale.

MR. Fletcher, a gentleman possessed of a considerable estate in the North, was not more respected on account of his opulence, and the magnificent style in which he lived, than esteemed for his benevolent disposition, and beloved for his hospitality. Yet neither his riches nor his virtues could exempt him from disappointment and affliction: he was severely disappointed, and severely afflicted by losing, at different periods of his life, five sons, who all promised to be every thing a father could desire them to be, and of three blooming daughters, only one of them survived, the amiable Julia, who, with a form perfectly pleasing, had also a well improved mind, and the delicacy of her manners was enchanting: generous and good, dutiful and affectionate.—She was, indeed, exactly what a young woman ought to be, and the chief delight of her doating parents, who spared no expence to embellish the beautiful person and solid understanding which nature had bestowed upon her. With regard to the latter, Mr.

 Fletcher paid a particular attention to the cultivation of it, being extremely well qualified to be her preceptor, and she, full of gentleness and docility, affection and obedience, not only received all his paternal instructions with the sincerest pleasure, but really loved him for taking pains to make her the most accomplished of her sex in that part of the country in which they resided.

It cannot but be supposed that such a woman as Julia, with all her personal and intellectual charms, and heirs to a very large fortune, had a number of admirers.
 —The gentleman, however, whom her father seemed most inclined to favour, was not quite so agreeable in the eyes of the daughter.—Julia could not look upon the man whom her father encouraged, in the light of a husband: yet she was of so dutiful a disposition, that she tried to conquer all her little prejudices, and to bring herself to consent to what her father approved of, as she was wise enough to know that he was, from his long intimacy with Mr.
 Beesley, more capable of forming a judgment of his character than she herself was.

One evening, when she was going to a ball, which a particular friend of her father's gave upon the anniversary of his wedding-day, she danced with a Mr. Selby, a young man with an elegant person, and adorned with many graceful accomplishments:—but that person, and those accomplishments, had thrown him too much into a style of extravagance and dissipation, which had greatly injured his fortune, (at no time a large one) and gave him too strong a propensity to the most licentious pleasures and pursuits of the age. By falling into an intimacy with improper companions, his morals were corrupted:
 he had, however, naturally, with a good understanding, good feelings: he was humane, generous, and obliging; and he displayed all his insinuating powers, on the evening above-mentioned, with such a vigorous exertion, when Miss Fletcher was his partner, that he with those powers, added to his external advantages, gained a complete victory over her heart, and forced her to draw a comparison between him and Beesley,

Beesly, by no means favourable to the latter. So unfavourable, indeed, was her decision to Mr. Beesly, that she could not, with all her most dutiful endeavours, bring herself to behold him, with any degree of patience, in the character of a lover.

Selby, finding that he had very powerfully recommended himself to Miss Fletcher's attention, as her partner at the ball, was determined to improve the advantage he had obtained. Accordingly he not only waited on her the next morning, in order to make a polite enquiry after her health, and to hope she was perfectly recovered from the fatigues of the preceding evening, but embraced every opportunity to render himself still more and more agreeable to her; and his artful behaviour succeeded, as she soon gave him all decent encouragement with her eyes to believe that the language conveyed by his was not only thoroughly understood, but thoroughly felt by her.

The tender proceedings of these two lovers, however, with their expressive eyes, could not remain long concealed from the observation of others. Mr. Fletcher, the moment he discovered his daughter's predilection in favour of Mr. Selby, and the progress he had made as a fortunate lover, resolved to put a stop to an acquaintance, which was paving the way for a connection, of which he could not approve.—In consequence of this resolution, he mentioned the discovery he had made to his daughter, and not only forbade her to give the slightest encouragement to Selby, but recommended Beesly to her, at the same time, in warmer terms than ever.

Julia, not a little affected by the earnestness with which her father pleaded in Mr. Beesly's favour, began to think it absolutely necessary to comply with his wishes, notwithstanding her secret prepossessions, which militated strongly against them, and strove again to render her inclination subservient to her duty: but she strove to no purpose. Selby, not being able to bear the thoughts of giving up the fairest opportunity he ever had met with to improve, not to say repair his shattered fortune, by marrying a rich heiress, threw himself continually in her way, and by repeated assurances of the sincerest, and tenderest passion, delivered in the most animated language: a passion which would, he swore, eternally torment him, if it did not render him an object worthy of being loved by the woman whom he adored.

Poor Julia was staggered by these solemn assurances, articulated in a manner the most winning to be conceived, and began to feel it impossible to choose between her duty and her passion. She even sighed for a favourable opportunity to let Selby see how pleasing was her compliance to her; and determined to tell her father, if he renewed the conversation in Beesly's behalf, that it was not in her power to be happy herself with him, or to render him so.—

This line of conduct she pursued, but it little availed her. Her father's reply shook her resolution, and she once more attempted to be obedient to his will, having the strongest reason to be satisfied with his tender concern for her happiness, and with his parental anxieties relating to it, the joint operation of her gratitude and affection made her very averse to a behaviour which directly opposed his parental commands: especially when he informed her, at the same time, that though he preferred Beesly on account of his character, as he was entirely unexceptionable, for his son, he could not, setting aside the strong claims he had to his preference, he ought not to encourage Selby, knowing him to be vain, extravagant, and with a temper not calculated to promote any woman's felicity in the marriage state.

Julia sighed at what she heard, apprehensive that her father's picture of her lover, though slightly sketched, was but too correctly drawn. Of her father's integrity as a man, and his affection as a parent, she had no doubt; but his opinion, yet Selby's attachment, being a nature, his youth, and his unremitted vigour, gave a confirmation of his love. She was extremely pained at the idea of relinquishing a man so forward to please, a man who appeared so truly attached to her. With regard to the imperfections with which her father had charged him, as she had not discovered them herself, she was ready to believe that they had no existence; and that if he was chargeable with them, they had certainly been magnified by a rival, who made it his business to lessen Selby, in order to recommend himself.

Influenced by such considerations as these, which were strengthened by the assurances of her lover's being utterly unable to live without her, and of his resolving to become the very man she wished him to be, if she would but give him a fair trial, Julia, at last, not only consented to meet him privately in her father's park, but to elope with him, if she could bring herself to act in a manner which deviated so widely from the duty which she owed to her father, and from the respect which she owed to herself: a respect which had been to her mind, to prevent her from doing any thing that might tend to place her in a degrading light. When a woman loses her consequence in the eyes, she cannot expect to appear with any importance in the eyes of others.

Julia, now too much under the dominion of love to be swayed by any prudential reflections, was powerfully prompted to meet the man of her heart at the place appointed. She was naturally timid to an uncommon degree; but love, which so often renders cowards courageous, enabled her to set out, followed only by her faithful Fidelle, a little dog, of which she was exceedingly fond, but which she would have driven back at that time:—yet all her endeavours, with those of Selby, added to them, were insufficient.—Fidelle would not leave his affectionate mistress; sometimes he ran before her, sometimes leaped round her, and was more playful than she had ever seen him.

Selby, particularly chagrined at the dog's close pursuit of his mistress, fearing it might be accompanied with a detection of her elopement, renewed his efforts to get rid of him; but all his efforts were still unsuccessful. To increase his chagrin, a black cloud now made its appearance over their heads. A violent storm soon arose, attended with thunder and lightning, sufficient to terrify the boldest and most intrepid than Selby could be.—Clapping his hands over his eyes, when she saw the storm, he turned back immediately to the house, crying out—“Oh! this is to punish me for disobeying my dearest father! But I will return to him directly—I will confess my folly, and my remorse for having committed it. I am well assured that his great goodness will pardon his repenting child!”

Selby, startled at this exclamation, much more than at the increasing tempest, (which was furious enough to alarm a man less apt to be appalled upon such an occasion) intreated her not to form a resolution so destructive of his peace; desiring her also to assume a proper degree of courage: assuring her that from the appearance of the sky, he was certain the storm would soon be over. With the tenderest accents did he endeavour to prevail on her to proceed with him, telling her they would soon reach the post-chaise, which waited for him at the end of the park.

In vain he pleaded, in vain he persuaded: his hat and her bonnet were now blown off; the latter was soon whirled out of sight. His hair stood, literally, erect. Fidelle also appeared considerably affected by the conflict of the elements. Casting a piteous look at his distressed mistress, he set up a howl, which contributed to increase her terror, and to fortify the resolution she had made to return. “I will go to my father, Mr. Selby,”—cried she, “however dangerous my situation may be. If I am destroyed before I reach him, I shall merit the destruction.—How could I think of leaving such a parent, who he has been to me?—How, indeed, can any woman rationally expect the protection of Providence, when she acts so flagrantly in opposition to her duty, and to the delicacy of her sex? Detain me not, therefore, Sir, for nothing shall prevail on me to be guilty of an action, for the commission of which I cannot be justified by discretion.—Were the sky to become this moment as serene as it is tempestuous, I would turn back, as it is incumbent on me to do my duty, in every shape, without being compelled to it.”

Selby, finding that his persuasions to go on with him, and his attempts to make her believe the storm would soon be over, were equally fruitless, told her, since she persisted in giving him up, though she knew his whole happiness depended on her favour, he would attend her to her father, and in his presence take his last look of her.

On the utterance of these few concluding words, in a tone of the deepest despondence, she started and trembled, and when she gave him her hand to convey her back, sighed. Yet though her heart still pleaded forcibly in his behalf, she would not yield to a proceeding which would admit of no justification. She ran—she almost flew—winged by haste as well as terror.

On her arrival at her father's house she entered the hall at one door, just as he was retiring from it at another, having made enquiries after her, and been informed that she was seen walking towards the park. Fond of his dearest child, and fearful of her being exposed to the rage of the tempest, he was on the point of facing it all to secure her from its fury.—At that instant hearing her cry in a feeble voice, “O my father,” he turned back and beheld her pale and trembling, with Selby at her side, who still held her hand, and whose eyes were fixed on her's with an ardent tenderness, which even the presence of Mr. Fletcher could not restrain.—Breaking from him instantaneously, and flying to her father, she threw herself on her knees before him, and exclaimed—“Forgive me, Oh forgive me, Sir, though I do not deserve forgiveness; as I had designed to go away with Mr. Selby, secure from any further attempts on his life. The Duchess regent, who was concerned for the honour of her sex, and the happiness of two persons who had suffered so much, and seemed to have been born for each other, joined the hands of Stradella and his beloved Hortensia, and they were married. After the ceremony Stradella and his wife, having a desire to visit the port of Genoa, went thither, with a resolution to return to Turin: The assassins, having intelligence of their departure, followed them close at their heels. Stradella and his wife, it is true, reached Genoa; but, the morning after their arrival, these three execrable villains rushed into their chamber and stabbed each to the heart. The murderers had taken care to secure a barque which lay in the port; to this they retreated, and made their escape from justice, and were never heard of more.

Substance of Mr. Foote's Trial at Westminster-Hall.

MONDAY Dec. 9, came on before the Right Hon. Earl Mansfield, and a special Jury of Gentlemen of the county of Middlesex, in the Court of King's-bench, Westminster, the trial of Samuel Foote, Esq; for an assault with intent to commit an unnatural crime. The indictment was removed from the inferior Court by Certiorari, and stated a variety of facts unfit for publication. The prosecutor, John Sangster, deposed, that he had lived as coachman with Mr. Foote for a considerable time before he went last to Ireland; and that, upon his last journey to that kingdom, he changed his station and became his footman. That, while he continued there, the defendant once committed an act of very great indecency, and several times amused himself with asking him obscene questions. That he assaulted him at his house in Suffolk-street on the first of May, and the two succeeding days at North End, in the stable; where, on the second attempt, he offered him 20 or 30 guineas; upon which he (the prosecutor) called him a —, and struck him a blow on the head, which obliged him to desist. That he complained to the coachman and other servants, and determined to quit the service, which he accordingly did immediately. That he was very much dissatisfied with the treatment he had received, and that, upon his arrival in town, he communicated the affair, first to his brother, and then Doctor Fordyce, with whom he had formerly lived; after which he gave his information before Sir John Fielding, and procured the warrant, upon which the defendant was taken into custody. Williams, the then coachman, confirmed that part of the above testimony which respected him; and, being asked, said he came a reluctant witness.—It appeared, however, that a few days ago, this witness applied to Mr. Jewell, telling him he was apprehensive of being called upon, and begged at the same time a character, Mr. Foote having always refused to give him one. The prosecutor, being asked, said, that two Gentlemen assisted him in the prosecution.

January, 1777.

Dr. Fordyce confirmed the testimony of the prosecutor respecting his application to him, and said, that he was extremely cautious in giving his advice, but he desired him, if he intended to prosecute, by all means to apply to Sir John Fielding, of whose superior judgment he had the highest opinion. The Doctor gave the prosecutor a very good character, and delivered himself with tenderness and candor.

Mr. Bond, one of Sir John Fielding's Clerks, deposed, that he took the information from the prosecutor before Sir John, who dictated for him, but could not speak positively touching the day of the week, or month, when the fact in Suffolk-street was said to have been committed; for it was urged by the Counsel for the defendant, that, upon the first examination in the morning, the prosecutor said, that the fact was committed on the first day of May, which he described to be on Monday; and that he did not charge the day until evening, when, by means of a declaration from the defendant himself, he found out the mistake, and altered the charge to Wednesday, which was the day upon which May began.—At this stage of the business it was thought necessary to send for Sir John Fielding, who did not however arrive in Court until Mr. Wallace was advanced in his defence. His testimony was at length received, but he could not charge his memory with any thing which could throw a light upon the object. Sir John said, he only remembered there were two facts charged, and upon the information of the prosecutor had granted his warrant.—Mr. W. then continued his defence, which he would support with evidence of fact, although he remarked, that the prosecutor's own evidence was sufficient to convict of the vilest and most malevolent crime.—The two first witnesses in behalf of the defendant were two of the Performers, each deposed, that, for a number of years it was usual for the Players to meet at the Theatre on the 1st of May, in order to arrange matters for the ensuing season; and on the 1st of last May they were assembled there, when they received information from the defendant, that he could attend them until the Monday.

that he did not therefore come to town until that time. They were confirmed by Mr. Jewell and his wife in this particular, the former of whom farther deposed, that the prosecutor did not retire from his Master's service, but was discharged for a variety of crimes, particularly drunkenness and abusive language.

Earl Mansfield, in delivering the charge remarked principally upon the perjury, which was proved by the alibi; and the Jury immediately pronounced the defendant Not guilty.

As no proof appeared upon Mr. Foote's trial, that could possibly tend to the conviction of that Gentleman, it must give pleasure to every honest mind to find the designs of an interested individual or two thus counteracted by the impartial verdict of an English Jury.—What man, if such groundless and malicious prosecutions were countenanced, could sleep secure of his character—however innocent, however circumpect his conduct, if the incoherent testimony of a discharged servant were sufficient to affect it but in the eye of the world?

the noblest work of God," and I suppose according to the latitude he gives the appellation, he is strictly right; but where is the man who can put his hand upon his heart, and rigidly declare he never erred against his conscience?

Sir G. Where is the man! Here is the man.

Pliant. Stop, Sir George; did you never attempt to impose upon an innocent female? Did you never pretend an imaginary passion for a real one, when lust, not love, animated your fondness?

Sir G. Boys tricks—those times are gone and past.

Pliant. Did you never rack a tenant, or distress a farmer, when you was in no distress yourself?

Sir G. Every man has a right to have his own.

Pliant. Did you never litigate a suit, when you were conscious you were wrong, building not upon the justice of your cause, but upon the length of your purse?

Sir G. An impartial English jury will always do justice: let the cause be what it will, they cannot be bribed.

Pliant. Have you not solicited for a place, and been disappointed, and is not that the cause of your present anti-ministerial vociferation?

Sir G. That was under a virtuous administration, when it was an honour to serve one's king and country.

Pliant. Have you never bid for a borough, though you rail so much at bribery and corruption?

Sir G. We all know that boroughs are marketable commodities, and like other merchandize are sold to the best bidder.

Pliant. Well, after this fair confession, I shall talk no more about honesty, and so good evening to you. [Exit.]

Sir G. This fellow is a fool, with his notions of honesty, and his poets: he would have a man give up his right, and starve for the good of the community—Pretty notions indeed! But I was a fool for talking to him—he has rather ruffled me. Waiter, order my coach. [Exit also.]

Uncle Toby's Political Distress.

WHAT a shame it is you should frighten us poor country gentlefolks out of our senses, and disquiet such a number of good old gentlewomen, his Majesty's faithful subjects! I shall give one instance of a great injury done in our family. My Uncle Toby rests an implicit faith on news-papers. They are to him what the Pope is to the Papists, to fire his zeal, or lead his bigotry in politics. With an easy fortune, the following Dialogue, of which I was an auditor (and which I had the curiosity to take down the other evening in short-hand) will be agreeable to your readers, I think it may be admitted in your useful and entertaining Magazine.

George Crusty, and William Pliant, Esq;

FINE doings!—here is work for us finely cut out!—four pence in the pound!—six next year, I hope!—and half a dozen lotteries! Pliant. What is the matter, Sir George? seem to be out of temper.

G. Out of temper! Is there not a plague? Are you not ruined? Taxed and burthens insupportable, and for nothing! To support a parcel of lazy, idle, dissipated court-pensioners, pimps and panegyrists, and adultresses!

P. You have no place or pension, Sir George, or you would not be so angry.

G. I have a place or a pension! I do not think I shall be inrolled in such an infamous establishment, and no honest man would have his name there.

P. It is lucky for you, Sir George, you were born to an easy fortune; but I am sure you will merit of being honest, when a man is compelled to be a rogue?

G. And yet the greatest rogues are the most honest, and have the least excuse for their dishonesty.

P. The Pope tells us "an honest man's fortune, and enjoying all the comforts of life under the mildest government, behold him for a moment throwing away the flowery sweets of happiness, seizing the bitter cup of disquietude, and becoming the prey of infatuation.

The other day in this gloomy month of November, "when the good people of England hang and drown themselves," my Uncle Toby being hipped, in a thick fog, could see nothing right. The cat broke his pipe, and Growler threw down his nipperkin of punch, as before the school boys had plundered his garden, and stole his best bunches of grapes. Soured with mishap, he sat ruminating by his fire-side, when in comes Paddy. What news from London?—O, cries Paddy, with all the fire and oratory of a Catiline, our ticket is come up a blank, and Old England is sinking. What are we all demolished? Yes, Paddy replies: the kingdom's undone; its credit is vanished! the vast increasing debt of the nation, and its wide-spreading poverty, will bankrupt us before the face of all the world! rotten at the basis, the once mighty fabric and glorious structure nods to its fall, and totters to its destruction! Seized by unskilful and by wicked hands, which know not the rudder, the reeling barque of state is hurried into a boisterous element of direful danger, where deceptions and quicksands lie concealed to draw it down to fate; and where dreadful rocks rise to oppose its passage, or crush it in a tremendous shipwreck; while all around fierce tempests are brewing, which threaten, amidst the burst of thunder, winged by fate, to sink us deep in destruction; nor is there any hand divine stretched forth from heaven to save a guilty administration!

Stopping short this great orator, Uncle Toby cried, Then it is certain we are all lost. If you doubt it, says Paddy, behold ample proof, and quires of news-papers backed his assertions. Read the great Burke, Richmond and Wilkes, on the King's Speech, with loads of eternal paragraphs, where you will find we have neither money, men, arms, nor ships, to defend ourselves against our enemies, but the genius of Britain must fall a prey to its foes: while America, crowded with her millions, fighting in the glorious cause of freedom, bids defiance to the tyrant of England! In short, we are now tumbling down the gulph of perdition! he ended groaning.

Thus thunder-struck, my poor Uncle Toby looked aghast. Down dropped from his trembling hand a mighty mug of ale; and smiting his breast, he cried, Then will I hurry to London, and save the wreck of my fortune. No more he said, but jumping up in haste, threw down the tea-table, and ran to secure a place in the stage; nor could the plaintive voice of Gammar Wellwou'd his wife, nor the friendly one of his neighbour, alter his resolution.

Next morning Uncle Toby mounts the stage coach. His company consisted of Alderman Free, a contractor, a sea-sick lady given to cascading, and a droll stage-player. Politics soon took the lead. Free swore that England consisted of whores, rogues, parasites, and tyrants; and that the Americans were the finest fellows in the world, and a match for all Europe, rising up to a glorious liberty on the ruin of dissipated Britain! The Contractor extolled his patrons to the skies, and England to all the kingdoms of the earth for every kind of happiness, but called the rebels a set of ungrateful scoundrels, till the dispute was rising to blows; things, which the Alderman, being an American, gave up for the free use of words. In the confusion, what with the fright and jolting of the coach, the poor old lady began to sicken, and in the effusion of fear overwhelmed them both, which raised the Comedian's mirth, who said he expected a shower after such a thunder storm.

Mean time a scene more serious took place. A voice grating harsh discord hailed the coachman, who stopped. A highwayman demanded, with horrid imprecations, the world's great want—money; and his palsied hand held in the window a trembling pistol. What was demanded in haste was given in a hurry. But the Comedian began to praise his trade, and shamming fool cried out, daddy, daddy, look you there now; if you want money, Uncle Toby has got it all, and so escaped: while Toby was searched and plundered as much as if he had met a Provincial, it not being the Alderman's day to feel bold in the sacred defence of property!

The morning before Uncle Toby arrived in town, the coach stopped at a village to breakfast. Accordingly he marched to the Tonfor's, at once to hear news, and have the thick-set crop mowed from his chin. As he enters the shop, he cries, well Mr. Trimbush, how goes the world? Why, master, he answers, we are all in the luds. The Tories shave us closely, and the Scotch are keen as a razor to tax us, yet give us little else in return but puffs; but Whigs are the glory of the nation! Thus his tongue ran, while his fingers plied the napkin, and quickly loaded Toby's chin with lather. But see a crowd gathers round the door! What is the matter! News from town! A mighty press has swept the river. The French are landing by thousands, magnified into millions by the voice of Fame. Amazed the barber stands and listens. Uncle Toby, as if planet-struck, sat staring with his eyes and mouth wide extended. The tonfor springs to the door, but first by mistake whips the wash-ball into Uncle Toby's mouth instead of the basin, who in such plight, spitting out the soap in the street, and sputtering some soap-suds in the face and eyes of a strapping surly fish-woman, receives a confounded box on the ear. Mean time, as he stood amidst the crouching news-mongers, a nimble fingered London genius, with agile touch and clean dexterity, slips from his sob the faithful companion of his hours, and leaves him to bemoan the hard fate of his political curiosity.

Now arrived in town, the hurry of trade-folks, the jostling crowds of people driving him from side to side, and the thundering coaches confirm his heated imagination, that all were in confusion, and the people running to ruin. At length, wet with showery rain, splashed all over by cart-horses, and bruised by loaded porters, unwary of his path, he reached his friend's house, and found a jovial company over a generous bowl of punch, and ladies at cards. Fatigued, he flung himself into an easy chair. Ceremony was out of time with him. Cousin Toby, you are heartily welcome; but what the deuce brings you to town!—Why, I hear you are all ruined, sinking, undone, &c.—Here he was interrupted by a burst of merriment.—Nay, you may laugh, but do not the Duke of Richmond, the Lords Chatham, Camden, Shelburne, and many others, tell us so every day? And they are too noble to tell fibs, and too wise to be mistaken!

At that Mr. Rigg got up, and seizing the bowl, cried, Here's to the best of Princes, whose people are the happiest in nature, would but they think so—and after he had drank deeply of the Pierian spring, as if inspired by the potent bowl, he thus spoke: As to the screech-owls of politics, and ravens still croaking prophetic of evils, which they wish their country, let them follow their leader Wilkes, who, jostled out of the City Chamber, in his raving fits curses the ungrateful, sickle, bawling, greasy Liv-very; and then sneaks into a corner with his French girl, and fuddling owns a setting sun! As to the Duke—See yon old woman with a peck of coals! Because his grandam was a King's mistress, he raises a farthing out of distress, and yet bawls against taxation! Like Achilles enraged, the anger of Lord Cheat'em against his brothers, first lit up the flames in America, into which he threw occasional combustibles, and now he and his party grumble to have them extinguished, except by themselves. But his old Law Friend was kicked out of noble company for betraying to him some private conversation. The Marquis, too feeble to manage the reins of government, was jostled out of the saddle, keeping still in high pay the Irish Orator, who stands up the first of rhetoricians, deserving a better cause than that of faction. But with his pen, Julian starts from a second Junius, and hurling the long devoted dart at Lord George Germain, it falls effectual at the feet of America's great director; for he is armed with integrity, and protected by the shield of genius and ability, while the occasional writer pelts him with squibs and crackers!

He ended, and gave Uncle Toby a tumbler of warm punch, which opened his eyes, and cleared off the mist which obscured his imagination, and thus he uttered—Why what a fool was I to regard your news-mongers, your politicians, and out of place grumblers! For the future I shall laugh at their clamour, and all imaginary distress, enjoy the happiness before me, and drink prosperity to old England every night in a bumper—and so—Nunc est Bibendum.

An Account of the City of Limerick, extracted from ancient History, and from authentic Annals preserved in a Family, that has resided there for several Centuries. (Concluded from the Appen. p. 876.)

DONOUGH, son to Bryan Boru, and Tur-lough his grandson were acknowledged by many as monarchs of Ireland, but their titles were disputed by other provincial kings, who successively assumed the title of monarch. The succeeding princes of the race of Bryan Boru, were generally called kings of Limerick or north Munster, and their reigns were signalized by little else but intestine troubles, which lessened their power, 'till the year of our Lord 1164, that Donald or Daniel O'Brien, surnamed the Great, took on him the reins of government: He rendered his reign auspicious as well in peace as in war; he was remarkable not only for his courage but his piety, and he left behind him many lasting monuments of his munificence; he built the cathedral on the famous rock of Cashell, he founded and endowed many monasteries and nunneries in the counties of Clare, Limerick and Tipperary, and bestowed his palace in Limerick to the church, making of it a fine cathedral, extant to this day; he annexed to this cathedral very rich and extensive livings, in his grant of which he styles himself Donald king of Lum-neach;

by consequence the name of Limerick must have been given to this city by the English, who afterwards became masters of it.

This famous Donald O'Brien, king of Limerick, having married a daughter of Dermot Mac Morough, king of Leinster, seems to have espoused his quarrel, for in the year 1169, on the first landing of English forces in Ireland, Robert Fitzstephens joined Donald with some forces, and soon obliged Roderick, Monarch of Ireland, to retreat into Connaught. In 1171 Donald waited on king Henry the II. at Cashell, made submission to him, and received several presents, together with a confirmation of his small dominions from king Henry.

Notwithstanding this promise from the king, Harvy de Monte Morisco, with the consent of earl Strongbow, in 1174 invaded the territories of Donald, but was defeated with the loss of 400, some say 700 killed, among which were 4 captains. This occasioned a commencement of hostilities between Donald and the English, and in 1175 Strongbow sent a great force under Raymond le Gros, which was joined by the forces of Donald king of Osfory. They laid siege to Limerick, and having discovered a ford in that part of the Shannon which surrounds the town, they forced their passage through it, entering promiscuously with the Irish into the city, with the plunder of which they enriched themselves, kept the place in their possession, and appointed Milo of Menavia, governor thereof. Donald raised a numerous army for the recovery of Limerick, and in 1176 laid siege to it, but on Raymond's marching to its relief, Donald raised the siege, gave him battle and was defeated; whereupon he made peace with Raymond, and gave him hostages.

King Henry the II. in a parliament held at Oxford in 1177, granted to Philip de Breusa or Braos the kingdom of Limerick, or North Munster, except the city of Limerick, and Cantred of the Danes or Easterlings. In 1179 the said Philip, with 60 knights, 20 horse and many foot, accompanied by Robert Fitzstephens and Milo Cogan, with 50 knights and 90 horse marched towards Limerick, in order to make good his grant, but finding the task of taking the city to be too hazardous, he desisted from his enterprize, and returned into Wales.

In the year 1180, on the arrival of King John (then but Lord of Ireland) at Waterford, many of the Irish Nobility waited on him, but being affronted by some of his attendants, they in resentment had recourse to Donald, King of Limerick, who jointly with other Irish forces, defeated the English in several battles, and killed many of them in the garrison of Ardfinnan; he reinstated Roderick, King of Connaught, who was dethroned by his son Cornelius; he defeated the brave Courcy, Earl of Ulster, and in the same battle killed many English of distinction; in a battle fought by him in Dunlas O' Fогerte in 1192, he defeated the English, who in revenge ravaged and plundered Thomond. In short, the whole life of this famous Donald, King of Limerick, was a continued transition from works of piety to warlike proceedings, 'till at length he died in the year 1194, and with him finished the kingdom of Limerick, or North Munster; for though his son Donough Carbrac was stiled King of Limerick, and founded the Dominican Convent there, in which he lies buried, yet his power must have been of little consequence, for in 1195 we find Limerick to be governed by an English magistracy, and the first Provost thereof to be John Spafford.

Having now given the best and most rational account of the antiquity of Limerick, that I could possibly find, I shall proceed to mention something of its progress and present state.

In 1198, the Provost of Limerick, Adam Sarvant, had the title of Mayor conferred on him, which was ten years before London had one. The present civil government is by a Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, Town Clerk and Sheriffs, who, with the Freeman, return two members to parliament.

Half a mile above the city, and very near St. Thomas's Castle, the river Shannon divides itself, forming an island of three miles in circumference, on the south part of which the English town is built, and though it is 63 miles from the sea, vessels of 500 tons burthen come up to it with safety; its communication with the Irish town is by a broad bridge of six arches, called Baal's bridge, and with the county of Clare by another bridge of 14 arches, remarkable for being quite level, yet withstanding the force of the greatest floods and the ravage of all devouring time. On this as well as on the county Limerick side, there are large suburbs of half a mile in extent.

On the east side of the English town Walls, lies the Abbey of St. Francis, which is a privileged town in itself, and not subject to the juridical government of the city; in this place, where the county court-house stands, formerly there was a Franciscan convent the old church of which is converted into an Hospital; this convent was founded in the 13th century, by William de Burgo. The canons regular of of the order of St. Augustin, had a monastery where the city court house is built, and in or near Quay-lane the Knights Templars had a house, as well as the Hermits of St. Augustin, the ruins whereof cannot be traced out. The fish-house near Baal's bridge is part of a priory of the Virgin Mary and St. Edward, founded in the 13th Century, by Simon Minor, a citizen. At Peter's Cell a nunnery was founded by Donald O'Brien, king of Limerick, for the canoneses of St. Augustin.

At this time [1777] there are in the city one cathedral and two parish churches, four Romish parish chapels, one Presbyterian, one Quaker, and one Methodist meeting-house, a particular history of which, and the public Buildings in general, will be given in its proper place.

In 1760 there were to the city 17 gates, of which not one is now left entire; with them has been thrown down a great part of the walls, and to the ruin of these walls, may in a great measure be attributed the present and future rise of the city; by being less confined, it is rendered more wholesome, in the place of these useless walls have been substituted spacious quays, of a great breadth, and large commodious houses, which invite gentlemen and trading people to come and live here.

The export consists chiefly of tallow, raw hides, beef, pork, and butter. The revenue of the city appears to be about 40,000l. per annum, and the number of inhabitants 40,000.

The great improvements making on one side of the city, by the right hon. Edmond Sexton Pery, and on the other by the right hon. Earl of Shelburne, will contribute greatly to its beauty and advantage. It would be injustice to the present representatives in parliament, to omit taking notice of their great attention to the welfare of the city, the interest and convenience of the inhabitants in general.

Limerick is the See of a Bishop, to which are united the dioceses of Ardfer and Aghadoe; it also gives the title of Viscount to the right hon. James Hamilton Earl of Clanbrassil, Viscount Limerick, and Baron of Clonboy, in the county of Down. It was formerly the strongest fortress, and is at present the third largest city in Ireland. It lies in 8 deg. 30 min. West Longitude from London, and 52 deg. 35 min. North Latitude; about 93-measured miles distant from Dublin, and 49, 1-half, measured from Corke.

A curious original Letter from an Attorney on his Circuit, to his Mistress in Town.

My dear Charmer,

THE circuit is now at an end, and the judges and lawyers on their return home, but no squire sentenced at the assizes to transportation could have been in a more wretched plight than your humble servant; for I can safely make affidavit, that each day that I behold not your lovely face, is to me a dies non. Cupid the tipstaff has served me with an attachment from your bright eyes, more dreadful than a green wax process, he has taken my heart into custody, and will not accept of bail: unless you allow of my plea, I must be non suited in a cause I have set my heart on. Why will you, my charmer, while I pine in hopes of a speedy rejoinder, hang me up term after term, by frivolous delays, which tend only to gain time. I filed my bill as of last Michaelmas term, on the morrow of All Souls, in hopes ere this to have joined issue with you; it is now fifteen days from Easter-day, and by your demurring, I am as far from bringing my cause to an hearing, as before I commenced my suit; you still delay giving in your answer, which is absolutely against the practice of all courts: I would willingly quit the fattest client there, to attend your business, would you but submit to a reference, and should prefer an attendance at your chambers to those of a master in chancery.

I stand in great need of an able council to move my suit while I am absent; that sly slut Dolly, your chambermaid has taken my fee, yet I fear betrays my cause; she is ever preferring some cross bill which protracts matters, and yet I do not sue in forma pauperis, being ready and willing to inseoff you in a good jointure, and to this I will bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, by a deed in which you shall nominate trustees. To save expences, my clerk shall engross it, and it shall be perused by your own lawyer, it being left as a quere, how vastly preferable the title of a femme covert, is to that of a spinster; but you still answer short to all my interlocutory interrogatories. If I could but once obtain a leading order to try my title, by even a jury of your own friends, I am certain I should obtain a verdict in my favour, and recover costs against you, for I have a good action for attendance, and loss of time, though upon the posse, I do not think I could find in my heart, to issue a capias against you, or put you into any other court, but that of Hymen. You have equity in your own breast, and from thence I hope for relief; decree but for me, and the day of essoign shall be that of your own nuptials, and the eve of the lasting felicity of, dear creature,

Your humble suppliant,
And faithful Orator, &c.

History of the Proceedings of the British Parliament. (Continued from App. p. 928.)

BUT that I may not seem to exaggerate, I do not state that it is indispensable to provide for the whole of the twelve millions, because I know it has been customary, though not commendable, to suffer an out-standing debt of two or three millions. And to be perfectly explicit, I wish to state the precise sum which will be necessary before the end of this very year, to place us in the same condition as we were before the American war. I think it very fair to take my line, from the noble lord's own conduct, respecting the outstanding debt. In his administration, the navy debt has been reduced as low as one million and eighty-two thousand pounds, and the exchequer bills to one million. I shall therefore on this head throw in another million, and strike off three millions from my last total of twelve millions. The noble lord's own conduct marks what even a minister thinks to be the reasonable line of indulgence, and justifies me in saying, that the least sum to be raised, which can be sufficient to restore this country to that degree of ease and affluence (such as it was) which we enjoyed before this American war, must be nine millions. I make no demands of impracticable austerity, with any view to aggravate; but I state the simple and certain difference, such as it will be at the end of this campaign, with the situation in which a commendable attention of the noble lord, in the early parts of his ministry had once placed us. I call it the certain difference of nine millions, because there can be no doubt that the extras, as estimated at five millions three hundred thousand pounds, must be much below the mark; if so, the result of the whole is this; that the nation must be prepared to support the burden of ten or twelve millions at the end of this year, for the American war.

I have often stated these matters to the noble lord in this house, without any correction from him as having over-rated them. I told the country gentlemen, both last year and this year, that they must take their leave of a three shilling land-tax; the fourth is mortgaged in perpetuity. If you are already ten or twelve millions deep, where will you be in the next year, and the next? and what taxes or funds are you provided with, or can you find? A noble person (the Earl of Stair) has given us a very accurate state of the public revenue, and has shewn that the annual surplus, even of a four shilling establishment, is but about five hundred thousand pounds a year: how is this pittance to clear off a debt of ten millions? or, if you go on with these destructive measures, perhaps twenty or thirty millions. Take off the fourth shilling and you will find the remainder barely equal to your peace establishment; therefore the fourth shilling upon the land is all that you have left to clear your debts, or provide for future contingencies, till the landed gentlemen shall consent to give six shillings in the pound.

I have endeavoured to draw up my motions, argumentatively dependent on each other, in the manner and order that I have opened them, viz. The services of 1776, —the debts out-standing,—the ordinary ways and means,—and the deficiency unprovided for.—That they may stand upon your journals, as a caveat at least entered before these fatal measures were irretrievable. But as I do not mean to throw out any false colouring, either to the public, by the means of your votes, and as one of my resolutions contains a recital of the total navy debt, lest therefore it should appear that I made a demand for the payment of the whole, I shall offer to the house a subsequent resolution, explaining what proportion of the navy debt I do not think it necessary to have discharged, for the better security of public credit, viz. The navy bills outstanding, or at least such part as now carry interest at four per cent. amounting to about one million six hundred thousand pounds, exclusive of interest, as appears by a paper laid this day upon your table at my request. The paper is entitled, “An account of navy, victualling, and transport bills outstanding on the 20th of February, 1776.”

The reasons which induce me to offer this measure to the House, are in my poor opinion of some importance. If you look at your navy debt, or upon the paper just now presented, you will see that there are more bills of credit now outstanding than in any year for the first five years of the late war, when we had the greatest powers in Europe to contend with. What description of mine, or even what possible exaggeration, could paint the present state of this country in more alarming colours! At the very outset of this war we are driven to the same shifts, which we were not driven to in the late war, till we had attained every object of it, and till by the vigorous exertion of a great minister, we had girt the globe with conquest. When every nerve had been so long strained, and so successfully, something might then have been said for slackening the springs, and eking out with expedients; but to begin with secret shifts and hazardous expedients, what is that but confessing to a certainty, that you foresee foresee the enormity of the expence; that you take every means of concealing it from the public eye; that you know and feel the inability of supporting a civil war, which will destroy every source of its strength and power; but that you are secretly and treacherously meditating to lead us on, confiding, as we are, uninformed, and unsuspecting as you would have us to be, step by step, to ruin?

The public have been alarmed, and perhaps not without reason, upon some supposed measures of the bank, with respect to navy bills. Wherever there are mysteries in matters of importance suspicion is justifiable. Immediately after the navy debt was moved for in parliament, it was announced, that the bank had stopped their hands in buying up navy bills, and they fell to a double discount. It was the calling for the navy debt that first brought to light the total amount of the outstanding bills, which on the 31st of December 1775 was greater than in any of the five first years of the late war. The public concluded very naturally, that there was some secret understanding between the ministry and the bank upon this subject. Doubtless buying up the navy bills by the bank was a voluntary act of their own, even if it were concerted with the ministry; but still the circumstances, taken all together, appear suspicious. Why should the bank have prevented themselves, as they seem to have done, from purchasing navy bills at the double discount? For the moment they left off buying, the discount became double. Why should they even seem to be assisting to government in their system of contracting debts secretly and underhand?—This is tender ground. It was not originally any suspicion of mine; but I confess I took it from a paper circulated, and which I believe was sent to most members of this House, stating, that the bank had advanced above eight millions to the treasury, upon distant funds, out of the reach of circulation, to the great risk of public credit. If that be so, I still think, as I did when it was first suggested to me, that it is a most dangerous system. Its tendency is to convert the bank of England into a ministerial engine of state; and the danger nothing less, than making the executive power independent on the knowledge and consent of parliament for money. May not twenty-four directors, in some future time, be prevailed upon materially to sacrifice the interest of the proprietors at large to serve a minister? Even in the case just mentioned, it was a fortunate incident for the ministry, that, just at the time when it was their object to get what advance of money they could in secret, the bank should seem studious to take up their navy bills at half the discount to which they fell, upon the very day on which they ceased to purchase. I repeat it again, this is tender ground: more so than is generally imagined.

I believe no one can doubt the responsibility of the bank of England; but any bank, whether public or private, may be broken, notwithstanding a very final responsibility of paying twenty shillings in the pound, and even a great surplus remaining. It is a ready responsibility that must support any bank at a pinch: distant funds out of reach, will not give support against a sudden alarm and run. Any indiscretion of the bank in advancing large sums upon very distant funds, may be extremely hazardous to themselves, and to every shop, which by habit and gradual custom considers bank notes to be as good as coin.—They are all upon one bottom. I have no all the alarms about paper credit that some gentlemen have, particularly not about bank paper; but still I think it a point of material prudence, that the bank should not be too free in advancing millions upon very remote funds. This is a very important point. I hope that I have touched it tenderly. I think I need say no more in support of my last motion, for making a satisfactory provision for the outstanding navy bills.

I will now state my motions as they follow each other argumentatively in order:

That it appears to this House, That the supplies already voted in this session, or thereabouts, of 6,157,000 (exclusive of several other services yet unprovided for) — ***

That it is the opinion of this House, That the expence of the navy for the year 1776, may probably exceed the provisions hitherto made by parliament, to the amount of — 2,500,000

That it is the opinion of this House, That the extraordinaries of the land forces for one year, from March 9, 1776, may probably amount to the sum of — 2,500,000

That it is the opinion of this House, that the expences of the office of ordnance for land service for 1776, may probably exceed the provisions hitherto made in this session, by the sum of — 300,000

That it appears to this House, that there are Exchequer bills outstanding, charged upon the first aids of this session, to the amount in principal money of 1,250,000

That

That it appears to this House, that the navy debt on the 31st of December last, amounted to the sum, or thereabouts, of - 2,698,000

That it is the opinion of this House, that for the better security of the public credit it would be proper to provide for the navy, victualling, and transport bills, outstanding on the 29th of February, 1776, amounting to the principal sum of 2,308,000*l.* or thereabouts, exclusive of interest already due, or at least for such part of the said bills as do at present carry interest at 4 per cent.

I have now stated all that I have to offer on the subject of the present state of the nation, and its revenue, which I address especially to the noble lord who is chancellor of the exchequer. It is not the first time that I have addressed him upon that subject, and to this very effect. I have done it many times in this session, both before and since Christmas; but he has always confined himself to general terms. No repeated applications have been able to extort any thing explicit from him. How can the noble lord justify such secrecy and silence, and backwardness to communicate information to this house at this important crisis? It is the duty of his office to be active and vigilant, and forward to apprise this house, in time, of every important circumstance, and not to leave the burthen upon private and uninformed members of dragging every unwilling estimate into day-light. Why will he not cultivate the confidence of the House by fair and open dealing? What interest can the noble lord have in keeping us in a state of deception? Is he afraid, that if the whole truth were laid before us, this House and the public would be less sanguine in the prosecution of the American war? I remembered the day when the noble lord told us, that others were more sanguine and impatient than himself. What are we to think of this inconsistency, that he should suffer himself to be driven to every sanguinary measure, contrary to his own better judgment? He professes the most earnest desire for peace, but submits to and supports every measure and principle of the most sanguinary kind. In the very beginning of this session he exclaimed with the most apparent earnestness and sincerity, would to God that all things were as they were in 1763! He expressly declared his readiness to dispense with taxation; he has even proposed terms with America (such as they are) which at least proves, that he does not maintain the doctrine of unconditional submission; the next day, perhaps, he is taken to task, and insulted publicly before us all, for his indolence and inactivity; then again he resumes his taxation and compulsory revenue: He submits to be the mere instrument of carrying through this house every merciless and vindictive act that is suggested to him: and very placidly acquiesces with the noble lord lately advanced to the head of the American department, who declares in the most peremptory tone, that he will reduce America to unconditional submission with fire and sword.

The place of the first lord of the treasury has usually been considered as the post of minister; but whether it be from indolence or indispotion to the service, we know not; certain however it is, that the present noble lord in that office suffers himself to be controuled and superseded, at least in American measures. A secretary of state for the American department is introduced, to give vigour to sanguinary measures, to counteract the more pacific disposition of the apparent minister, lest the house should catch the relenting mood, which in truth they appear well disposed to, whenever the noble lord at the head of the treasury gives the least opening. These are the dispositions which all his friends (and I myself am not without my partialities to him) wish to see confirmed into steady and persevering principles of action. Why will he not justify the favourable opinion of his friends, by a manly adherence to the line of lenient justice? If these principles are not merely transitory and complexional in him, let him confirm them by his actions. If he will take a decided part now, according to his professions, and not suffer himself to be over-ruled by some secret and destructive influence, he may give peace to his country and to America. It is an important moment that does not fall to every man's lot. A manly steadiness and exertion of that influence which he possesses, may rescue his country from all the horrors of a civil war: and when I have said thus much to him, his own reflection will suggest to him that the man who has so much in his power, and neglects the exertion, either through indolence, or any personal views, will have a very private or heavy load of guilt lying at his door.

However, Sir, for the present, and with respect to the materials which I have now offered to the house, I shall confine my address to the noble lord as chancellor of the exchequer, distinct from the efficient and responsible minister of the American war; a distinction which perhaps he may not be displeased with at present, and which he may find it very material to be able hereafter to justify.

I now submit myself to the noble lord's comment and correction, if I have fallen into any material error in my calculations; If not, I will, under favour of the house, reserve myself for a few words upon the general subject of the American civil war, which is the sole and ultimate object of all my prayers and labours to avert.

*The Adventures of Miss Sophia Sternheim:

THE unhappy Sophia, after this distressful scene, determined to go to Emily, the Curate's daughter, with whom she had so early a friendship, and to hide herself from the view of the world. All her money amounted to no more than three hundred pieces, fifty of which she gave to two orphans, who lived in the house with her, and as many to the poor of the village. Her jewels, and a trunk full of clothes, were all she took with her. She soon after set off, attended by Rosina, the sister of her friend Emily, who had been a witness of all her distress.

In this situation they arrived at Vaele, near Alsace, where they found sweet consolation in the tender reception and virtuous friendship of her friend Emily and her husband. They made it their study to re-establish peace in the soul of Sophia. She employed herself in instructing a young girl, whom she had some time before intrusted to Emily's care. She assumed a fictitious name, and, in allusion to her lot, took that of Leidens (which signifies suffering) and chose to pass as an officer's widow.

It is now time to return to Derby, who, after his arrival in England, had become the confidant of Lord Seymour, who poured out his lamentations for the loss of Sophia, whilst all the power of Derby's soul inwardly exulted over him, and made the last derision of him. Seymour again dispatched couriers to Florence, but Derby found means to stop the course of his researches. The absence of his servant John appeared very suspicious, and, agreeable to Derby's advice, they visited his chamber, where they found a bit of a letter which strongly persuaded Lord Seymour he was the deliverer of the delicate Sophia: A discovery which convinced him that he had low ideas and propensities. Seymour's tenderness was changed into contempt, and he sent his couriers no longer on their travels. Seymour even began to experience the charms of a peaceful and reciprocal tenderness for Miss C——, when an unexpected order of the court obliged him and his uncle to take a journey to Germany. Towards evening the postillion mistook the way, and the carriage stopped at an inn, where they were just going to alight, when the landlady began bawling, 'What are you English? If you are, begone; I will never suffer any of them to enter my house; so you may pass the night in the forest.' At length Lord G—— commanded silence, imagining that something very serious must have happened there, to extinguish that avidity after gain that those kind of people are generally possessed with.

He called to the woman in a friendly tone, and asked what was the reason of refusing them admittance? 'Never will I admit an Englishman,' said she, 'though they would fill my rooms with gold: I will never break the vow I have made, on the account of a dear Lady, who was basely injured by a nobleman of that nation.' They raged with impatience, and, calling her son aside, asked him the reason of his mother's aversion to the English.—'Sir, said the lad, 'about six months ago an English Lord sent his wife hither, a most beautiful young Lady; she clothed my cousin, and was so good to the poor; that we loved her as much as ourselves: but one day it happened, a considerable time after the wicked Lord was gone, that one of his servants came on horseback, and gave a letter to the Lady, and told us his master would never come again. My mother, who augured nothing good from it, slipped into the next chamber, in order to discover the contents of the letter: She saw our beautiful Lady all in tears, and heard her tell her waiting-woman her marriage was all a farce. Accordingly she departed some days after, but so sick and sorrowful, that she must certainly have died on the road; and this is the reason my mother will not suffer an Englishman to enter her doors again.'

'Alight, said he, Gentlemen! I will endeavour to appease my mother.' 'Oh, my Lord!' cried Seymour, 'it is my Sophia;—but the villain shall be punished.—It is Derby; I have long suspected him;—no one but Derby could be guilty of such an enormity. The Landlady then entered, and acquainted them with the whole affair. That Derby had been the villain was no longer a doubt with the two Noblemen. The Landlady shewed them a drawing, which, she said, had been done by the young Lady: and which, by the beauty of the outlines, and the fineness of the shades, convinced Seymour it was the performance of Sophy: A few guineas purchased this little piece, and Seymour covered it with kisses. The next morning the agitation of his mind had thrown him into a slight fever; and, after taking all imaginable pains to get intelligence of the idol of his heart, to no purpose, Lord Seymour and his uncle proceeded upon their journey.

Sophia, who had no other plan but to end her days in retirement, sold the rich diamonds, while she was at Vals, which were set round the pictures of her father and mother, and also disposed of her other jewels, intending to live on the interest of the sum they produced; but, in this reverse of fortune, she did not renounce the pleasure of doing good; for she determined to teach some poor girls to work.

This idea, which she executed, was the origin of the rest of the events of her life. One of these her young scholars was found to be the god-daughter of a very rich Lady the neighbourhood: Having shewn her God-mother the work she had been taught, the Lady gained intelligence of Sophy, and solicited Emily's husband to engage Mrs. Leidens to come and live with her, and found in her house a charity-school. Mrs. Leidens at first would not consent, for fear of being known; but Emily so strongly represented to her, that she would neglect an opportunity of doing a great deal of good, that it was not in her power to resist this motive; and the fear of occasioning trouble in Emily's house, though she paid for every thing, at last determined her.

She dressed herself in the plainest manner, in a robe of striped linen exactly fitted to her shape, with handkerchiefs and large white aprons; for something English was always in her idea. Under very large bonnets she hid her beauteous hair, and part of the features of her face, her intentions being to disguise herself; but her fine eyes, that exalted smile of goodness which shone amidst the strong impression of secret pain, her admirable shape, her graceful gait, drew upon her all eyes. Her departure afflicted all; three leagues interposed between the mansion of Mrs. Hill's and Emily's, but her letters afforded great consolation to the amiable family at Vals.

Of Legislators.

HE who ventures to undertake forming a nation, must consider himself in a state of changing human nature, and of transforming every individual, who by himself is a perfect whole, into a part of a much greater whole, from which this individual receives, in some measure, his life and being; of altering the constitution of man, to strengthen it; of substituting a partial and moral existence to the physical and independent existence we have all received from nature; in a word, he must take from man his own strength, to give him powers which are foreign to him, and which he cannot make use of without the assistance of others. The more dead and annihilated these natural powers are, the more great and durable are the acquired, and the institution is more lasting and perfect; so that, if every citizen is nothing of himself, and can do nothing except through all the others, and the acquired force is equal through the whole, or superior to the sum of the natural strength of all the individuals, it may be said, that the legislature is arrived at the greatest height of perfection it can possibly attain.

If it is true, that a great prince is uncommon, what must a great legislator be? The first has only to follow the model the other has designed. The one is the mechanic who invents the machine; the other the workman only, who erects and puts it in motion.

The ancient legislators placed their decisions in the mouths of their gods, to draw by the divine authority those whom human prudence could not move. But every man is not capable of making the gods speak, nor of making himself believed, when he declares himself their interpreter. The noble soul of the legislator, is the true miracle which proves his mission. Any one may grave tables of stone, purchase an oracle, to feign a secret commerce with some divinity; teach a bird to speak in his ear, or find other gross means to impose upon the people. He who knows no more than this, may assemble by accident a band of mad-men, but will never found an empire, and his extravagance will soon perish with him. Vain impostures form a transient band only; it is wisdom alone which renders it durable. The Judaic-law, and that of the son of Ishmael, which, for upwards of ten ages, has ruled half the world, proclaim, even at present, the great men who dictated them; and, while proud philosophy, or blind party spirit, sees them in the light of happy impostors only, the true politician admires, in their institutions, that great and powerful genius which presides over lasting establishments.

A people never becomes famous, till its legislature begins to decline. We are ignorant during how many ages the laws of Lycurgus made the Spartans happy, before they came to be talked of in the rest of Greece.

On Gratitude.

GRATITUDE is ever the expression of the heart; it is that virtue which binds the son to the father, the subject to the king, the friend to his friend; that forms, in short, the sweetest accord, the most charming harmony between the constituent members of society. This sentiment was never the work of art. Heaven assigned it to some privileged souls; and such a precious gift should always be preferred to all the other presents celestial goodness may confer.

Ye, who never received a benefit, without graving it on your hearts, envy not to the ungrateful the riches, honours and pleasures they may enjoy! Born with that sensibility of soul, ye retain a more valuable advantage, ye possess one of the sources of true happiness! I shall say then, happy the beneficent heart, happy the man that gives with generosity, but still more happy the grateful heart, happy he that receives with gratitude. Both have inalienable rights to the esteem and friendship of thinking and feeling man. If beneficence be an assured mark of an enlarged soul, gratitude is a certain proof of its elevation. Both sentiments are founded on grandeur and nobleness of heart. Let us therefore be not surprised, if the greatest men, if they whose paths were always straight towards heroism, were also the most sensible of services done them.

Pyrrhus, Alexander, and Alphonso, king of Arragon and Sicily, reputed it their greatest glory never to forget a benefit: even animals, as lions, horses, elephants, whose instinct inspires them with most grandeur, are also the most grateful. The earth makes a return in profusion of her treasures in favour of those who have lent her but a few seeds. Rivers carry, in great waves to the sea, the waters they have received in slight vapours; and thus hearts, truly grateful, never suffer themselves to be conquered in generosity: they would sacrifice whatever is dearest to them, even their lives for those who have obliged them. Of this we have a notable example in Thuanus's History of his time,

In 1594, Marshal D'Aumont took Crozon in Brittany from the Leaguers. He had given orders for putting all the Spaniards of the garrison to the sword. Notwithstanding the penalty of death decreed against those who should not execute the general's orders, an English soldier had saved one of the Spaniards. The English soldier, brought for so doing before the council of war, acknowledged the fact, and added, he was willing to die, provided the Spaniard had his life granted him.

The marshal surprized, asked why he interested himself so much in saving him? Because, answered he, on a like occasion, he once saved my life, and gratitude requires I should now save his, at the expence of my own. The marshal, charmed with the Englishman's goodness of heart, granted him his life with that of the Spaniard, passed many commendations upon them, and made them a handsome gratification.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

DEAR SIR,

If the following Extract from a Sermon on Jonah, Chap. 3. ix. composed by the Rev. John Pick, Rector and Vicar of the Parish of Fethagh, and Diocese of Ossory, for the 13th of December, 1776, merits a Place in your entertaining Magazine, its Publication will oblige your most obedient Servant, COMITATUS KILKINIENSIS.

"THIS day is appointed by government as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. Never was such an appointment more necessary than in the present posture of our affairs. The empire of Great Britain is shaken to its very foundation by the unnatural rebellion of America. The commercial interests of the nation sustain a most alarming diminution, in consequence of such disputes. That monopoly of trade which England enjoyed on the most beneficial terms, is converted into another channel; our most perfidious and unnatural enemies the French and Spaniards have deprived us of our birth-right; bankruptcies innumerable are occasioned by the capture of our ships; intire families are reduced from the most affluent circumstances to a state of beggary and dependance; the annual profits of the crown have decreased; the dignity of the parent state is trampled under foot; an whole continent is in danger of being totally lost; the West-India islands are in a most distressed situation for want of the common necessaries of life, their usual supplies from America being discontinued, on account of their attachment to government, the wide Atlantic is to be traversed to procure for them an uncertain relief of their respective wants.

"Add to this the great expence of blood and treasure for bringing the colonies under subjection; the defenceless condition of those kingdoms; the formidable armament both by sea and land of the greatest powers of Europe against us, France, Spain, Denmark, Sweden, Sardinia, Naples, Genoa, Iuscany

Tuscany, Austria, and Bavaria—all conspiring, by every possible means, to strengthen the family-compact of the house of Bourbon.

“An unpopular ad———n; a discontented people; vice triumphant; virtue in chains; religion despised; its professors ridiculed; crowded play-houses; thin churches; blind watchmen; a deluded multitude.

“Luxury, that bane of every state, seems to have attained to the highest summit of elevation; adultery, fornication, with all concomitant inconveniences, overspread the land; duelling, so inconsistent with the divine precepts of our most holy religion, is daily committed in conformity to the rules of honor; suicide, a crime of the first magnitude, too frequently happens in violation of the first law of nature. I should be glad, that I had not an opportunity of adding to the black catalogue that sin which was the immediate forerunner of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

“Finally, oppression, injustice, drunkenness, robberies, murders, and the blasphemous use of oaths in common conversation, seem in a manner to develope Mr. Locke's great mystery, (as he terms it) in politics—‘A government without laws, inconceivable to human capacity, and inconsistent with human society.’

And so he goes on——“Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord? shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?

“This is a faithful picture, and no exaggerated description or caricature of the present times. The measure of iniquity is nearly full. The judgments of the Almighty are pendent over our heads.

“All the kingdoms of the earth are the Lord's. He giveth them when and to whomsoever he will. His power in the disposing of nations is as absolute, as clay in the hands of the potter.

Again——“At what instant, says God, I shall speak concerning a nation and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it; if that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.

“Here is a most gracious declaration of mercy on the part of God; a plenitude of forgiveness; an exemption from punishment, on condition of a sincere and immediate repentance.

“If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil. What a source of exultation arises in the heart from so divine a sentence. A reformation of behaviour changes the purposes of the Almighty. The laws of heaven are not like those of the Medes and Persians, irreversible. A renovation of manners produces a change of measures.

Again——“How powerful a consideration this to induce us to walk humbly with God! The welfare of our country, the preservation of our families, together with the duty we owe to succeeding generations, call upon us this day for the warmest expressions of humiliation, the most sincere resolutions of amendment, and a sympathetic concern for the distressed.

“By a conscientious discharge of so awful an act of religion, the anger of the Lord will be alleviated, the intestine commotions of the British empire will subside, and we shall again become a flourishing and prosperous nation.

“The Ninevites experienced the pleasing consequences of such a conduct. ‘God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way, and God repented of the evil that he had said that he would do unto them, and he did it not.’

“In like manner we may reasonably expect a similar reverse of circumstances, if our future behaviour bears any similitude to theirs.

Again——“If our humiliation this day be confined merely to exhorting; if our hearts and tongues do not vigorously correspond together; if we fast merely for strife and debate, in place of real holiness and sanctity of life; we need not wonder at our prayers being rejected.—

“Wherefore have we fasted, (may we then say) and thou seest not? Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge.’

“Behold, God will answer, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness. Ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high. Is it such a fast that I have chosen, a day for a man to afflict his soul. Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him. Wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?

“Is not this the fast that I have chosen! to loose the bonds of wickedness, to undo the heavy burden, to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, to bring the poor that are cast out to thy house, when thou seest the naked that thou cover him, and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh.’

“Wash ye: make you clean: put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes: cease to do evil: learn to do well: seek judgment: relieve the oppressed: judge the fatherless: plead for the widow:

come now, and let us reason together, (saith the Lord): Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer: Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, here I am. Then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon-day.'

In the conclusion he says, "We are hitherto preserved by the gracious providence of God from destruction. Our mighty Deliverer, in all dangers and difficulties, is still at hand to protect us. He has often spared us when we justly merited the severest marks of his displeasure. When our pure religion, and most valuable civil privileges have been on the brink of ruin, from the secret conspiracies and open attempts of our faithless enemies, the supreme Disposer of all events has always interposed in our behalf, by which means their wicked stratagems have been defeated, and their most sanguine expectations of success have come to nought. Happy shall we be, if we retain a grateful sense of such invaluable blessings. By a religious improvement under them, the Almighty will still be induced to perpetuate, on similar occasions, similar acts of mercy and deliverance.

"For this end, may he be pleased to prosper and defend, with his especial favour, our most gracious Sovereign King George, with all the Royal Family. May the terror of his arms add dignity to his crown, and bring safety, joy, and happiness to himself, and his kingdoms. May the civil dissensions of the British empire be speedily terminated by an honourable and permanent reconciliation. May our unhappy fellow-subjects in America, having a true sense of their ingratitude for the many blessings of thy providence preserved to them, by the indulgent care and protection of Great Britain, again return to their duty, and be restored to the happy condition of being free subjects of a free state, under which heretofore they flourished so long, and prospered so much. May the hearts of the authors of these calamities be converted from the error of their ways. Finally, grant us, O Lord, in the mean time, not only strength and courage to withstand them, but charity to forgive and pity them, to shew a willingness to receive them again as friends and brethren, upon just and reasonable terms, and to treat them with mercy and kindness for the sake of thy Son Jesus Christ, &c."

The Lady's full Dress according to the present Fashion at Court.

THIS dress is commonly called a Robe de Cour, but more properly, the Royal Robe, because her majesty generally appears in this dress. It consists of a close body, without pleats or robings; and a train descending from the waist, two and a half, or three yards long, and containing two breadths of silk. The Queen's train is generally borne by a page; the rest of the ladies, when they dance minuets, let it down; but for country dances, and at other times, they loop it up to the left side of the hoop by a button and loop, at the end of which is a large tassel. A girdle fastened on, is worn round the waist. The ornaments and trimming, as well as the girdle, are all subject to fancy, some ladies preferring gold and silver—others, gauze and artificial flowers—and others again, the same silk as the robe. The stays are cut low before, and shaped like a heart. The hoop is French, resembling the shape of a bell, and extending its dimensions large at the bottom.

Gold and silver brocades, tiffues, satins, and other rich silks of various colours are worn; but the Couleur de Puce, or flea colour, and the couleur de Noix, or nut colour, are the reigning winter taste, independent of gold and silver brocades.

The external covering of the cap is made either of nett gauze, or valenciennes gauze, puckered over high wires; the front is pleated with a double edged blond: the chief ornaments observed to pass in serpentine form over it, are pleated blond with silver spangles down the middle—and white ribbon edged with narrow double edged blond interspersed with spangles—small flowers, chiefly pink and white, some resembling may blossoms, are placed here and there, and one large bunch of flowers on the left side. A large bow of broad ribbon, dotted with spangles, is fastened to the middle behind, and near each extremity the lapets are placed. The lappets are made of fine blond or net gauze, bell fashion, edged with spangles—they are from half an ell to three quarters of a yard in length; and from the center of the last bell descends a silver tassel. N. B. The same in gold, if the spangles are gold.—The tippet consists of two rows of the same lace as the cap, pleated and ornamented with spangles along the middle of the plaits—the inner row is fastened round the neck of the robe—the outer is either drawn close round, or left more loose and waving, and the ends are secured in a bow, on the left, or right side, or in the middle, as fancy directs,

The ruffles are treble, the same as for many years, except being more pointed.—The fans are chiefly white or coloured gauze, or silk ornamented with spangles.

The

The shoes are embroidered from the toe down the center to the buckle; and the buckle is either a double lover's knot with a rose in the middle, and two short tassels descending from it—or a large Artois buckle, which goes quite over the instep, being bent to the shape of the foot; but as this fashion is very expensive, even in silver, the lover's knot is preferred in jewelry.

Gold beads, set round with small-pearls, and drop ear-rings of the same, are much in vogue; but the quantity, disposition, and kind of jewels, depend much on the inclination of the wearer.

Description of the fashionable undress for Gentlemen.

The sleeve is called a la Dauphin. The dauphin's cuff, the buttons of the breast are as large as half a crown, and all the small shell and oval buttons are entirely gone out; the frock is lapelled, and there are no pockets on the outside, they being made in the lining. The waistcoat is double breasted, and made of a new manufactory in Spitalfields, called Velour de Dauphin: the dauphin's velvet. It is striped in very small stripes of different colours: the flea colour and orange is the most fashionable, and some edge the waistcoat with fur. Quilted satins, edged with fur, are likewise worn; and these again are ornamented in tambour work, in gold, silver and colours.

Flea colour, sage, called Queens's dark olive, and damson colour cloths are the fashion for the frocks; and many wear striped ratteens, made in the west of England, but called Dutch. The breeches the same as the coat, or else black silk made to fit loose.

The horseman's, or French loose great coat, is worn, with a large cape.

Thoughts on Ceremonies; and, an Introduction to Essays on Politeness, the latter Translated from the French.

THERE are few things which in the present age, are more necessary for a man's passing with success through life, than a proper attention to the articles of Ceremony and Politeness, which are now become of such real consequence in the civilised nations of Europe, that even business cannot be expedited without them; at the same time it is worth remarking, that of the number of those professing politeness, there are many who mistake its design; there are likewise empirics in this as well as in other professions; persons who pretend to teach what they do not themselves understand; and hence an uneasy stiffness sometimes takes the place of ceremony, while constraint and affectation take the place of true politeness.

Politeness is in some measure as old as civilisation itself, being ever to be found in some degree in all civilised nations,—though the Europeans have seemed as it were ambitious of monopolising it to themselves. This politeness has in general its foundation in humanity, though in its various branches it has many appendages, that seem to have little relation to its first principle. But ceremonies have another origin.—These were probably first used in religion, till from a sort of corruption, people began at length to pay to great men that adoration originally yielded only to the Gods, and sometimes to the priests, supposed their delegates.—Hence, doubtless, first arose those prostrations used before monarchs and princes in the eastern countries, and that knee tribute still paid to kings in our own,—the very manner of which, is such as shews them to have been originally intended for a much higher being.—It is curious enough indeed to trace the names betokening respect, which bear the same marks of an higher original. Such are the words, lord, sovereign, &c. which in some languages have been and still are indiscriminately applied to earthly rulers, and to the powers above. In effect, most ceremonies have originated with idolatry, and have been received, with great self-complacence, by such as affected to deem themselves demi-gods; from these they have descended to their successors, and have frequently been multiplied.—And hence it was that the Gentiles called their rulers, lords. In process of time, the origin of those ceremonies was lost, but the ceremonies themselves continued, and are likely at this day to increase, though on a plan far different from that to which they owed their former institution.

From the first principles of ceremonies, it will not be wondered at, that they were never returned by the objects to whom they were paid. It was not to be expected from a celestial power to whom adoration was due, a graven image could not, and a king affecting to be a god upon earth, would not return it. Hence, these marks of respect have seldom been returned. To this moment, the principal of them are not, that of bowing excepted which is a sort of half prostration variously practised, in various countries, but which among us is now descended from a solemn ceremony, to a piece of common politeness, which even monarchs, condescend to return to their subjects.

In the eastern countries this ceremony of bowing is performed more solemnly than in Europe, being a graceful motion of

of the hand to the head, and a lower and more reverent inflexion of the body, than our dancing masters prescribe; while, on the other hand, that token of respect, expressed by us of uncovering the head is not practised, and the reason undoubtedly is, because it is not deemed such a sign of respect with them, as it is with European nations; but it has descended to persons of inferior note, and will probably at last become a mark of reciprocal politeness as well in India and Persia as in Europe.

So much for prostration, bowing and kneeling, which seem to have been the first ceremonies used either to gods or men.—Others, whether civil or religious, have been generally adapted to the particular customs of countries.—But the increase of them among the nations of the Western world has been great, and generally kept pace with their progress in politeness, with which (though formerly, as has been shewn, of different origin) they are now become connected.—There is however still a difference preserved between the common ceremonies which pass between man and man, and what are called the ceremonials of a court, where the characters of men are distinguished by rank, and precedence.—A knowledge of this etiquette is absolutely necessary to those who are in high life, in particular to such as travel; and as it has been justly observed, an envoy at a foreign court, by neglecting these, may sometimes retard even the material business of the state.

The ceremonies necessary in genteel assemblies, though not so strict, are yet in many respects imitative of those which prevail in courts, whereby a certain regularity is established, without which even diversions cannot at this time be carried on agreeably.—Among private companies somewhat less of these ceremonies is found to prevail, only enough of them being retained to favour urbanity, and to prevent confusion.—As to the ceremonies of religion, in our day, and country, they are of a sort so different, and adapted with so much propriety to the solemn service of which they constitute a part, that there will always be a proper distinction between them and such as are the appendages of politeness. Those which relate to courts of law and justice, and the great assemblies of the nation, are also distinct and well calculated to inspire a reverence for those august assemblies, which without them, might be subject to interruptions in the course of the business brought before them, and might besides, lose some of their dignity in the eyes of the people.

With regard to politeness, having already premised, that it is in effect founded on humanity, and consequently of as old a date as civilisation itself, it will not be expected, that we should trace it through all the mazes of antiquity.—There was a species of politeness existing among the Phœnicians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, Persians, and Egyptians.—Among the Greeks, the Athenians boasted highly of theirs.—The Romans laid a strong claim to politeness, from the time of the Consul to the Augustan age; and if the refinements of luxury, were to be taken as evidence, we might conclude that it increased in a great degree among these people, till the decline of the Eastern and Western empires; periods at which the conquests of the Goths, on the one hand, and those of the Saracens, on the other, put an end to all those refinements, and with a new form of government, introduced new customs and manners among the subjected nations.—Those of the Saracens, and afterwards of the race of Othman, had something of a peculiar nature.—Being of a haughty disposition, their politeness, such as it was, was distinguished like their ceremonies, by gravity and a kind of solemn grimace in their gestures, and a sort of insipid courteousness in their behaviour. In the Western world, every one knows that to an age of military horrors, the annals of which are stained with dreadful wars, bloody massacres and unnatural deeds, succeeded one of profound ignorance, as to the arts, which however, was distinguished by a peculiar kind of politeness, to which the extravagant regard of the men of any rank, or consideration for females, certainly gave birth. Women indeed, may at all times be considered as having given rise to all that part of politeness, which is not connected with solemn ceremonies, and unreturned obedience.—But, in the age we are now speaking of, they were more remarkable than ever for the formation of the manners of men, which as they still retained their first military principles, by this mixture, became perfectly romantic. And hence war and politeness as it were went hand in hand, and acted in concert to form the manners of that age of chivalry. The oppression of the great feudal lords rendering it necessary, that some should stand forth to chastise a set of tyrants, who held themselves accountable to no laws, amenable to no courts of justice, the number of knights was augmented by a species of them called, errant or wandering, because they went about righting the injured, and relieving distressed damsels. These were the very cream and flower of courtesy, and tended greatly to reform the age they lived in.—And these institutions certainly in some measure measure, imperfect as they were, laid the foundation of that politeness, which after undergoing various changes, is become the boast of the refined nations of Europe.

(To be continued in our next.)

To the Editors of the Hibernian Magazine.

GENTLEMEN,

I Was the second son of a wealthy gentleman, who reserved the bulk of his fortune for my elder brother, so that the only provision I enjoyed was, a tolerable education, and a commission in the army: but being soon weary of a soldier's life, I sold out at the commencement of the present American war, and though my fortune arising from that sale was but inconsiderable, I pleased myself with the idea of independence, and determined to enjoy it by living within my income. Take away such a determination, and there can be no true independence in the most affluent circumstances.

As my father had by this time resigned his breath, I had no parental home to which I could retire; and therefore set up my rest in a country town, where I had been formerly quartered with my regiment, and made some agreeable acquaintances. There I passed my time according to my heart's desire. I fished, fowled, and hunted with the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who entertained me in their houses with the most cordial hospitality. I walked, I chatted, I danced, and played at cards with their wives and daughters. Delightful excursions, and amusing parties of pleasure were planned and executed every day. The time stole away insensibly: I knew no care; I felt no disorder; I inherited from nature a vigorous constitution, a happy serenity of temper, and was distinguished among my friends as the best humoured fellow in the world.

In the midst of these enjoyments my heart was touched by the amiable qualities of a young lady, who was content to unite her fate with mine, contrary to the inclination, and without the consent of her father, who possessed a very large fortune, and resented her marriage with such perseverance of indignation, that he never would admit her into his presence; nor even at his death, forgave her for the step she had taken. His displeasure, however, affected us the less, as we found happiness in our mutual passion, and knew no wants; for my wife inherited from an aunt, a legacy of eighteen hundred pounds, the interest of which, together with my little income, was sufficient to answer all our occasions.

We found great satisfaction in contriv-

ing plans for living snug upon our income, and enjoyed unspeakable pleasure in executing the scheme to which we had given the preference. Chance presented us with an opportunity to purchase a small, though neat and convenient house, with about twenty acres of land, in an agreeable rural situation; and there our time was parcelled out in a succession of tasks, for improving a large farm that we rented, and cultivating a sweet little garden, laid out on a gentle slope, the foot of which was watered by a branching rivulet of pure, transparent water. Although heaven had not thought proper to indulge us with children, we were favoured with every other substantial blessing; and every other circumstance of rural œconomy, proved a source of wealth and satisfaction.

The labours of the field, the little domestic cares of the barn-yard, the poultry yard, and the dairy, were productive of such delights as none of your readers will conceive, except those who are enamoured of a country life.—I cannot remember those peaceful scenes of innocence and tranquility without regret; they often haunt my imagination, like the ghost of departed happiness. Within the bosom of this charming retreat we lived, in a state of uninterrupted enjoyment, until our felicity was invaded by two unexpected events, at which, I am afraid, we shall always have cause to repine. My nephew, who had succeeded to my father's estate, died of the small-pox; and a few weeks after this incident, my wife's only brother broke his neck in leaping a five barred gate; so that we found ourselves, all at once, in possession of a very opulent fortune, and violently transported from that element, for which our tempers had been so well adapted.

In the first flutter and agitation of mind, occasioned by this unhop'd for accession, we quitted our romantic solitude, and rushed into all the pageantry of high life. Thus irresistibly sucked within the vortex of dissipation, we grew giddy in a rapid whirl of unnatural diversions; we became enamoured of tinsel liveries, equipage, and all the frippery of fashion. Instead of tranquility, health, a continued flow of satisfaction, and a succession of rational delights, which we formerly derived from temperance, exercise, the study of nature, and the practice of benevolence, we now tasted no pleasure but what consists in the gratification of idle vanity, tossed for ever on a sea of absurd amusements, by such loud storms of riot and tumult, as drowned the voice of reason and reflection, and overwhelmed all the best faculties of the soul. We deserted nature, sentiment, and true taste, to lead a weary life of affectation, folly, and intemperance: our senses became so depraved, that our eyes were captivated with glare and glitter, and our ears with noise and clamour; while our fancy dwelt with pleasure on every gewgaw of gothic extravagance. We entertained guests whom we despised; we visited friends whom we did not love, and invited company whom we could not esteem. We drank wines that we could not relish, and ate victuals which we could not digest. We frequented concerts which we did not understand, plays that we did not like, and public diversions which we could not enjoy. Our house might have been termed the Temple of Uproar. Card tables were the shrines, and the votaries seemed agitated by the demons of envy, spite, rage, vexation, and despair. In a word—all was farce and form. All was a phantasm, and a hideous dream of incoherent absurdities.

These pleasures, like brandy to a dram-drinker, have lost their effect; we have waked from the intoxication, to a due sense of our miserable condition; for the vigour both of mind and body is quite impaired. With respect to each other, we find ourselves in a state of mutual disgust; and all the enjoyments of life we either taste with indifference, or reject with loathing. For my own part, I am overwhelmed with what the French call l'ennui, a distemper for which there is no name in the English language; a distemper which may be understood from the following lines of the poet—

Thee, too, my Paridel, she saw thee there,
Stretch'd on the rack of a too easy chair;
And heard thy everlasting yawn confess,
The pains and penalties of idleness.

It is not a common vacancy of thought, or an ordinary languor of the nerves, that I labour under, but a confirmed imbecility of mind, and a want of relish, attended with a thousand uneasinesses, which render life almost insupportable. I sleep without refreshment; I am fatigued without labour; I am scarce risen when I wish the day was done; and when night comes, I long for morning. I eat without appetite, and drink without exhilaration: exercise afford no spirits; conversation no amusement; reading no entertainment, and diversion no pleasure. It is not from affectation, but an acquired insensibility, that I see Falstaff without a smile, and the Orphan without emotion. I endeavour to kill the time by shifting continually the scene of dissipation, but I am close pursued by disgust: ail is disappointment, insipid, nauseous, or shocking. My temper is grown so fretful and peevish, that I quarrel by turns with my servants and myself even she, who was once the delight of my eyes, and the joy of my heart, is now become the subject of perpetual disquiet. I harbour wishes which I dare not approve: my heart palpitates with passions which I am ashamed to avow. I am tormented by a thousand petty grievances, which rise, like angry pimples, from the ebullitions of a soured disposition; and incidents that would move the mirth of other men, are to me productive of choler and anxiety.

If you have any recipe for the cure of my disorder, it will be charity to publish it for the benefit of many thousands that labour under the same malady, which now afflicts,

Your humble servant,

RICHARD RESTLESS.

* * * The distemper of our correspondence is very common among the great, and may be termed a scurvy of the spirits. Exercise is as necessary to the mind as to the body; and a mental exercise consists in study and reflection: this being long disused, the powers of reason lose their tone, and a relaxation of the nerves from idleness and surfeit, co-operating with this languor, the whole machine is, as it were, unstrung: all the faculties being thus untwisted, and out of tune, the mind jars on every string, and nothing can be produced but discord and disquiet. If Mr. Restless and his lady are really determined, if possible, to obtain a radical cure, and retrieve their good humour, let them make over to their next heirs, the great estates which devolved to them so unexpectedly, and return to the farm with the same necessities which their own industry had before so happily supplied. Should this be an effort of self denial, beyond the pitch of their resolution, we would advise them to renounce their fashionable connections, and endeavour to contract friendship with a few rational creatures; to dismiss their superfluous servants, including the French cook, and every gaudy appurtenance of ostentation, to retire from town, and engage in the avocations of husbandry; to use the cold bath every morning, to ride twenty miles every day before dinner, to eat moderately of plain food, to go to bed by eleven, to rise before eight, and to fast every day in the week, until their appetites are perfectly restored.

Curious Anecdotes.

LORD Polingbroke said that Lord Oxford had often told him, that he had seen, and had in his hand, an original letter that King Charles I. wrote to the Queen, in answer to one of her's that had been been intercepted, and then forwarded to him; wherein the reproached him for "having made those villains too great concessions," (viz. that Cromwell should be lord lieutenant of Ireland for life without account, for that kingdom should be in the hands of the party, with an army there kept, which should know no head but the lieutenant; that Cromwell should have a garter, &c.) and that in this letter of the King's, it was said, "That she should leave him to manage, who was better informed of all circumstances than she could be; but that she might be entirely easy as to whatever concessions he should make them, for that he should know in due time how to deal with the rogues, who, instead of a silken garter, should be fitted with an hempen cord." So the letter ended; which answer, as they waited for, so they intercepted accordingly, and it determined his fate. This letter Lord Oxford said he had offered 500*l.* for.

VESPASIAN said, "a prince ought to die standing" and died as he was making an effort to rise and dress; and Hadrian said, that "a prince should die in perfect health, and not languish." (Sueton. in Vit. c. ult.) Sanum principem mori debere, non debilem. "The great Condé could not bear the thoughts of dying in his bed, and was quite in a passion that he should not be killed in the field." Spartian. in Ælio Vero, c. 6. I believe the case was, when it came to the point, he was vexed that he was to die at all; as Sir Godfrey Kneller said to Mr. Pope, who was sitting by his bed-side, and seeing him so impatient at the thoughts of going, had told him "he had been a very good man, and no doubt would go to a much better place:" "Ah, my good friend Mr. Pope, I wish God would let me stay at Whittington," which was his country seat that he was very fond of. He was not for making the same error as the gentleman in Misson, who died of taking physic, and had put on his monument, Stavo bene, ma, per star meglio, sto qui. Sir Godfrey was for keeping well when he was so: and so are most people, however assured of the other's being better.

PERHAPS no one ever died more truly calm and unconcerned than Dr. Pellet, a good and worthy man, and beloved by all men! who, expecting every moment would be his last, sat himself in his easy chair to read Terence, till this moment came, and died with the book in his hand.

If any did, it was another physician, Dr. Harvey, who waking one morning, called his servant, and asked him, 'what it was o'clock,' and 'how long it would be before it was light?' When his servant told him, 'it was broad day,' he only ordered him to fetch a little vial on such a shelf, and drank it off, and, lying down again, went to rest, from which he was never to rise. He found, what he had long apprehended, that he had lost his sight, and had determined to have done with living whenever that happened.

IN the court of Otho III. emperor of Germany in the tenth century, the empress, Mary of Arragon, fell in love with a count, a young and handsome nobleman, who withstood her solicitations; at which she was so enraged, that (the old way) she accused him to the emperor of attempting on her what she had attempted on him. Otho (according to custom in these cases) believed all; and, without hearing him, (or rather he himself refusing to plead his innocence, in order to save the honour of the empress, as some say) ordered him to be beheaded. Yet he assured his countess, as he was stretching out his neck to the executioner, that he was innocent, and withal told her the whole truth. She went straight to the emperor, who was hearing causes in public, as was the way of those times, in the open plain of Placentia, and aloud called for 'justice on the murderer of her husband.' Otho was drawn in; he promised it in the face of the world; when she, taking her husband's head from a servant who brought it concealed, held it up, and cried, 'it is you yourself who have murdered the good count my husband, by rashly taking the word of an infamous wife;' and, proving it to his satisfaction and that of all present, boldly demanded his own head, according to his solemn and public promise. The emperor confessed the guilt and forfeit, but demurred as to the payment; at length, after many and long contests, the countess contented herself with the death of the empress, whom the emperor generously gave her up, (husband or wife, it was the same thing to justice) and to make her some amends for the loss of her husband, ordered his empress, instead of being only beheaded, to be burnt alive. This was executed at Modena, ann. 998. Maimbourg Hist. de la Decadence de l'Empire. See also Moreri, art. Marie de Arragon.

The Origin of Printing.

A short Essay has lately appeared, intitled the Origin of Printing, which, though not pretended to be a complete History of the Rise of that Art, gives a clearer Account of it than any Treat published in our Language. It contains, in as concise a Manner as possible, the Substance of the Origines Typographicae of the very learned and ingenious M. Gerard Meerman, Penfionary of Rotterdam; and may be considered as the Out-lines of that curious Publication, with supplementary Notes on some interesting Particulars. Mr. Meerman very clearly fixes the first Rudiments of the Art to Laurentius, at Haerlem; the Improvement of it to Geinsfleisch, senior, and his Brother Gutterburg, Anglice Good-bill (assisted by the Liberality of John Fust) at Mentz; and the Completion of the whole to Peter Schoeffer, in the same City. The Claim of Strasburgh is considered, and evidently overthrown. The following Account of the first Printer, will, we make no doubt, be acceptable to the curious Reader.

THE first testimony of the inventor is that recorded by Hadrian Junius, in his Batavia, p. 253, ed. Lugd. Bat. 1588; which, though it hath been rejected by many, is of undoubted authority. Junius had the relation from two reputable men; Nicolaus Galius, who was his schoolmaster; and Quirinius Talefius, his intimate and correspondent. He ascribes it to Laurentius the son of John (Æditius, or Custos, of the cathedral at Harleim, at that time a respectable office), upon the testimony of Cornelius, sometime a servant to Laurentius, and afterwards bookbinder to the cathedral, an office which had before been performed by Franciscan Friars. His narrative was thus: 'That, walking in a wood near the city (as the citizens of opulence used to do) he began at first to cut some letters upon the rind of a beech-tree; which, for fancy's sake, being impressed on paper, he printed one or two lines, as a specimen for his grandchildren (the sons of his daughter) to follow. This having happily succeeded, he meditated greater things (as he was a man of ingenuity and judgment) and first of all with his son-in-law Thomas Peter (who, by the way, left three sons, who all attained the consular dignity) invented a more glutinous writing-ink, because he found the common ink sunk and spread; and then formed whole pages of wood, with letters cut upon them; of which sort I have seen some essays, in an anonymous work, printed only on one side, intitled, 'Speculum nostræ salutis;' in which it is remarkable, that in the infancy of printing (as nothing is complete at its first invention) the back sides of the pages were pasted together, that they might not by their nakedness betray their deformity. These beechen letters he afterwards changed for leaden ones, and these again for a mixture of tin and lead [stanneas] as a less flexible and more solid and durable substance. Of the remains of which types, when they were turned to waste metal, those old wine pots were cast, that are still preserved in the family-house which looks into the market-place, inhabited afterwards by his great-grand-son Gerard Thomas, a gentleman of reputation; whom I mention for the honour of the family, and who died only a few years since. A new invention never fails to engage curiosity. And when a commodity never before seen excited purchasers, to the advantage of the inventor; the admiration of the art increased, dependents were enlarged, and workmen multiplied, the first calamitous incident! Among these was one John Fustus. This man, bound by oath to keep the secret of printing, when he thought he had learned the art of joining the letters, the method of casting the types, and other things of that nature, taking the most convenient time that was possible, on Christmas-eve, when every one was customarily employed in lustful sacrifices, seizes the collection of types, and all the implements his master had got together, and, with one accomplice, marches off to Amsterdam, thence to Cologne, and at last settled at Mentz, as at an asylum of security, where he might go to work with the tools he had stolen. It is certain that in a year's time, viz. in 1442, the Doctrinale of Alexander Gallus, which was a grammar much used at that time, together with the tracts of Peter of Spain, came forth there, from the same types as Laurentius had made use of at Harleim.'

Thus far the narrative of Junius, which he had frequently heard from Nicolaus Gallus, to whom it was related by Cornelius himself, who lived to a great age, and used to burst into tears upon reflecting on the loss his master had sustained, not only in his substance, but in his honour, by the roguery of this servant, his former associate and bedfellow. Cornelius, as appears by the registers of Harleim Cathedral, died either in 1513, or the beginning of the following year; so that he might very well give this information to Nicolaus Gallus, who was school-master to Hadrian Junius.

Junius was however mistaken with respect to John Fustus, for he was a wealthy man, who indeed assisted the first Printers at Mentz with money; and, though he afterwards was proprietor of a printing-office, yet he never, as far as appears, performed performed any part of the business with his own hands; and consequently he could never have been a servant to Laurentius.

All things being fully considered, it appears, that John Geinsfleisch, senior, was the dishonest person, who was born at Mentz, and afterwards worked with Laurentius, at Harleim, from whence he returned to his native place, and printed several books in the year 1452, and improved the wooden types used by his master in 1450, by casting metal ones.

These types were further improved by Peter Schoeffer, who was servant to Fustus, and who afterwards married his daughter, Fustus and Schoeffer concealed this new improvement, by administering an oath of secrecy to all whom they intrusted, till the year 1462, when, by the dispersion of their servants into different countries at the sacking of Mentz by the Archbishop Adolphus, the invention was publicly divulged.

The Life of Thomas Britton, the celebrated Musical Small-Coal Man. [From the Works of Mr. Hearne, and the History of Music by Sir John Hawkins.]

MR. THOMAS BRITTON, the famous Musical small-coal-man, was born at or near Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonshire. From thence he went to London, where he bound himself apprentice to a small-coal-man, in St. John Baptist's street. After he had served his full time of seven years, his master gave him a sum of money not to set up. Upon this Tom went to Northamptonshire again, and, after he had spent his money, he returned again to London, set up the small-coal trade (notwithstanding the master was still living) and, withal, he took a stable, and turned it into a house, which stood the next door to the little gate of St. John's of Jerusalem next Clerkenwell Green. Some time after he had settled here, he became acquainted with Dr. Garenciers, his near neighbour; by which means he became an excellent chymist, and, perhaps, performed such things in that profession, as had never been done before, with little cost and charge, by the help of a moving laboratory, that was contrived and built by himself, which was much admired by all of that faculty, that happened to see it; inasmuch that a certain gentleman of Wales was so much taken with it, that he was at the expence of carrying him down into that country, on purpose to build him such another, which Tom performed to the gentleman's very great satisfaction, and for the same he received of him a very handsome and generous gratuity. Besides his great skill in chymistry, he was as famous for his knowledge in the theory of music; in the practic part of which faculty he was likewise very considerable. He was so much addicted to it, that he pricked with his own hand (very neatly and accurately) and left behind him a valuable collection of Music, mostly pricked by himself, which was sold upon his death for near an hundred pounds, not to mention the excellent collection of printed books, that he also left behind him, both of chymistry and music. Besides these books that he left behind him, he had, some years before his death, sold by auction a noble collection of books, most of them in the Rosicrucian Faculty (of which he was a great admirer) whereof there is a printed catalogue extant (as there is of those that were sold after his death) which I have often looked over with no small surprise and wonder, and particularly for the great number of MSS. in the before-mentioned faculties that are specified in it. He had, moreover, a considerable collection of musical instruments, which were sold for four-score pounds upon his death, which happened in September, 1714, being upwards of threescore years of age, and lies buried in the church-yard of Clerkenwell, without monument or inscription, being attended to his grave, in a very solemn and decent manner, by a great concourse of people, especially of such as frequented the Musical Club, that was kept up for many years at his own charges (he being a man of a very generous and liberal spirit) at his own little cell. He appears by the print of him (done since his death) to have been a man of an ingenuous countenance and of a sprightly temper. It also represents him as a comely person, as indeed he was, and, withal, there is a modesty expressed in it every way agreeable to him. Under it are these verses which may serve instead of an epitaph:

Tho' mean thy rank, yet in thy humble cell

Did gentle Peace and Arts unpurchas'd dwell;

Well pleas'd Apollo thither led his train,
And music warbled in her sweetest strain.
Cyllenius so, as fables tell, and Jove,
Came willing guests to poor Philemon's grove.

Let useless pomp behold, and blush to find
So low a station, such a liberal mind.

In short, he was an extraordinary and very valuable man, much admired by the gentry, even those of the best quality, and by all others of the more inferior rank, that had any manner of regard for probity, sagacity, diligence, and humility. I say humility, because, though he was so much famed for his knowledge, and might, therefore have lived very reputably without his trade, yet he continued it to his death, not thinking it to be at all beneath him. Mr. Bagford and he used frequently to converse together, and when they met they seldom parted very soon. Their conversation was often about old MSS. and the havock made of them. They both agreed to retrieve what fragments of antiquity they could, and, upon that occasion, they would frequently divert themselves in talking of old Chronicles, which both loved to read, though among our more late Chronicles, printed in English, Isaackson's was what they chiefly preferred for a general knowledge of things, a book which was much esteemed also by those two eminent chronologers, bishop Lloyd and Mr. Dodwell. By the way, I cannot but observe, that Isaackson's Chronicle is really, for the most part, Bishop Andrews's, Isaackson being Amanuensis to the Bishop.

Hearne seems to have understood but very little of music; and we are therefore not to wonder that his curiosity extended not to an inquiry into the order and economy of that Musical Club, as he calls it, which he says Britton for many years kept up in his own little cell. The truth is, that it was nothing less than a musical concert; and so much the more does it merit our attention, as it was the first meeting of the kind, and the undoubted parent of some of the most celebrated concerts in London. The time when Britton lived is not so remote, but that there are some now living who are able to give an account of this extraordinary institution, of the principal persons who performed at his concert, and of the company that frequented it: many of these have been sought out, and conversed with, for the purpose of collecting all that could be known of him: inquiries have been made in his neighbourhood, of particulars touching his life, his character, and general deportment; and the result of these will furnish out such a supplement to what has been said of this extraordinary man in print, as can hardly fail to gratify the curiosity of such as take pleasure in this kind of information.

Of the origin of Britton's concert we have an account written by a near neighbour of his, one who dwelt in the same parish, and indeed but a small distance from him, namely, the facetious Mr. Edward Ward, the author of the London Spy, and many doggerel poems, coarse it is true, but not devoid of humour and pleasantry. Ward at that time kept a public-house in Clerkenwell, and there sold ale of his own brewing. From thence he removed to a house in an alley on the west side of Moor-fields between the place called Little Moor-fields and the end of Chiswell-street, and sold the same kind of liquor. His house, as we are given to understand by the notes on the Dunciad, was for a time the great resort of high churchmen. In a book of his writing, entitled, Satirical Reflections on Clubs, he has bestowed a whole chapter on the Small-coal-man's club: from the account therein given we learn that 'this club was first begun, or at least confirmed by Sir Roger L'Estrange, a very musical gentleman, and who had a tolerable perfection on the Bass-viol. Ward says, that 'the attachment of Sir Roger, and other ingenious gentlemen, lovers of the Muses, to Britton, arose from the profound regard that he had in general to all manner of literature: that the prudence of his deportment to his betters procured him great respect; and that men of the best wit, as well as some of the best quality honoured his musical society with their company. That Britton was so much distinguished, that, when passing the streets in his blue linen frock, and with his sack of small-coal on his back, he was frequently accosted with such expressions as these, "There goes the famous small-coal-man, who is a lover of learning, a performer of music, and a companion for gentlemen." Ward adds, and speaks of it as of his own knowledge, and indeed the fact is indisputable, that he had made a very good collection of ancient and modern music by the best masters; that he also had collected a very handsome library, which he had publicly disposed of to a very considerable advantage; and that he had remaining by him many valuable curiosities. He farther says, that, at the first institution of it, his concert was performed in his own house; but that some time after he took a convenient room out of the next to it: what sort of a house Britton's own was, and the spot where it stood, shall now be related:

It was situated on the south side of Aylebury-street, which extends from Clerkenwell-Green to St. John's-street, and was the corner house of that passage leading by the Old Jerusalem Tavern, under the gateway of the Priory, into St. John's square*: On the ground floor was a repository for small-coal: over that was the concert room, which was very long and narrow, and had a ceiling so low, that a tall man could but just stand upright in it. The stairs to this room were on the outside of the house, and could scarce be ascended without crawling. The house itself was very old and low built, and in every respect so mean, as to be a fit habitation for only a very poor man. Notwithstanding all, this mansion, despicable as it may seem, attracted to it as polite an audience as ever the opera did; and a lady of the first rank in this kingdom, now living, one of the most celebrated beauties of her time, may yet remember that, in the pleasure which she manifested at hearing Mr. Britton's concert, she seemed to have forgot the difficulty with which she ascended the steps that led to it.

Britton was in his person a short thick-set man, with a very honest, ingenuous countenance: There are two pictures of him extant, both painted by his friend Mr. Woolaston, and from both there are mezzotinto prints; one of the pictures is now in the British Museum; the occasion of painting it, as related by Mr. Woolaston himself to the author of this work, was as follows: Britton had been out one morning, and, having nearly emptied his sack in a shorter time than he expected, had a mind to see his friend Mr. Woolaston; but having always been used to consider himself in two capacities, viz. as one who subsisted by a very mean occupation, and as a companion for persons in a station of life above him, he could not consistent with this distinction, dress as he then was, make a visit; he therefore in his way home varied his usual round, and, passing through Warwick-lane, determined to cry small-coal to near Mr. Woolaston's door, as to stand a chance of being invited in by him. Accordingly, he had no sooner turned into Warwick court, and cried small-coal in his usual tone, than Mr. Woolaston, who had never heard him there before, flung up the sash and beckoned him in. After some conversation, Mr. Woolaston intimated a desire to paint his picture, which Britton modestly yielding to, Mr. Woolaston then, and at a few subsequent sittings, painted him in his blue frock, and with his small-coal measure in his hand, as he appears in the picture at the Museum. A mezzotinto print was taken from this picture, for which Mr. Hughes wrote those lines above inserted, and this is the print which Hearne speaks of. But there was another picture of him painted by the same person, upon what occasion is not known: From that a mezzotinto print was also taken. In this he is represented tuning a harpsichord, a violin hanging on the side of the room, and shelves of books before him. Under the print are the following lines:

Tho' doom'd to Small-coal, yet to Arts
ally'd,
Rich without wealth, and famous without pride;
Music's best Patron, Judge of books and men,
Belov'd and honour'd by Apollo's train;
In Greece or Rome sure never did appear
So bright a Genius, in so dark a sphere;
More of the man had artfully been sav'd,
Had Kneller painted and had Vertue grav'd.

The above verses were scribbled by Prior with a view to recommend Vertue, then a young man, and patronised by Edward, earl of Oxford, though they are little less than a sarcasm on Woolaston and Johnson. It is suspected that the insignificant adverb 'artfully' was inserted by a mistake of the transcriber, and that it originally stood 'probably'.

The account above given of Britton will naturally awaken a curiosity to know who were the persons that performed in his concert? An answer is at hand: Dr. Pepusch, and frequently Mr. Handel, played the harpsichord: Mr. Banister, and also Mr. Henry Needler of the Excise-Office, and other capital performers for that time, the first violin: Mr. John Hughes, Author of the Siege of Damascus; Mr. Woolaston, the painter; Mr. Philip Hart, Mr. Henry Symonds, Mr. Abiell Whichello, and Mr. Obadiah Shuttleworth, a fine player on the violin: some constantly and others frequently, performed there. That fine performer, Mr. Matthew Dubourg, was then but a child, but the first solo that ever he played in public, and which probably was one of Corelli's, he played at Britton's concert, standing upon a joint-stool; but so terribly was the poor child awed at the sight of so splendid an assembly, that he was nearly falling to the ground. It has been questioned whether Britton had any skill in music or not; but those who remember him say that he could tune a harpsichord, and that he frequently played the viol di gamba in his own concert.

Britton's skill in ancient books and manuscripts is mentioned by Hearne; and indeed, in his preface to his edition of Robert of Gloucester, he refers to a curious manuscript copy of that historian in Britton's possession. The means used by him and other collectors of ancient books and manuscripts about that time, as related by one of that class lately deceased, were as follows, and these include an intimation of Britton's pursuits and connections.

About the beginning of this century, a passion for collecting old books and manuscripts reigned among the nobility. The chief of those who sought after them were Edward, earl of Oxford: the earls of Pembroke, Sunderland, and Winchelsea, and the duke of Devonshire. These persons in the winter season, on Saturdays, the parliament not sitting on that day, were used to resort to the city, and, dividing themselves, took several routes, some to Little Britain, some to Moorfields, and others to different parts of the town, inhabited by booksellers: There they would inquire in the several shops as they passed along for old books and manuscripts; and some time before noon would assemble at the shop of one Christopher Bateman, a bookseller, at the corner of Ave-Maria-lane, in Pater-noster-row; and here they were frequently met by Mr. Bagford and other persons engaged in the same pursuits, and a conversation always commenced on the subject of their inquiries. Bagford informed them where any thing curious was to be seen or purchased, and they in return obliged him with a sight of what they had from time to time collected. While they were engaged in this conversation, and as near as could be to the hour of twelve by St. Paul's clock, Britton, who by that time had finished his round, arrived clad in his blue frock, and pitching his sack of small coal on the bulk of Mr. Bateman's shop window, would go in and join them; and after a conversation, which generally lasted about an hour, the noblemen above mentioned adjourned to the Mourning Bush, at Aldersgate, where they dined and spent the remainder of the day.

The singularity of his character, the course of his studies, and the collections he made, induced suspicions that Britton was not the man he seemed to be: And what Mr. Walpole says as to this particular is very true; some thought his musical assembly only a cover for seditious meetings; others for magical purposes; and that Britton himself was taken for an Atheist, a Presbyterian, a Jesuit; but these were ill-grounded conjectures, for he was a plain, simple, honest man, perfectly inoffensive, and highly esteemed by all that knew him; and, notwithstanding the meaness of his occupation, was called Mr. Britton.

The circumstances of this man's death are not less remarkable than those of his life. There dwelt in Britton's time, near Clerkenwell-clofe, a man named Robe, who frequently played at his concert, and who, being in the commission of the peace for the county of Middlesex, was usually called justice Robe; at the same time one

Samuel Honeyman, a blacksmith by trade, and who lived in Bear-street, near Leicester-square, became very famous for a faculty which he possessed of speaking as if his voice proceeded from some distant part of the house, where he stood: in short, he was one of those men called Ventriloquist, i. e. those that speak as it were from their bellies, for which reason he was called the Talking Smith: The pranks played by this man, if collected, would make a volume. During the time that Dr. Sacheverell was under censure, and had a great resort of friends to his house near the Church in Holborn, he had the confidence to get himself admitted, by pretending that he came from a couple who wished to be married by the doctor. He stayed not long in the room, but made so good use of his time, that the doctor, who was a large man, and one of the stoutest and most athletic then living, was almost terrified into fits.

This man, Robe, was foolish and wicked enough to introduce, unknown, to Britton, for the sole purpose of terrifying him, and he succeeded in it: Honeyman, without moving his lips, or seeming to speak, announced, as from afar off, the death of poor Britton within a few hours, with an intimation that the only way to avert his doom was for him to fall on his knees immediately and say the Lord's Prayer: The poor man did as he was bid, and in a few days died; leaving his friend Mr. Robe to enjoy the fruits of his mirth.

Hearne says that his death happened in September, 1714. Upon searching the parish books, it is found that he was buried on the first day of October following.

Britton's wife survived her husband. He left little behind him, besides his books, his collection of manuscript and printed music and musical instruments. The former of these were sold by auction at Tom's Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill. Sir Hans Sloane was a purchaser of sundry articles; and catalogues of them are in the hands of many collectors of such things as matters of curiosity. His music books were also sold in the month of December, in the year of his death, and produced a considerable sum for the benefit of his widow.

An Account of the celebrated Mount St. Michael, one of the celebrated State Prisons, near Granville, in France.

The following affecting narrative was transmitted in the month of August, 1775, from the ingenious Mr. Wraxall, who, at that time, was making a tour, thro' the western and southern provinces of France,

France, to one of his friends.—As there is, perhaps, no pleasure greater than that of communicating pleasure received; and as admiration is one of the most elegant and interesting sources from which it can be drawn; we usually listen with extreme readiness to any addresses made to that passion. Mr. Wraxall observes, that, though he wishes to prepare his correspondent for a recital, in which the marvellous and astonishing predominates, his pen will ever be under the guidance of truth, and proceeds to his animated description in these words:

DESIROUS to visit the celebrated 'Mount St. Michael,' I hired two horses, and set out early in the morning. It is about twenty miles from Granville, and the road lying along the sea-shore renders it very pleasant. I got to Genet, a little village, before noon. From hence it is only a league to the Mount; but, as it lies intirely across the sands, which are only passable at low tide, it becomes indispensably requisite to procure a guide. I did so, and arrived there at one in the afternoon.

This extraordinary rock—for it is no more—rises in the middle of the bay of Avranches. Nature has completely fortified one side, by its craggy and almost perpendicular descent, which renders it impracticable for courage or address, however consummate, to scale or mount it. The other parts are surrounded by walls fenced with semilunar towers in the Gothic manner; but sufficiently strong, superadded to the advantages of its situation, to despise all attack. At the foot of the mountain, begins a street or town, which winds round its base to a considerable height. Above, are chambers where prisoners of State are kept, and other buildings intended for residence; and on the summit is erected the Abbey itself, occupying a prodigious space of ground, and of a strength and solidity equal to its enormous size; since it has stood all the storms of heaven, in this elevated and exposed situation, during many centuries.—I spent the whole afternoon in the different parts of this edifice; and, as the Swiss, who conducted me through them, found he could not gratify my curiosity too minutely, he left no apartment or chamber unseen.

The 'Sale de Chevalerie,' or Knights-hall, reminded me of that at Marienbourg in Polish Prussia. It is equally spacious; but more barbarous and rude, because some hundred years prior in its erection. Here the Knights of St. Michael used to meet in solemn convocation on important occasions. They were the defenders and guardians of this Mountain and Abbey, as those of the Temple, and of St. John of Jerusalem, were to the holy Sepulchre.—At one end is a painting of the Archangel, the Patron of their order; and in this hall Louis the Eleventh first instituted, and invested with the insignia of Knighthood, the Chevaliers of the cross of St. Michael.

We passed on through several lesser rooms into a long passage, on one side of which the Swiss opened a door, and through a narrow entrance, perfectly dark, he led me, by a second door, into an apartment or dungeon—for it rather merited the latter than the former appellation—in the middle of which stood a cage. It was composed of prodigious wooden bars; and the wicket which admitted into it was ten or twelve inches in thickness. I went into the inside: The space it comprized was about twelve feet square, or fourteen: and it might be nearly twenty in height. This was the abode of many eminent victims in former ages, whose names and miseries are now obliterated and forgotten.

'There was,' said my Conductor, 'towards the latter end of the last century, a certain news writer in Holland, who had presumed to print some very severe and farcastic reflections on Madame de Maintenon and Louis the Fourteenth. Some months after he was induced, by a person sent expressly for that purpose, to make a tour into French Flanders. The instant he had quitted the Dutch territories, he was put under arrest, and immediately, by his majesty's express command, conducted to this place. They shut him up in this cage. Here he lived upwards of three-and-twenty years; and here he, at length, expired.—During the long nights of winter,' continued the man, 'no candle or fire was allowed him. He was not permitted to have any book. He saw no human face except the gaoler, who came once every day to present him, through a hole in the wicket, his little portion of bread and wine. No instrument was given him, with which he could destroy himself; but he found means at length to draw out a nail from the wood, with which he cut or engraved, on the bars of his cage, certain fleurs de lis, and armorial bearings, which formed his only employment and recreation.'—These I saw, and they are indeed very curiously performed, with so rude a tool.

As I stood within this dreadful engine, my heart sunk within me. I execrated the vengeance of the Prince, who, for such a trespass, could inflict its disproportionate tionate and tremendous a punishment. I thought the towers and pinnacles of the abbey seemed to shake, as conscious of the cruelty committed in their gloomy round; and I hastened out of this sad apartment, impressed with feelings of the deepest pity and indignation.

'It is now fifteen years,' said the Swiss, 'since a gentleman terminated his days in that cage; it was before I came to reside here: But there is one instance within my memory. Monsieur de F——, a person of rank, was conducted here by command of the late king; he remained three years shut up in it. I fed him myself every day; but he was allowed books and candle to divert his misery; and at length the Abbot, touched with his deplorable calamities, requested and obtained the Royal pardon. He was set free and is now alive in France.'

'The subterranean chambers,' added he, 'in this mountain, are so numerous, that we know them not ourselves. There are certain dungeons called Oubliettes, into which they were accustomed anciently to let down malefactors guilty of very heinous crimes: They provided them with a loaf of bread and a bottle of wine; and then they were totally forgotten, and left to perish by hunger in the dark vaults of the rock. This punishment has not however been inflicted by any king in the last or present century.'

We continued our progress through the Abbey. He led me into a chamber, in one corner of which was a kind of window; between this and the wall of the building was a very deep space or hollow of near a hundred feet perpendicular, and at bottom was another window, opening to the sea. It is called 'The hole of Montgomeri.' The history of it is this:—You will recollect, that in the year 1559, Henry the second, king of France, was unfortunately killed at a tournament by the Count de Montgomeri. It was not intended on that Nobleman's part; and he was forced contrary to his inclination, to push the lance against his Sovereign, by his express command. He was a Huguenot, and, having escaped the massacre of Paris and Coligni, made head against the Royal forces in Normandy, supported by our Elizabeth with arms and money. Being driven from his fortresses in those parts, he retired to a rock, called the 'Tombelaine.' This is another, similar to the 'Mont St. Michel,' only three quarters of a league distant from it, and of nearly equal dimensions. At that time there was a castle on it, afterwards demolished, and of which scarce any vestiges now remain. From this fortress, only accessible at low tides, he continually made excursions, and annoyed the enemy, who never dared to attack him. He coined money, laid all the adjacent country under contribution, and rendered himself universally dreaded. Desirous, however, to surprise the 'Mont St. Michel,' he found means to engage one of the Monks resident in the Abbey, who promised to give him the signal for his enterprise, by displaying a handkerchief. The treacherous Monk having made the signal, betrayed him, and armed all his associates, who waited Montgomeri's arrival. The Chieftain came attended by fifty chosen soldiers, desperate, and capable of any attempt. They crossed the sand, and, having placed their scaling-ladders, mounted one by one: As they came to the top, they were dispatched each in turn, without noise. Montgomeri, who followed last, at length discovered the perfidy, and escaped with only two of his men, with whom he regained the 'Tombelaine.' They preserve with great care the ladders and grappling irons used on this occasion.—You perhaps remember the subsequent fate of the Count himself. He was at last besieged and taken prisoner by the Marechal de Matignon, in 1574, at Domfront in Normandy; and Catharine of Medicis, who detested him for his having been, though innocently, the cause of her husband's death, ordered him to be immediately executed.

The Church itself detained me a long time, and is matter of high curiosity. It rests on nine pillars of most enormous dimensions, which stand upon the solid rock. I did not measure them; but, as far as the gloominess of the place would admit, I apprehend that each of them must be five and twenty feet in circumference; Besides these, there are two others of much inferior size, which support the center of the Church, over which is the tower. If the prodigious incumbent weight be considered, and the nature of its situation, nothing less massy could sustain the edifice. They seem as if designed to outlive the ravages of time, and the convulsions of Nature.—But, before we enter the Church itself, I must inform you of the absurd and legendary cause, which first produced it.

In the reign of Childebert the Second, there was a Bishop of Avranches named St. Aubert. To this holy man the archangel Michael was pleased to appear one night, and ordered him to go to this rock, and there build him a Church. St. Aubert, who seems to have been a little incredulous, treated it as a dream: The Angel came again, repeated his injunction, and not being obeyed the third time, he,

by way of imprinting it on the Bishop's memory, made a hole in his skull, by touching it with his thumb. In the Treasury of the Church I saw this curious skull. It is inclosed in a little shrine of gold, and a crystal, which opens over the orifice, admits the gratification of curiosity by the minutest examination of it. The hole is of a size and shape justly proportioned to the thumb supposed to have produced it, and, whether done with a knife, or by what means it is perforated, I cannot determine. The Bishop, however upon this sensible mark of the divine pleasure, delayed no longer; but repaired to the rock and constructed a small church, as he had been commanded—Here fable ends; and true History supplying its place, informs us, that it was in 966, when Richard, the second Duke of Normandy, began to build the Abbey. It was completed about the year 1070, under William the Conqueror, though many other additions were made by succeeding Abbots.

The Treasury is crowded with relics innumerable, among which some few have a real and intrinsic value. There is a fine head of Charles the Sixth of France cut in crystal, which drew my attention. They have got, Heaven knows by what means, an arm of Edward the Confessor; and they shewed me another of 'St. Richard, King of England.' Who this Saint and Prince was, I confess, is beyond my comprehension. I am sure they could not term Richard the first so, unless his crusade against Saladin wiped out all his sins and canonised him. Richard the Second has no better pretensions to sanctity. I do not mention him who fell at Bosworth: So that who this Royal Saint was, I must leave you to divine. As to the Monks, they know nothing about it; but they were positive he was a King of England.—An enormous golden cockleshell, weighing many pounds, given by Richard, the second Duke of Normandy, when he founded the Abbey, is worthy remark.

In the middle of the choir hangs a stone, which is said to have fallen on the head of Louis the Eleventh at the siege of Bezançon, without doing him the smallest injury. This, he conceived, and with reason, must have been owing to some wonderful divine interposition: for the stone weighs, I should suppose, at least ten pounds. Louis, though the greatest monster who ever filled a Throne, was yet, at times, exceedingly pious: he used to come very often in pilgrimage to 'Mont St. Michel;' and he ordered this stone to be suspended by a chain in the choir, and left an annual sum in lands to maintain Priests to say Masses, for his preservation from so imminent a danger.

The refectory, the cloisters, the cells of the Monks, are all, (or rather they have been) very magnificent and spacious; but a vast sum of money is wanted to put the whole in repair, and re-instate what the lapse of ages defaces and deforms. One of the greatest towers is cracked and shaken. They have written repeatedly to the ministry, to know his majesty's pleasure respecting it; but no answer has been returned. It will probably tumble soon, and must necessarily, from its prodigious height and size, draw with it a considerable part of the adjoining edifices.

The late king sequestered the revenues of the Abbey, which are very ample. A Prior is substituted instead of the Abbot, and the number of religious reduced from thirty to fourteen. Perhaps a few years more may even extinguish these; and St. Michael himself though composed of gold, be melted down to support the expence of a bal pare.—It is at present considered rather as a prison of State, and will more probably be repaired on that account, than as an erection of piety. The apartments are, at this time, occupied by many illustrious captives, who have been sent here by 'Lettre de Cachet,' for crimes of State. They are detained in stricter or easier confinement, according to the Royal mandate. There are in one range of rooms eight, who eat at a round table together. They are allowed a pint of wine; but neither knives or forks are ever given them, lest they should commit suicide, to escape the horrors of captivity. No person is permitted to enter that division where they live, or can hold any conversation with them. Four of these are sent here since the accession of his present majesty. There are others who have the liberty of going into every part of the Mount without restraint; but to profit of this permission they must be habited as Priests, and of consequence, universally known. To escape one would suppose impossible—but what cannot human subtlety effect, when pushed to despair? It is only sixteen days since a Monsieur de C—, who had been confined ten months, succeeded in an attempt to set himself free. I was shewn the place from whence he let himself down by a rope: It is near a hundred feet perpendicular. He crossed the sands immediately, while the sea was low: and it is imagined he has embarked for Jersey or England, as no intelligence has been received concerning him.

Some apartments are destined to a species of wretches yet more deplorable—I mean to lunatics. There are several of high rank. In the cloisters of the Abbey, a person accosted me in very polite terms. He was apparently about fifty years of age; his habit squalid; at his button-hole hung a cross of St. Michael, fantastically adorned with ribbons. His face, though brown and sickly, had a somewhat noble, commanding, and engaging; his hair of a deep black, mixed with grey, hung floating upon his shoulders; and over his whole person was an air of dignity in ruin. It was the Marquis de R—, a Breton Nobleman, who has been shut up here five-and-twenty years. He is insane, but harmless, and perfectly observant of all the forms in cultivated life.—None but persons of Quality are ever sent here on this account.

At the foot of the mountain, close to the waves, is a very fine well of fresh water; but as this might and would be undoubtedly possessed by an enemy, in case of a siege, they have contrived to hollow into the solid rock cisterns proportionate to every other part of the building, and capable of containing many hundred tuns of water; they say more than twelve hundred. Indeed, to besiege it would be madness: A hundred men might defend it against ten thousand assailants, and any number of vessels; nor could it be, if taken, converted to any sort of use.

The town itself is almost as curious as any other part of the Mount. I doubt not there are many houses in it five or six hundred years old; and I did not see one which seemed to be built since Louis the Eleventh's time. The whole number of persons resident in the Abbey, and in the town, does not exceed a hundred and eighty, in time of peace. A militia, composed of the Bourgeoisie, mount guard, to prevent any of the prisoners from escaping. In time of war there are five hundred soldiers commonly in garrison; and they assured me, so vast and numerous are the chambers in different parts, that thirteen thousand might be disposed of without any sort of inconvenience.

They sell little legendary books in the town: I have bought them all, in hopes to find some historical anecdotes or traditions respecting the place, and the various important events or sieges it has undergone;—but alas! this is a vain attempt. They are all stuffed with miracles, and absurdities too ridiculous to repeat; and St. Michael and St. Aubert are the only Heroes who make any figure in the annals of Monks.—I would most willingly have inspected the archives which are laid up in the Abbey; but this is not permitted. It must be a very curious research, since it is probable every King of England, from the Conqueror to Henry the Third, had been many times here from motives of devotion or curiosity.

British Theatre.

THE tragedy of Merope was performed at Covent-Garden Theatre on Monday January 30. A new performer appeared in the part of Dorilas. His person is naturally noble and interesting, though a good deal clouded by improper action, the general misfortune of young beginners. The compass of his voice is prodigious (which as Colley Cibber justly observed, is nine tenths of the business) which, when properly modulated, will be truly harmonious, with the depth of Quin, and violence of Barry.

This young gentleman is well worth the indulgence of the public, he will reward their lenity, his great natural requisites united to acquisitions which time and experience alone can give, must render him a very capital performer.

The character of Merope is truly great, and demands the veteran abilities of a Yates, or a Barry, therefore Mrs. Jackson's performance surprised me. She not only went through the whole with great propriety, but in many parts was excellent.

Her deportment upon the couch when she questioned Dorilas, we never expect or wish to see better performed. All her scenes with Poliphontes (one or two extremely difficult) she kept up with regal dignity, and several strokes of tenderness affected us much. In three or four speeches where great energy and power of voice are absolutely necessary, she was not in the least defective. This young actress cannot fail being a real ornament to the stage. It would be injustice to omit mentioning Mr. Clarke, whose great feeling and proper action in Narbas demanded the loud applause he justly gained.

A Sketch of the Lives and Characters of two remarkable Men.

NICHOLAS FLAMEL, a native of Pontoise in the 14th century, who came to Paris, where he is reported to have acquired a fortune of 1,500,000 crowns, a prodigious sum in those days, under the finances, and by the plunder of the Jews, when they were expelled the kingdom. He founded and endowed several churches and hospitals; but fearing an enquiry into his conduct and great wealth, he pretended to have discovered the the grand arcana of the Hermetic philosophy, or what is called the philosopher's stone: accordingly he wrote 'A Compendium of Philosophy;' with 'A Treatise on the Transmutation of Metals' printed in 1561. Flamel died at Paris, and was buried with his wife Perronella in the church of the Holy Innocents. As a sequel to this extraordinary story, it may be added, for the reader's amusement, that the sieur Paul Lucas, who travelled into the East in the beginning of the present century to collect antiquities, by order of Lewis XIV. countenances the strange reports concerning Nicholas Flamel. He relates, that he found a dervis in Natolia, who spoke all languages, and told him that the professors of the Hermetic Science were enabled to prolong their lives to 1000 years: that he was one of seven friends who had travelled all over the world, but met every twenty years at some place appointed at the previous meeting: and finally, that Flamel and his wife were then living, he having seen them about three years before! He said, that Flamel, at the ordinary term of human life, schemed that his wife should die first, and accordingly buried an image of her in due form, whilst she conveyed herself out of the kingdom; and that Flamel afterwards made his will, and died in like manner, contriving a burial for himself, while he withdrew after his wife.

THOMAS GUY, was the son of Thomas Guy, lighterman and coal-dealer in Horsley-down, South-wark. He was put apprentice in 1660, to a bookseller in the porch of Mercer's chapel, and set up trade with a stock of about 200*l.* in the house that forms the angle between Cornhill and Lombard-street. The English Bibles being at that time very badly printed, Mr. Guy engaged with others in a scheme for printing them in Holland and importing them; but this being put a stop to, he contracted with the university of Oxford for their privilege of printing them, and carried on a great bible trade for many years to a considerable advantage. Thus he began to accumulate money, and his gains rested in his hands; for being a single man, and very penurious, his expences could not be great, when it was his custom to dine on his shop counter with no other table covering than an old news-paper; he was moreover as little scrupulous about the stile of his apparel. The bulk of his fortune, however, was acquired by purchasing seamen's tickets during queen Anne's wars, and by South Sea stock in the memorable year 1720. To know what great events spring from trivial causes, it may be observed that the public owe the application of the greatest part of his immense fortune to charitable purposes, to the indiscreet officiousness of his maid servant in interfering with the mending of the pavement before the door, Guy had agreed to marry her and preparatory to his nuptials had ordered the pavement before the door which was in a neglected state, to be mended, as far as to a particular stone which he pointed out. The maid, while her master was out, innocently looking on the paviours at work, saw a broken place they had not repaired, and mentioned it to them: but they told her, that Mr. Guy had directed them not to go so far. Well, says she, do you mend it, tell him I bade you, and I know he will not be angry. It happened however that the girl presumed too much on her influence over her careful lover, with whom a few extraordinary shillings expence turned the scale totally against her: the men obeyed, Guy was enraged to find his orders exceeded, his matrimonial scheme was renounced, and so he built hospitals in his old age. In the year 1707 he built and furnished three wards on the north side of the outer court of Saint Thomas's-hospital in Southwark, and gave 100*l.* annually to it for eleven years preceding the erection of his own hospital; and some time before his death erected the stately iron gate, with the large houses on each side, at the expence of about 3000*l.* He was 76 years of age when he formed the design of building, contiguous to that of St. Thomas's, an hospital, which bears his name, and lived to see it roofed in; dying in the year 1724. The charge of erecting this vast pile amounted to 18,793*l.* and 219,499*l.* to endow it; a much larger sum than ever had been dedicated to charitable uses in this kingdom by any one man. He erected an alms house with a library at Tamworth in Staffordshire, the place of his mother's nativity, and for which he was representative in parliament, for fourteen poor men and women; and for their pensions, as well as for the putting out poor children apprentices, bequeathed 125*l.* a year. Lastly, he bequeathed 1000*l.* to every one who could prove themselves in any degree related to him.

On Connoisseurs in Painting.

IT will be generally thought an unaccountable maxim, viz. That people, in common, come into the world with a good taste for the polite arts, and are only spoiled by a bad education, or wrong direction. This wants a little explanation. An accurate eye, and a sensible mind, are the two chief requisites for judgment in painting painting and sculpture; as an accurate ear, with a sensible heart, will, with practice, attend to the best taste in music. Now, if a person sets up for a connoisseur, with the stock mentioned, and in his examination and comparison of the works of art with those of nature, will not suffer the prejudices of self-interested, or self-conceited people to mislead him, he will, undoubtedly, know the degrees of merit in every performance; always taking notice, that I insist upon his having proper materials to judge of, with a proper attention, and frequent opportunities of judging, which alone must give the precision, which at once satisfies the mind, and even reaches the heart thro' the eye. But the danger is, lest you should talk and act too peremptorily, and too familiarly, about these matters upon a slight acquaintance; or that, when you are intimate with them, you do not suffer yourself to be deceived with names, which may get such an ascendancy over you, that you, at once give up your eyes and your understanding, to judge by the ear. A gentleman of my acquaintance of good parts, and with a tolerable fortune, from a strong inclination to the polite arts, entered very deeply into connoisseurship; but unfortunately for him, was too easy of access, and too diffident of his own abilities; and, of course, had a higher opinion of other people, than they, perhaps, deserved.

By reading many books upon the subjects which generally dwell too much upon refinements, and conversing with a particular set of people, he had got a notion that a true judgment in pictures could only be obtained by going abroad for it. These notions being backed by some of his travelled acquaintance, he at once gave up his eyes and understanding, to be led blindfold, as they pleased; and as a proof of his submission, he was put into the hands of a certain picture dealer—(of whom however, he had no reason to brag) who was to clear his eye-sight, refine his taste, (that was the phrase) and dispose of some hundreds which he had set apart for pictures.

This is a very common practice, and puts me in mind of the artifice made use of by a celebrated oculist: he persuaded many persons that they had a defect in their vision, took them in hand to remove it, half-blinded them, and then made them give testimonies of their cure.

But to return to my friend, whom I shall call Eugenio; he was happy with his new virtuoso acquaintance, who soon got deeply into his heart and his purse, and who in about six months furnished two small rooms for him with capital pictures.

Eugenio's taste, by this time, was quite led allray: there was some little difficulty at first, indeed, to seduce him from the truth; but when once debauched, he not only got new modes of thinking, but a new language into the bargain; and, in short, he changed his plain, natural, intelligible manner, into an affectation of the terms of art, and the common jargon of those whose interests it is to substitute words for ideas. This false taste cannot be so properly compared to any thing as to a fine lady of the town, who by the help of a little daubing on her part, some puffing from the fellows who live upon her, and an amorous tendency in all young men to be flattered and deceived, will make her way in a very avvery astonishing manner. But to return again—During the state of error in Eugenio's mind, a friend of his arrived from Italy, (Polydore if you please) who had really travelled to some purpose, and had improved a fine natural taste by the opportunities he had abroad of seeing, and considering the best works of the best masters.

Eugenio, happy to meet his friend again, insisted upon taking him home to dinner: as he had not only a most sincere regard for him, but a secret pride and satisfaction to surprise him with his new purchases. Away they went, and the little time before dinner was spent in looking over the several masters, that were so splendidly set off with damask furniture, and most elegant frames. Eugenio's eyes sparkled with extasy at displaying his riches, and opened all his faculties to imbibed the praises of his friend Polydore; but whether the one expected too much, or the other too little, Eugenio informed his friend that dinner was upon the table, with a countenance and tone of voice which expressed chagrin and disappointment. However as dinner went on, enlivened with old stories, and a few glasses of champagne, the friends reached that height of satisfaction which warm hearts and good minds will ever receive upon such an occasion. When the servants were gone, "Do you know, said Eugenio to his friend, that I was greatly mortified before dinner, at the little joy you expressed at seeing my treasure here," pointing to his pictures. Why, you do not value yourself upon your Virtue? do you Eugenio? said the other smiling: had I known that, you should not have wanted a little flattery to have kept up your spirits."

"What do you mean by flattery? I do not understand you!—fifteen hundred and ninety five pounds have been bestowed, indeed, if I am only to be flattered tered for my bargains."—"What do you mean, Eugenio?"—"Mean! come into this closet, and I will shew you."

The friends then went together into a small dressing room, and while Eugenio was opening his escrutore, to produce his vouchers, Polydore was examining two pictures that were stuck against the wainscot, in very indifferent frames. "Where the devil did you get these?" cried he, in a transport.—"Prythee be quiet; you cannot flatter me there;" replied Eugenio. "I bought that trash upon my own judgment, when I first set out a picture fancier, and before I knew one master from another." "Did you so?" answered his friend; "Why then to speak with that openness of heart, which is ever the consequence of true friendship, and good champagne, I must declare to you that I would rather have these two shabby-looking fellows, than all your fine-dressed gentlemen in your grand apartments."—"You are not in earnest, sure?" "Indeed I am; and I am very sorry to see that you are so much alarmed. Let us finish our champagne, and think no more of these matters to night:—to-morrow morning, over a dish of tea, we will coolly examine your collection, one by one, and bring them to a very just, but severe trial"—They did so, and the sentence was, that the two discarded pictures in the closet were excellent in their kind; but that the others were, at best, tolerable copies, or very indifferent originals; that Eugenio had been greatly imposed upon; that he had given himself up into the hands of connoisseurs who had used him most unmercifully; and that there was no way of avoiding the mischiefs of conversing with them, but by following the advice which Ulysses gave his companions, in order to escape the Syrens; which was, to close up his ears for the future against their delusions. Such advice to such a man is certainly worthy his attention: every Eugenio should, while he stuffs up his ears, open his eyes, and draw his purse-strings as close as he can.

Fugitive Thoughts on the Celebration of the Christmas Holidays.

THE different methods of keeping this season of the year are a matter of curious inquiry with the generality. Christmas is looked upon as a festival, in the most literary sense, and held sacred by gormandizing and drinking in an eminent degree. It is impossible to conceive the slaughter that is made among the poultry and the hogs in different parts of the country, to furnish the prodigious number of turkeys and chins, and collars of brawn, that travel up as presents to the metropolis on this occasion. The revenue from the malt-tax, and the duty upon wines, &c. on account of the twelve days, has always been found to increase considerably.

As to persons of high rank and fashion, this annual carnival is worse to them than Lent, or the empty town in the months of July and August. The boisterous merriment, and aukward affectation of politeness among the vulgar, interrupt the course of their refined pleasures, and drives them out of town for the holidays. The few, who remain, are very much at a loss how to dispose of their time, for the Theatres, at this season, are opened only for the reception of school-boys, apprentices, and servant-wenchens; and there is no public place where a person of fashion can appear, without being surrounded by the ill-bred inhabitants of Stony-batter, Cross-lane, and James's-street.

On the other hand, there is no rank of people so heartily rejoiced at the arrival of this merry season, as those of the lower class, who are rejoiced, from levying the taxes which custom has imposed upon us in the article of Christmas boxes.

This gift was formerly the bounty of well-disposed people, who were willing to contribute something towards rewarding the industrious, and supplying them with necessaries; but the Christmas-boxes now are almost demanded as a right, by our journeymen, and other servants, who commence beaux and belles for the holidays; in consequence of which, the sixpenny hop is crowded with ladies from the kitchen, and the galleries with critics from the work shop, while the greasy cards and dirty cribbage-boards employ the holiday gamesters in every ale-house. A merry Christmas has ruined many a promising young fellow, who has been flush of money at the beginning of the week, but, before the end of it, has committed a robbery on the till for more.

The jolly cit looks upon this joyous time of feasting with as much pleasure as the treat of a new-elected Alderman, or a Lord Mayor's-day. Nor can the country farmer rail more against the game-act, than many worthy citizens, who have ever since been debarred of their annual hare; while their ladies can never enough regret the loss of the opportunity of displaying their skill, in making a most excellent pudding in the belly. But these notable housewives have still the consolation of hearing their guests commend their mince-pies without meat, which, we are assured, were made at home, and not like the ordinary heavy things from the pastry-cooks. These good people would indeed look upon the absence of mince-pies as the highest violation of Christmas; and have remarked with concern, the disregard that has been shewn of late years to that old English repast; for this excellent British olio is as essential to Christmas as pancake to Shrove-Tuesday, tansy to Easter, surmity to Mid-lent Sunday, or goose to Michaelmas-day.

I say nothing of those old-fashioned mortals, who have been accustomed to look upon this season with extraordinary devotion, as, from the emptiness of the churches and the little attention that is paid to religious duties by most ranks of people, it appears a sacred observation of these holidays is not the taste of the present enlightened times. Nor is the laudable old hospitable usage of keeping open house in the country for the poor neighbourhood any longer regarded, any more than the humane custom of distributing provisions at this severe quarter of the year to the necessitous. These presents are now seldom sent to those who are really in want of them, but are transmitted as compliments to the great from their inferiors, and come chiefly from the tenant to his rich landlord, or from the rector of a fat living, as a kind of tythe to his patron.

These modern refinements, so different from the manners of our ancestors, will, no doubt, make the reader exclaim with me,

O Tempora! O Mores!

Humorous Anecdote of the Countess of Chesterfield, daughter of the first Duke of Ormond.

THIS Lady was a celebrated beauty, and the greatest coquette of the gay court of Charles the Second. She was beloved by the Duke of York, and idolised by Count Hamilton, whose jealous temper had given her a great deal of pain. In one of his fits of vexation, he persuaded the Earl, her husband, who treated her with great severity, to carry her from the pleasures of dear London, in the midst of the month of December, to pass her Christmas at his seat, called Bradley-hall, in Derbyshire. She soon discovered the treachery of her gallant, and, pretending great sorrow for having offended him, contrived to inveigle him to visit her in her retreat, through all the real inconveniencies of bad roads, dreadful weather, and dark nights, with the additional terrors of imaginary precipices and bogs, which she had painted in her letter, to exaggerate the miseries of his journey. A cold dirty cottage was provided for his concealment, and at midnight her maid let him into a paddock, under promise of an interview. The night began with rain, and ended with frost; so that, when the day approached, he was in a manner cased with ice. He quitted his station in despair, and retired to his cabin, where the servant soon after informed him, that he had better return to London as fast as possible, as the Earl was constantly with her lady, and had some suspicions of the Count's intending a visit to his wife. The unfortunate enamorado sallied out, and found the country by no means so dreadful, with respect to bogs and precipices, as it had been represented to him. In short, he returned to London the next night, and the Duke of York having received a narration of the whole adventure from the injured fair-one, the amorous Count continued the ridicule of the gay Monarch, and his merry court, for a considerable time afterwards.

The Life of Thomas Coryate.

TOM CORYATE, of vain-glorious memory, was a man of a remarkable queerness of aspect, and of as singular a character. He had learning but he wanted judgment*, which is, alone, equivalent to all the other qualities of the mind. He travelled over a great part of Europe on foot, and distinguished himself by walking nine hundred miles with one pair of shoes, which as he informs us, he got mended at Zurich. He afterwards travelled into the Eastern countries; and seems to have been as frugal in meat and drink, as he was in shoes; as he tells his mother in a letter to her, that in his ten months travels betwixt Aleppo and the Mogul's court, he spent but "three pounds, living reasonably well," for about two-pence a day." He sometimes ventured his life, by his ill timed zeal for Christianity; having on several occasions publicly declared Mahomet to be an impostor. He delivered an oration to the Mogul in the Persian language, and spoke that of Indostan with such volubility, that he was an over match for a notorious scold in her mother tongue. He, like other coxcombs, died without knowing himself to be of that character, in 1617†.—The most singularly remarkable of his books is entitled, "Crudities hastily gobbled up in five months travels in France, Savoy, Italy, Rhesia, Helvetia, some parts of High Germany, and the Netherlands." The Life of Archbishop James Beaton.

BEATON (James) Archbishop of St. Andrews. This famous prelate was descended from an antient and honourable family, that came originally from France, but which had been long settled in Scotland. His father was John Beaton, of Balfour, and his mother Mary, daughter to Sir David Boswell of Blamuto. He was a younger son, and therefore early intended for the church, and with that view kept to his studies. He had great natural talents, which he improved by the acquisition of the best learning which could be attained, at that time, in his country. His first preferment was that of the provostship of Bothwell, which was given him by George Douglass, Earl of Angus, in 1503. The next year he was promoted to the rich and honourable preferment of abbot of Dumferling. This was a strong evidence of the king's favour; but in 1505, he received a still greater. His brother, Sir David Beaton, died that year; upon which the king honoured him with the staff of high-treasurer in the room of that gentleman; and he began to be considered as one of his majesty's chief ministers. In 1508, he was promoted to the bishopric of Galloway; and before he had sat a full year in that see, he was removed to the archbishopric of Glasgow, upon which he resigned the treasurer's staff in 1509. He is supposed to have taken this step with a view to be more at leisure to mind the government of his diocese, for we are told that while he continued at Glasgow, he attended to the duties of his function with great diligence.

In 1513, King James IV. of Scotland, having imprudently entered into a war with England, was slain in the battle of Flodden-field; and with him fell the flower of his nobility, and among them Alexander, archbishop of St. Andrews, and chancellor of Scotland, his natural son. By this fatal blow the kingdom was thrown into the utmost confusion. The queen, Margaret, was declared regent of the kingdom by the late king's will; and such of the nobility as survived the battle of Flodden-field, had submitted to her authority; but in consequence of an hasty and indecent marriage with Archibald Earl of Angus, she was deprived of her regency. The nobility, however, could not agree about this; and the clergy, instead of interposing their good offices, and endeavouring to promote peace in the kingdom, were altogether by the ears about the archbishopric of St. Andrews. So that, for the re-establishment of the public tranquillity, it was found necessary to send for John Stuart, Duke of Albany, the young king's uncle, from France, and to declare him regent of the kingdom. Among those who were particularly distinguished by the new regent's favour, was archbishop Beaton. He raised him to the office of high chancellor; and gave him for the support of his dignity the two rich abbeys of Killwinning and Arbroth, which he held with his archbishopric in commendam. While archbishop Beaton resided at Glasgow in 1515, the famous Dr. Gawin Douglass, uncle to the Earl of Angus, was promoted to the see of Dunkeld, which being a suffragan to the archbishop of Glasgow, Dr. Douglass went thither to be consecrated, and Beaton, to shew how much he respected the new bishop and his family, entertained him and all his attendants with great magnificence and splendour, and defrayed the whole expence of his consecration. But, notwithstanding all this, and though he had been first patronized by the family of Douglass, yet the favours which he had received from the regent, the Duke of Albany, induced our prelate, to join his party in opposition to that of the house of Douglass. In 1517, the Duke of Albany went over into France, upon which he appointed, among other great men, archbishop Beaton to be one of the governors of Scotland in his absence; And, with a view of preventing disputes among them, they had different provinces assigned them. But this did not answer the purpose; for during the regent's absence, such confusions prevailed in Scotland, and such mutual enmity, rapine, and violence, amongst the great families, that the kingdom was, for a considerable time, in the utmost disorder. At length it was proposed to commit the reins of government into the hands of the Earl of Arran, a nobleman nearly allied in blood to the king. Accordingly, at his instance a convention of estates was summoned to meet at Edinburgh, on the 20th of April 1520.

On the day appointed the Earl of Arran, with many of the nobility, assembled together in archbishop Beaton's house; where previous to the sitting of the convention, they resolved to apprehend the Earl of Angus; alledging that his power was so great, that whilst he remained free, they could not have a free parliament. But as soon as the Earl was informed of this design, he sent his uncle Gawin Douglass, bishop of Dunkeld, to archbishop Beaton, the chancellor, offering that if he had failed in any part of his duty to the rest of the lords, he would most willingly submit to the censure of the convention, which was then going to meet. And bishop Douglass himself earnestly besought the chancellor, that he would use his best endeavours with his friends to compromise matters, in order to prevent the effusion of blood. Archbishop Beaton, however, though he was as deep in the design as any of the party, and had "very episcopally," says Hume,* "put on armour to be present at it, and to assist them himself in person;" yet he endeavoured to excuse himself as well as he could, by laying the blame wholly upon the Earl of Arran, who, he pretended, was highly offended with the Earl of Angus upon many accounts; and after he had reckoned up the chief of them, and said that for those reasons Arran would have Angus arrested, he concluded with saying, "There is no remedy!

Upon my conscience I cannot help it." In the heat of this asseveration, Beaton smote his breast with his hand, which made the iron plates of the coat of mail under his cassock return a rattling sound; * which bishop Douglass perceiving, he gave his brother prelate this just reprimand: "How now, my lord, methinks your conscience chatters: we are priests; it is not lawful for us to put on armour, or bear arms. It is inconsistent with our character." However, the good bishop Douglass, finding he could no way prevail with him, in behalf of the Earl of Angus, retired. But as to archbishop Beaton, he, according to Buchanan, instead of being "a promoter of peace, flew armed up and down, like a firebrand of sedition." As in this situation of affairs, no accommodation could be brought about between the two parties, a skirmish ensued, in which the party of the Earl of Angus, who was much beloved in Edinburgh, had the advantage. Archbishop Beaton, when he saw the day was lost, and his friends defeated, flew for sanctuary to the Blackfriars church, and was there taken out from behind the altar, and his rochet torn off him. And he would certainly have been slain, if bishop Gawin Douglass had not, from a regard to his character, interceded for him, and saved his life.

The following year 1521, archbishop Beaton's affairs grew somewhat more prosperous. The Duke of Albany, the regent, arrived from France, who, for the present, introduced some kind of order in government, and obliged the Earl of Angus to consent, for the sake of the public peace, to remain for a year in France. Some time after this died Dr. Andrew Foreman, archbishop of St. Andrews, and primate of Scotland. This opened a fair path to Beaton to set himself at the head of the Scottish church: and accordingly he found means to succeed in his design, being made archbishop of St. Andrews in 1523. He did not, however, obtain this preferment without a very considerable struggle; though he was favoured by the regent, and by the young king, who was very much governed by the archbishop's nephew, David Beaton; in whose favour the new primate, soon after his promotion, resigned the rich abbey of Arbroth, or Aberbrothock. The same year the Duke of Albany returned again into France. Soon after which his authority, as regent, was taken away by an act of parliament; for the Earl of Angus returning into Scotland, obtained such a degree of influence in the public affairs of the kingdom, that all things were directed by him and his adherents. Matters being in this situation, archbishop Beaton for the present, joined himself to the party of the Earl of Angus; though this, as Hume says, was rather out of fear than good will. And, therefore, when a faction was formed against Angus, he fell from that nobleman's party. Upon which Angus, to be revenged of him, brought the king to the archbishop's house at Edinburgh, and seized upon his household goods for his own use.

* "In the heat of his asseveration, he beat his breast with his hand, where his conscience lay well covered with a coat of mail; a secret hid under his feton or cassock. And now being knocked upon, it answered with a rattling noise which the plates of iron did yield, bearing witness against him how little he cared for that inward witness, which belied him, when he protested he was desirous to pacify matters, being indeed thus preparing for war."—Hume's Hist. of the house of Douglass, Vol. II. p. 76, 77.

In 1526, the King, James V. was declared of full age, though he was only eighteen, and the administration placed entirely in the hands of the Earl of Angus. One of the first steps which were taken, after this alteration in the government, was the appointment of a new privy-council, from which archbishop Beaton was excluded, and soon after the great seal was taken from him; and, 1527, the Earl of Angus appointed high chancellor in his room. Many attempts were, however, made to dispossess the Earl of Angus of his power, particularly by the Earl of Lenox; but the latter nobleman was killed in a skirmish between the two parties; and the Earl of Angus's party, after this, seized upon, pillaged, and ruined archbishop Beaton's castle, because they considered him, says Buchanan, as the author of all the projects which the Earl of Lenox had undertaken. The primate was obliged to assume different disguises, and to conceal himself among his friends; by which means only he could screen himself from the vengeance of the opposite party.

However, the Earl of Angus, and his party, being at length driven from court, the archbishop came again into power, but did not recover his office of chancellor, which was bestowed upon Dunbar, archbishop of Glasgow. From this time archbishop Beaton continued to reside in his own palace at St. Andrews, and was concerned in some violent persecutions of the protestants. It is alledged, indeed in his justification, that he was not himself much inclined to proceedings of this kind; but that he was prevailed upon to be concerned in them, by his nephew David Beaton, abbot of Aberbrothock; who, we are told, governed at this time both his uncle, the archbishop, and the king his master. But as archbishop Beaton did actually give his name and sanction to these sanguinary proceedings, no influence of this kind can be thought, by any impartial man, sufficient to exculpate him from the guilt of a persecutor.

The archbishop's nephew, David Beaton, acted for the several last years of his life, as his coadjutor; and the archbishop committed to him the charge of all ecclesiastical affairs; being himself aged and sickly, and not often seen abroad. The king, however, retained so much regard for the old primate, as to permit him to dispose of all his preferments, by which means his relation, George Dury, obtained the rich abbey of Dumfermling, and one Mr. Hamilton became abbot of Killwinning. The archbishop in the decline of his life, began to erect the new college in the university of St. Andrews; but he did not live to finish it. He left, however, the best part of his estate towards the completion of it; but that, after his death, was applied to a different purpose. He died in 1539, and was interred in the cathedral church of St. Andrews.

Archbishop Beaton enjoyed the primacy of Scotland

Scotland sixteen years. One of his successors, archbishop Spotwood, says, that "he was herein most unfortunate, that under the shadow of his authority many good men were put to death for the cause of religion, though he himself was neither violently set, nor much solicitous, as it was thought, how matters went in the church." Lefley, bishop of Ross, does indeed give archbishop Beaton a very good character: but, upon the whole, that given of him by John Knox, seems to be not an unjust one. "He was (says he) more careful of the world, than to preach Christ, or yet to advance any religion but for the fashion only; and as he sought the world, it fled him not; for it was well known, that at once he was archbishop of St. Andrew's, abbot of Dumfermling, Aberbrotho, Killwinning, and chancellor of Scotland.

The Life of David Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's.

Beaton (David) archbishop of St. Andrew's, primate of Scotland, and cardinal of the Roman church, was descended from an honourable family in the north, being the son of John Beaton of Balfour, by Isabel his wife, daughter of David Moniepenney, of Pitmilny in the county of Fife, and nephew to archbishop Beaton, whose life we have already related. He was born in the year 1494, and it appears, that there was no care omitted to render his education equal to his birth. He passed through the various classes of school learning with rapidity, and having entered the university of St. Andrew's, he began to display such a readiness of wit, and withal such an intense application to study, that his relations conceived great hopes of his becoming, one day or other, an honour and support to his family. But these flattering expectations were entertained by no one with such a degree of warmth, as by his uncle, the archbishop, who loved David as his own son: as the best method to secure his advancement in life, he sent him over to Paris, where our young Scot commencing a student in one of the colleges, perfected himself in the civil and canon law, and applied with such diligence to divinity, in order to qualify himself for the service of the church, that he entered into holy orders before he was nineteen years old; and we find that he had the address, even prior to that event, to recommend himself in so particular a manner to the notice and favour of John, duke of Albany, then in France, whom the states of Scotland had made regent, during the minority of James V. that he was taken into the service of that nobleman; and being employed by him in several affairs of the greatest importance, and always discharging the trust reposed in him with the utmost dispatch and fidelity, on the death of his grace's secretary, which happened in 1519, he was appointed, in his place, resident at the French court. This preferment abroad was attended with others in his own country; for about this time his uncle, then archbishop of Glasgow, bestowed on him the rectory of Campsey; so that he was benefited in the church, and a minister of state, at the age of twenty-five.

In the year 1523, his uncle being raised to the archbishopric of St. Andrew's, resolved to resign the abbey of Arbroth in favour of his nephew, and for that end he prevailed with the duke regent to write, in the most pressing manner, both in the young king's name and his own, to pope Adrian VI. to dispatch the bulls of his investiture; and withal to entreat his holiness, that through the fullness of his dispensing power he would admit Mr. Beaton to delay taking on him what they call the habit, for the space of two years; which the pope to gratify the king, acquiesced in. Mr. Beaton remained in France two years after this; and upon his return to Scotland in 1525, he was promoted to the dignity of lord-privy-seal, in which capacity he assisted the king with his counsels, and was considered as the person in whom his majesty most confided. In the year 1533, he was intrusted with a very important commission, which obliged him to pass into France, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Eskeine. This was to conclude an alliance between the two crowns, and a marriage with the daughter of the French king, which did not then take effect, because the princess was at that time in a very bad state of health: but the abbot of Arbroth was likewise entrusted with some other secret commission, which obliged him to continue at the French court for some time; and he gave his master such intelligence from thence, as enabled him to secure his peace with his uncle, Henry VIII. of England, while he was complimented and caressed, in the most extraordinary manner, by the emperor and pope, though those sovereigns were both violent enemies to the British monarch.

It was during the time he was thus employed at the French court, that our abbot laid the foundation of all his greatness; for by his address and understanding, he gained so much on the good graces of Francis I. that he granted him many, and those too very singular favours: first, by virtue of his prerogative, giving him all the privileges of a native of France, and afterwards conferring upon him a bishoprick; marks of esteem not frequently bestowed on strangers, and never by so wise a prince as Francis I. without just cause; whence it has been conjectured, that Beaton was now admitted into the whole system of French politics, and undertook to make his master coincide with them; so that what Francis gave him, was not so much encouragement as reward; and the emperor invading France in 1536, king James, by the advice of his minister, actually came, with part of his nobility, to the assistance of the French monarch. He was met on the road by the dauphin, who conducted him to Paris, where he had all the honours paid him that he could desire: and what he seemed to wish most, the princess Magdalen, for whom he had sent two embassies in vain, was given to him in person, whom he espoused on the first of January 1537. But this lady dying the July following, soon after her arrival in Scotland, the abbot of Arbroth, who returned with their majesties into that kingdom, was sent over again to Paris, to negotiate a second marriage for the king, with the lady Mary, daughter to the Duke of Guise, and widow of the duke de Longueville. During his stay, at this time, in the kingdom of France, he was consecrated bishop of Mirepoix, and all things being at length settled, in the month of June, 1538, he embarked with his new mistress for Scotland, where after great hazard of being taken by the English, they safely arrived; and in the month of July, the royal nuptials were celebrated at St. Andrew's.

Beaton had now all the power and authority of an archbishop, though he was no more than coadjutor of St. Andrew's; but this being thought an insufficiency of power to answer the ends which he had engaged to promote, he was by pope Paul III. through the recommendation, as some have thought, of the French king, raised to the purple, by the title of St. Stephen in Monte Cælio, on the twentieth of December, 1538. But there is a letter of the cardinal's on this occasion, to Andrew Oliphant, the Scotch agent at Rome, which shews to a demonstration, that he chiefly owed his dignity to the state of affairs in Scotland at that time, his own capacity, and the king's influence. The pope wanted such a man as Beaton in his interest, when great strides were making every day towards demolishing the papal power, both in England and Scotland; and it was with a design of attaching the clergy of the latter kingdom strictly to himself, that he gave them a head, who, for his own sake, would keep them firm to the apostolic see.

Yet it was not many months after this, that the cardinal was in no small danger of losing his master's confidence; for Henry VIII. having intelligence of the motives which urged the pope to give Beaton one of the scarlet hats, sent a very able minister to his nephew James, with particular instructions to procure the cardinal's disgrace; but the scheme laid for that purpose had not the desired effect, the Scotch king taking care to elude the English ambassador's instances, by such subtle and evasive answers, as left no room for taking offence, yet sent him back to his master without gaining what he came for; and Beaton's uncle, the old archbishop dying shortly after, the cardinal succeeded in the primacy. He was no sooner advanced to this exalted station, than he began to discover that warm and persecuting temper, which, during the rest of his life, was his distinguishing characteristic; and being determined to give the strongest proof of his attachment to the religion and interests of Rome, he assembled a great number of persons of the first rank, both Clergy and Laity, in the cathedral of St. Andrew, himself and his attendants making an appearance uncommonly splendid; and he there made a speech, wherein he represented, how much the catholic faith was insulted, and the danger with which the Church was threatened by the increase of Heretics, who had the boldness to profess their opinions, even in the King's Court; where, said he, they find but too much countenance; and he mentioned by name Sir John Borthwick, whom he had cited to appear in that assembly, for disseminating heretical books, and holding heretical opinions. The articles of accusation were then read against him; and Sir John appearing neither in person, nor by proxy, was declared an Heretic, and his goods confiscated. Sir John, in the mean time, found means to escape into England, where he was kindly received by king Henry, who sent him into Germany, to conclude a treaty in his name with the Protestant Princes of the Empire. Cardinal Beaton therefore, could proceed no further against Borthwick; but was obliged to content himself with burning him in effigy. He proceeded however, against some others more effectually; for in 1540, five Heretics were committed to the flames, and nine recanted; but some made their escape out of prison, among whom was the celebrated George Buchanan.

But these proceedings not answering Beaton's purpose to the full, he had recourse to another method, which was, to engage the king to issue a commission for enquiring after heretics, and to place at the head of it Sir James Hamilton, bastard brother to the earl of Arran, a man of a barbarous and bloody temper, whom the king, till that time, had always hated, for many reasons. But the truth is, the king was filled with the hopes of obtaining large sums of money by the conviction of such as were discovered to be favourers of Luther's doctrine: and in support of this scheme a roll was actually made, containing the names of 360 suspected persons, many of whom were of the chief nobility. But while Sir James Hamilton, the grand inquisitor in this dreadful office, was busy in accusing others of heresy, he was himself accused, convicted, and afterwards executed for high treason; though James having left all his subjects absolutely to the cardinal's mercy, there is no knowing to what lengths such a furious zealot might have gone, had not Providence prevented the perpetration of his bloody designs, by the death of that monarch; who having, at his minister's instigation, directed his troops to invade England, they were at Solway Moss engaged and discomfited; which dismal overthrow had such an effect upon him, that, in the end, it broke his heart.

The situation in which the king's death left the nation, alarmed all ranks of men. A war with England had been undertaken without necessity; and carried on without success; many persons of the first distinction had fallen into the hands of the enemy, and among the rest of the nobles, there was little union, either in their views or their affections: add, too, that the religious disputes, occasioned by the opinions of the reformers, growing every day more violent, gave new rage to those factions which are natural to a form of government nearly aristocratical. The government of an infant queen was still more destitute of real authority; and James had not provided even a common remedy against the disorders of a minority, by committing to proper persons the care of his daughter's education, and the administration of affairs in her name; so that, in mere despair, he abandoned them both to the mercy of fortune, and left open to every pretender the office of regent; which he could not fix to his own satisfaction. Cardinal Beaton, who had for many years been considered as prime-minister, was the first that claimed that high dignity; and, in support of his pretensions, he produced a testament which he himself had forged in the name of the late king; and without any other right, instantly assumed the title of regent. He hoped, by the assistance of the clergy, the countenance of France, the connivance of the queen dowager, and the support of the whole popish faction, to hold by force what he had seized on by fraud. But Beaton had enjoyed power too long to be a favourite of the nation; those among the nobles who wished for a reformation in religion dreaded his severity; and others considered the elevation of a churchman to the highest office of the kingdom, as a depreciation of themselves: at their instigation, therefore, James Hamilton, earl of Arran, and next heir to the queen, roused himself from his inactivity, and was prevailed upon to aspire to the regency; to which, proximity of blood, and former practice in like cases, gave him an undoubted title. The nobles, who were assembled for this purpose, unanimously conferred on him the supreme office; and the public voice applauded their choice.

No two men ever differed more widely in disposition and character, than the earl and Beaton. The cardinal was by nature of immoderate ambition; by long experience he had acquired address and refinement; and insolence grew upon him from continual success. As his own eminence was founded upon the power of the church of Rome, he was a zealous defender of that superstition, and, for the same reason, an avowed enemy to the doctrine of reformers: political motives, alone determined him to support the one, or to oppose the other. His early application to public business kept him unacquainted with the learning and controversies of the age; he gave judgment, upon all points in dispute, with a precipitancy, violence, and rigour, which contemporary historians mention with indignation. The character of the earl of Arran was, in almost every respect, the reverse. He was neither infected with ambition, nor inclined to cruelty: the love of ease extinguished the former; the softness of his temper preserved him from the latter. Timidity and irresolution were his predominant failings; the one occasioned by his natural constitution, and the other arising from a consciousness that his abilities were not equal to his station. With these dispositions he might have enjoyed and adorned private life; but his public conduct was without courage, dignity or consistency; the perpetual slave of his own fears, and, in consequence, the perpetual tool of those who found their advantage in practising upon them. But as no other person could be set in opposition to the cardinal, with any probability of success, the nation declared in his favour with so general a consent, that the artifices of his rival could not withstand its united strength.

This was in the year 1542, the celebrated Mary queen of Scots being then but a few days old; and, before the close of the same year, the earl of Arran was firmly settled in the regency, to the utter exclusion of the cardinal, which was chiefly effected by the lords who were in the English interest, and desirous of complying with a proposal made by Henry VIII. for a marriage between his only son Edward and the infant queen; this proposal, indeed, was also relished by all who feared the cardinal or favoured the change of religion; for they were fond of an alliance which afforded protection to the doctrine they had embraced, as well as to their own persons, against the power of a Roman catholic prelate. But Henry's rough and overbearing temper rendered this scheme abortive. He had at once alarmed and irritated the whole Scottish nation, by demanding that the queen's person should immediately be committed to his custody; and that the government of the kingdom should be put into his hands during her minority. What people would not learn to purchase an alliance, however great, at the price of their liberty? The parliament of Scotland, notwithstanding, influenced by some of their nobles, seemed very desirous of a peace with the English king; and cardinal Beaton being the only obstruction to the measures leading to it, he was, by order of the regent, seized, and sent prisoner to the castle of Blackneis, after the English ambassadors had failed in a daring attempt to carry off both the young queen and him as a prize to their impatient matter.

But things did not long remain in this situation: the cardinal, though under restraint, found means to attach to strong a party to his interest, and, what was still more extraordinary, had gained to many people about the regent, that, not knowing how to secure himself, that nobleman was forced to set him at liberty: an event, no doubt, which is very expressive of Beaton's genius and character; who knew how to court and manage factions so well, that, upon the young queen's coronation, he was again admitted of the council, and, at the request as well as by the consent of the regent, assumed the high office of chancellor, out of which the archbishop of Glasgow was turned, to make way for him. After this the cardinal proceeded to give new proofs of his art and address. The treaty which had been signed with Henry, during his confinement at Blackneis, though on a more equitable footing than was at first proposed, was still manifestly to the advantage of England: he complained loudly upon this account, and said that the regent had betrayed the nation to its most inveterate enemies, and sacrificed its honour to his own ambition. He foretold the extinction of the true catholic religion, under the tyrannical usurpation of an excommunicated heretic; but, above all, he lamented to see an ancient kingdom consenting to its own slavery; and, in one hour, the weakness or treachery of a single man surrendering every thing for which the Scots had struggled through so many ages. The rage of the people rose to such a height upon these remonstrances, that the English ministers could hardly be protected from their insults. The clergy contributed a great sum towards preserving the church from the dominion of a prince, whose system of reformation was so fatal to their power; and the nobles, after having mortified the cardinal so lately in such a cruel manner, were now ready to applaud and second him, as the defender of the honour and liberty of his country. Fired by these encouragements, his ambition and zeal grew equally intemperate; he immediately seized on the persons of the young queen and her mother, and added to his party the splendor and authority of the royal name. But about the same time he received a more real accession to his strength, by the arrival of Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox, whose return from France he had earnestly solicited. This nobleman was hereditary enemy to the house of Hamilton; he had many claims upon the regent, and pretended a right not only to exclude him from succeeding to the the crown, but to deprive him of the possession of his private fortune. The cardinal flattered his vanity with the prospect of marrying the queen dowager, and affected to treat him with such respect, that the regent became jealous of him as a rival in power.

Mean while the day appointed for the ratification of the treaty with England approached; and the regent was quite undetermined how to proceed: He acted to the last (says the ingenious Dr. Robertson) with that irresolution and inconsistency, which is peculiar to weak men, when they are so unfortunate as to have the chief part in the conduct of difficult affairs. On the 25th of August, he ratified the treaty with Henry, and proclaimed the Cardinal, who still continued to oppose it, an enemy to his country. On the 3d of September he secretly withdrew from Edinburgh, met with the Cardinal at Callendar, renounced the friendship of England, and declared for the interest of France.

Cardinal Beaton was now in possession of every thing his ambition could desire; he was High Chancellor of Scotland; had been appointed by the Pope Legate a Latere; and exercised all the authority of a Regent, without the envy of the name. In the beginning of the year 1546, he summoned a provincial assembly of the clergy at the Black-Friars in Edinburgh, in order to concert measures for restraining heresy. How far they proceeded, or what was agreed upon, does not appear; however, it is certain that the cardinal was now very active in bringing to the stake one of the most eminent teachers of the protestant party. This was Mr. George Wishart, a man of honourable birth, who had distinguished himself by his piety and learning, and was universally beloved for the integrity of his heart, and the innocence of his manners. The cardinal received information, that Mr. Wishart was at the house of Mr. Cockburn, of Ormiston, in East Lothian. Upon this he immediately applied to the Regent, to cause him to be apprehended, with which, after great persuasion, and much against his will, he complied. Wishart was first carried to the house of Elphinstoun, where the cardinal then was, afterwards to the castle of St. Andrew's. Beaton resolved to proceed without delay to his trial, and for that purpose assembled the prelates at St. Andrew's on the 27th of February. At this meeting the Archbishop of Glasgow gave it as his opinion, that application should be made to the regent, to grant a commission to some nobleman to try the prisoner, that all the odium of putting so popular a man to death, might not lie upon the clergy. To this the cardinal agreed; but upon sending to the regent for this purpose, he received the following answer: "That he would do well not to precipitate this man's trial, but delay it until his coming; for as to himself, he would not consent to his death before the cause was very well examined; and if the cardinal should do otherwise, he would make protestation, that the blood of this man should be required at his hands." The cardinal was extremely chagrined at this message; however, he determined to proceed in the bloody business he had undertaken; and therefore sent the regent word, "That he had not written to him about this matter, as supposing himself to be any way dependent upon his authority, but from a desire that the prosecution and conviction of Heretics might have a shew of public consent; which, since he could not this way obtain, he would proceed in that way which to him appeared the most proper." Accordingly he indicted Mr. Wishart upon eighteen articles, though he appealed, as being the regent's prisoner, to a temporal judicatory; and condemning him as an obstinate Heretic, caused him to be burnt at St. Andrew's on the second of March, forbidding all persons to pray for him, under pain of incurring the severest censures of the church.

Cardinal Beaton (says Dr. Robertson) had not used his power with moderation equal to the prudence by which he attained it. Notwithstanding his great abilities, he had too many of the passions and prejudices of an angry leader of a faction, to govern a divided people with temper. His resentment against one part of the Nobility, his intolerance towards the rest, his severity to the Reformers, and, above all, the barbarous and illegal execution of the famous George Wishart, a man of honourable birth, and of primitive sanctity, wore out the patience of a fierce age; and nothing but a bold hand was wanting, to gratify the public wish by his destruction.

It is easy to imagine that this proceeding against Wishart made a great noise throughout the kingdom; such as were zealous papists, magnified the spirit and steadiness of the cardinal; others of more moderation, censured it as a rash and very imprudent action, which could not but be attended with very dismal consequences; and the friends of the protestant cause openly declared, that as it was done without due course of law, it ought to be considered as a murder; which, if unquestioned by the state, private men might revenge. As for the cardinal, he did not seem to be highly concerned at the rumours which his conduct in this matter had raised; he was so much persuaded in himself of his great interest among the nobility, that he did not apprehend any sort of danger from the regent's displeasure; and, on the other hand, he thought, that having embarked the whole clergy of Scotland in the same cause with himself, he was sure of all the interest they had among the people. There is a circumstance mentioned by several historians, which plainly proves, that the cardinal was, at the time we now mention, at the height of his fortune and wishes; and that he was intent upon nothing but the means of adding to, and securing the same prosperity for the future. For it appears that he went, soon after the death of Mr. Wishart, to Finhaven, the seat of the earl of Crawford, to solemnize a marriage between the eldest son of that nobleman, and his natural daughter Margaret; which was performed in great pomp and splendor. This fact is the clearest proof that the cardinal had no dread or terror upon his mind, but thought his condition as secure, if not more so, than ever; and we are likewise told that he stood in very high credit with the greatest men in the kingdom, when he was able to ally himself, by his illegitimate issue, to one of the most ancient and honourable families in Scotland. But while he

he was thus employed, and in the midst of his rejoicing, he received intelligence that an English Squadron was upon the coast, and that consequently an invasion was to be feared: upon this he immediately returned to St. Andrew's, and appointed a day for the nobility and gentry to meet, and consult about the proper means of raising such a force, as might be sufficient to secure them from any attempts of an enemy. He began likewise to strengthen the fortifications of his own castle at Saint Andrew's, into which he was at any time able to put a garrison sufficient to defend it. But the time of meeting not being come, and no farther news being heard of the English fleet, he was more intent upon rendering the castle tenatable against a foreign force, than solicitous about assembling such a number of men, or taking such other precautions, as might secure him from being surprised by his foes at home, of which he does not seem to have entertained the smallest suspicion.

While he was busy about these matters, there came to him the eldest son of the earl Rothes, Mr. Norman Lesley, a gentleman with whom he had a very intimate friendship: the design of his visit was to ask some favour, which he might expect to obtain; but the cardinal absolutely refused to grant it, and provoked him thereby to such a degree, that he went away in great displeasure. Now it happened that this gentleman's uncle, Mr. John Lesley, was one of the most violent enemies the cardinal had; as soon as he had heard therefore of the ill usage his nephew had received, he repaired to him immediately, and brought with him some other persons, who were inflamed against Beaton on account of his persecution of the protestants; and in the end it was agreed among them that the cardinal should be suddenly cut off. There were but very few concerned in this conspiracy, and of them the principal persons were Norman Lesley, John Lesley, William Kircaldy of Grange, Peter Carmichael of Fife, and James Melvil. The scheme they laid, was to meet at St. Andrew's with as much privacy as possible, and to surprize the castle in a morning before the cardinal's servants were stirring; and they entered into an agreement under their hands, to be at that city on the 28th of May, and to behave in the mean time in such a manner as to afford no room for suspicion. They accordingly met in the abbey church-yard, and determined that Kircaldy should take six persons with him to secure the gate; which he did, by engaging the porter in discourse till his master might be spoke with; when the two Lesley's coming up, with four other conspirators, they seized the porter and got possession of his keys. The next thing they did, was to send four persons to watch the cardinal's chamber, that he might have no notice given him of what was doing; they afterwards went and called up the servants, to whom they were very well known, and turned them, to the number of fifty, out at the gate, as they did above an hundred workmen employed in repairing the castle; but the eldest son of the regent, who lodged with the cardinal, they kept for their own security; all this being executed with so little noise, that Beaton never awoke. At length, however, they came and knocked at his chamber door; upon which, starting from his sleep, he cried out, "Who's there?" to which John Lesley made answer, "My name is Lesley;" "Which Lesley?" replied the cardinal: "Is it Norman?" "No matter," said John Lesley, "you must open the door to those who are here." However, instead of doing this, the cardinal instantly rose and began to barricade the door in the best manner he could; then the conspirators called for fire; but, while it was fetching, Beaton having conferred with them, upon a promise being made him that no violence should be offered towards his person, he opened the door, when the whole party rushing upon him with their naked swords, put an end to his life in an instant, notwithstanding the obligation they were under, by their assurance, to spare it.

Dr. Robertson observes, that those who were concerned in the assassination of Beaton, "delivered their country, though by a most unjustifiable action, from an ambitious man, whose pride was insupportable to the nobles, as his cruelty and cunning were the great checks to the reformation." "His death adds the historian) was fatal to the catholic religion, and to the French interest in Scotland. The same zeal for both continued among a great party in the nation, but when deprived of the genius and authority of so skilful a leader, was of small consequence. Nothing can equal the consternation which a blow so unexpected occasioned among his adherents; while the regent secretly enjoyed an event, which removed out of his way a rival, who had not only eclipsed his greatness, but almost extinguished his power." According to Dempster, Cardinal Beaton wrote "an account of his negotiations with the French king and the pope;" and "a treatise concerning St. Peter's supremacy over the rest of the apostles." Some copies of his letters are said to be preserved in the library of the French king.

The Life of Thomas Beauchamp.

Beauchamp (Thomas) earl of Warwick, distinguished by his bravery and conduct, was the eldest son of Guy, earl of Warwick, and was born in the year 1313. In his seventeenth year he took up his hereditary offices of sheriff of Worcesterhire, and chamberlain of the exchequer: and before he was twenty, king Edward III. made him governor of Guernsey, and the small islands adjacent. He attended that prince in his wars in Scotland and France, and did great service in the famous sea fight, in 1340. In the 18th of Edward III. he was constituted sheriff of Warwick and Leicesterhire for life, and the same year was created earl marshal of England. He commanded the van of the English army, and afterwards, for the great service he performed at the siege of Calais, had a thousand marks a year granted him during life. After this, he was present in the famous battle of Poitiers, where the king of France was taken prisoner, and where our earl fought so long, that his hand was extremely galled with using his sword and poll-axe; but he had the good fortune to take prisoner William de Melun, archbishop of Sens, for whom he received a ransom of eight thousand pounds. He attended Edward the Black Prince in several other campaigns; and in 1360 passed through France with a train of six hundred horse, in his passage passage to the east, where he made war with the Infidels for three years. This noble earl, who was one of the first knights of the garter, continued in the exercise of his military virtues, till his decease in 1369, when he commanded the king's army in France, and died there of the plague.

The Life of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick.

Beauchamp (Richard) earl of Warwick, one of the most renowned warriors of the age in which he lived, was grandson to the former; he was born at the manor-house of Salwarpe, in the county of Worcester, on the 28 h of January 1381, and was created knight of the Bath at the coronation of Henry IV. in 1399. In 1404 he distinguished himself in suppressing the rebellion raised by Owen Glendower, whose standard he took in open battle. In 1408 he obtained a licence from king Henry to visit the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem, in pursuance of a vow he had made. In his way thither, and in his return, he was received by many sovereign princes with great respect, and signalized himself by his bravery and success in several tournaments. He was constituted lord high steward at the coronation of king Henry V. and in the year 1415 was declared captain of Calais. He reduced to the king's obedience several towns and castles in France; for which services the king created him earl of Aumale, or Albemarle. King Henry afterwards sent him to the king of France, attended by 1000 men, to treat of a marriage between him and the princess Catherine, that king's daughter; but the dauphin, being sensible that this marriage was intended to defeat his succession, sent a body of 5000 men, under the command of the earls of Vendome and Limosin, to obstruct his passage, to whom the earl gave battle, in which both those noblemen were killed, one of them falling by the earl of Warwick's own hand, and about two thousand of their troops were either slain or taken prisoners. He then proceeded on his embassy, in which, notwithstanding the difficulties he had to struggle with, he happily succeeded. But as many places in France had declared for the dauphin, it was thought requisite to take the strongest of them, which was Melun, in order to set an example to the rest; and this place, which the French imagined impregnable, the earl took in fourteen weeks and four days. King Henry V. dying, committed to the earl of Warwick the tutelage of his son, then an infant. This noble lord died on the 30th of April 1539, in the castle of Rouen; and his body was brought over to England, and interred in the collegiate church of Warwick.

The Life of Lord Aubrey Beaulerk.

Beaulerk (Aubrey, lord) a brave but unfortunate commander, was the youngest son of Charles, duke of St. Alban's, by Diana, daughter of Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford. He went early to sea, and had the command of a ship given him in 1731. In 1741 he was sent upon the famous expedition to Carthage, under the command of admiral Vernon, in the Prince Frederick man of war, which, with three others, were ordered to cannonade the castle of Bocha-chica. One of these being obliged to quit her station, the Prince Frederick was exposed, not only to the fire from the castle, but to that of fort St. Joseph, and to two ships that guarded the mouth of the harbour, which he bravely sustained for many hours that day, and part of the next. As he was giving his commands upon deck, both his legs were shot off; but such was his magnanimity, that he would not suffer his wounds to be dressed till he had communicated his orders to his first lieutenant, which were to fight till the last extremity. Soon after he gave directions about his private affairs, and then resigned his soul with the dignity of a hero and a christian. Thus was the gallant Beaulerk taken off, in the thirty-sixth year of his age. He was equalled by few in politeness, modesty, candour, and benevolence. He married the widow of colonel Francis Alexander, a daughter of Sir Henry Newton, knt. envoy extraordinary to the court of Florence and Genoa. Soon after his death a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster abbey, adorned with his arms, trophies, and naval ensigns, and in an oval niche, on a beautiful pyramid of dove-coloured marble, is a fine bust of this young hero; on this pyramid is an historical inscription to the above purpose, and over it the following lines:

"Whilst Britain boasts her empire o'er the deep,
"This marble shall compel the brave to weep;
"As men, as Britons, and as soldiers, mourn:
"Tis dauntless, loyal, virtuous Beaulerk's urn.
"Sweet were his manners, as his soul was great,
"And ripe his worth, tho' immature his fate:
"Each tender grace that joy and love inspires,
"Living he mingled with his martial fires;
"Dying he bid Britannia's thunder roar,
"And Spain still felt him, when he breath'd no more."

The Life of Margaret Beaufort, Countess of Richmond and Derby

Beaufort (Margaret) Countess of Richmond and Derby, was the only daughter and heiress of John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, (grandson to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster) by Margaret Beauchamp, his wife. She was born at Bletshoe in Bedfordshire, in 1441. While she was very young, she was married to Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son named Henry, who was afterwards King of England, by the title of Henry VII. On the 3d of November, 1456, the Earl of Richmond died, leaving Margaret his Countess, a very young widow, and his son and heir, Henry, not above fifteen weeks old. Her second husband was Sir Henry Stafford, knight, second son to the Duke of Buckingham, by whom she had no issue. And soon after the death of Sir Henry Stafford, which happened about the year 1482, she married Thomas, Lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby.

The Countess of Richmond was greatly distinguished for her piety; though it was strongly tinged with the superstition of the times. Having heard a very high character of the piety, virtue, and learning, of Dr. John Fisher, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, she was extremely desirous of having him for her chaplain and confessor; and accordingly prevailed upon him to live with her in that capacity. It is said, that she committed herself, and her whole family to his his government and direction. It was her custom to rise about five o'clock in the morning, and from that hour till dinner-time, (which we are told, was in those days ten o'clock) she continued, almost without ceasing, in meditation and prayer; which she resumed again after dinner. Her charity was very great and extensive. She performed all her life-time so many noble acts and charitable deeds, that, as Stowe expresses it, "they cannot be expressed in a small volume." She kept constantly in her house twelve poor people, whom she provided with lodging, food, and clothes: And her high rank was so far from inspiring her with pride and haughtiness, that she would frequently dress the wounds of poor and distressed people with her own hands. We are also told as a further proof both of her humility and zeal for what she thought was for the interest of christianity, that she often declared, that, "on condition that the princes of christendom would combine themselves, and march against their common enemy the Turks, she would most willingly attend them, and be their laundress in the camp." She understood the French language perfectly, and had some knowledge of the Latin tongue; but would often lament, that in her youth she did not make herself a perfect mistress of it. She published "The Mirroure of Golde for the sinful soule;" translated from a French translation of a book called Speculum Aureum Peccatorum. She also translated out of French into English, the fourth book of Dr. Gerson's treatise "Of the imitation and following the blessed life of our most merciful Saviour Christ;" which was printed at the end of Dr. Atkinson's English translation of the first three books, in the year 1504.

She was a great patroness of learning, and of learned men; and she gave the strongest evidence of this by her munificent foundations. On the eighth of September, 1502, she instituted two perpetual public lectures in divinity, one at Oxford, and the other at Cambridge; each of which she endowed with twenty marks a year. And on the 30th of October, 1505, she founded a perpetual public preacher at Cambridge, with a salary of ten pounds a year, whose duty it was to preach at least six sermons every year, at several churches, specified in the foundation, in the dioceses of London, Ely, and Lincoln. But this institution has been since altered, by royal dispensation, to one sermon before the University, at the beginning of Easter-term. She also founded a perpetual chantry in the church of Winborne-Minster in Dorsetshire, where her father and mother lay buried, for one priest to teach grammar freely to all that would come, with a stipend of ten pounds a year. But the countess of Richmond's most noble foundations were, the colleges of Christ and St. John in Cambridge. The former was founded in the year 1505, for a master, twelve fellows and forty-seven scholars: The latter in 1508, for one master, and fifty fellows and scholars. Both these foundations have since been much enlarged. But the latter was scarcely begun before the foundress died; it was, however, completed by her executors, the chief of whom was bishop Fisher. It is now, by the munificence of several other benefactors, one of the largest and most considerable in the University of Cambridge.

This most exemplary lady, having lived sixty-eight years an ornament to her sex and a public benefit, departed this life the twenty-ninth of June, 1509. She was buried, with great solemnity, in the south-isle of the beautiful chapel built by Henry VII. adjoining to Westminster-abbey; and had a sumptuous monument erected to her memory.

Bishop Fisher observed of this illustrious lady, that by her marriage with the earl of Richmond, and by her birth, she was allied to thirty kings and queens, within the fourth degree either of blood or affinity: besides earls, marquesses, dukes, and princes. And since her death, as Mr. Baker says, she has been allied in her posterity to thirty more.

The Life of Mr. Francis Beaumont.

Beaumont (Francis) a celebrated dramatic poet, who, in concert with Mr. Fletcher, wrote a great number of plays, was descended from an ancient family of his name at Grace-Dieu in Leicestershire. His grandfather, John Beaumont, had been master of the rolls, and his father, Francis Beaumont, one of the judges of the common-pleas. Our poet was born in the year 1585, and received his education at Cambridge. He was afterwards admitted a student in the Inner Temple, but it does not appear that he made any great proficiency in the law, his passion for the muses being such, as made him entirely devote himself to poetry. He died in March, 1615, before he was thirty years of age, and was buried in the entrance of St. Benedict's chapel, within St. Peter's, Westminster. He left behind him a daughter, Frances Beaumont, who must then have been an infant, as she died in Leicestershire since the year 1700. She had in her possession several manuscript poems of her father's writing, but they were lost at sea in her voyage from Ireland, where she had lived some time in the family of the Duke of Ormond. Mr. Beaumont, besides the plays in which he was jointly concerned with Mr. Fletcher, wrote a small dramatic piece, entitled, A Masque of Gray's Inn Gentlemen, and the Inner Temple, a poetical epistle to Ben Johnson; with several other poems printed together in 1653.

Beaumont and Fletcher, as we have already observed, generally wrote in conjunction. The former was remarkable for the accuracy of his judgment; the latter, for the force of his imagination; and indeed Beaumont was esteemed to excellent a judge of dramatic compositions, that Ben Johnson submitted his writings to his correction, and, it is thought, was much indebted to him in the contrivance of his plots. What an affection he had for Mr. Beaumont appears from the following verses addressed to him. How I do love thee, Beaumont, and thy muse, That unto me do'st such religion use! How do I fear myself that am not worth The least indulgent thought thy pen drops forth, At once thou mak'st me happy, and unmak'st; And giving largely to me, more thou tak'st: What fate is mine, that so itself bereaves? What art is thine, that so thy friend deceives? When, even there where most thou praisest me, For writing better I must envy thee.

The Life of Archbishop St. Thomas Becket.

Becket (St. Thomas) archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Henry II. was the son of Gilbert Becket, a merchant of London, by Maud, or Matilda, a Saracen lady. He was born in London in the year 1119, and received the first part of his education at Merton-abbey in Surry; from thence he went to Oxford, and afterwards studied at Paris. On his return he was recommended by archdeacon Baldwin, as an understanding young man, to Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, who took him into his family, and bestowed upon him the benefices of St Mary le Strand, and Otford in Kent, with a prebend in London, and another in Lincoln. Thus provided, he set out for Bologna, where he studied the canon and civil law, which last was, at that time, in great request all over Europe; and finished his studies at Auxerre, in Burgundy. Being so well qualified to transact business in the court of Rome, he was sent thither by Theobald on several negotiations, which he managed with such ability and success, that his patron ordained him deacon of York; and he was elected archdeacon of Canterbury immediately before the death of king Stephen. At the accession of Henry II. to the throne, he was, by Theobald's recommendation, appointed chancellor; a post of the greatest profit, power, and dignity in the realm: at the same time he had a vast number of ecclesiastical preferments; was created constable of the tower, to which place was annexed all the knights service, with the honours of Eye and Berkhamsted, including near 300 knights. His revenues were immense; his expences incredible: he kept open table for persons of all ranks; the most costly dainties were purchased for his entertainments. His houses were adorned with the richest furniture; his apartments glittered with gold and silver plate; the very bridles of his horses were of silver, and nothing could exceed the magnificence of his equipage. The nobility sent their children to be educated as pages in his family: Prince Henry was committed to his care and tuition; and the king went frequently to see the pomp of his entertainments.

In 1159, he made a campaign with king Henry to Toulouse, having in his own pay 1200 horsemen, besides a retinue of 700 knights. In 1160, he was sent by the king to Paris, to treat of a marriage between prince Henry and the king of France's daughter; in which negotiation he succeeded, and returned with the princess to England. He had not enjoyed the chancellorship above four years, when archbishop Theobald died; and the king, who was then in Normandy, immediately sent over some trusty persons to England, who managed matters so well with the monks and clergy, that Becket was almost unanimously elected archbishop of Canterbury. Soon after his consecration, he resigned the office of chancellor, and exchanged the gaiety and luxury of a courtier for the gravity and austerities of a monk. At the same time, he began vigorously to exert himself in defence of the rights and privileges of the church, and in many cases, proceeded with so much warmth and obstinacy, as raised him enemies; and in a short time the king and he came to an open rupture. Henry endeavoured to recall certain privileges of the clergy, who had greatly abused their exemption from the civil courts, concerning which the king had received several complaints. The archbishop, however, stood up for the immunities of the clergy. The king convened a synod of the bishops at Westminster, and here he demanded that the clergy, when accused of any capital offence, might take their trials in the courts of justice. The question put to the bishops was, whether, in consideration of their duty and allegiance to the king, and of the interest and peace of the kingdom, they were willing to promise a submission to the laws of his grandfather, king Henry I. To this the archbishop replied, in the name of the whole body, that they were willing to be bound by the ancient laws of the kingdom, as far as the privileges of their order would permit. The king was highly displeased with this evasive answer, and insisted upon their absolute compliance, without any reservation whatever. But the archbishop would by no means submit, and the rest of the bishops adhered for some time to their primate. Several of the bishops being at length gained over, and the pope interposing in the quarrel, Becket was prevailed on to acquiesce; and soon after the king summoned a parliament at Clarendon, where several laws were passed relating to the privileges of the clergy, called from thence, the constitutions of Clarendon. Becket afterwards repenting of his compliance with these articles, retired from court, and would not officiate in the church, until he had received absolution from the pope. He went on board a ship, in order to make his escape beyond sea; but before he could reach the coast of France, the wind shifting about, he was driven back to England.

In October, 1165, the king summoned a parliament at Northampton, where the archbishop having been accused of failure of duty and allegiance to his majesty, was sentenced to forfeit all his goods and chattels. Becket made an appeal to the pope; but this having availed nothing, and finding himself deserted by his brethren, he withdrew privately from Northampton, and embarked in a small vessel for Graveline, in Flanders, from whence he retired to the monastery of St. Bertin. Hereupon the king seized the revenues of the archbishopric, and sent an ambassador to the king of France, desiring him not to give shelter to Becket; but the French court espoused his cause, in hopes that the misunderstanding betwixt him and Henry might embarrass the affairs of England; and accordingly, when Becket came from St. Bertin to Soissons, the French monarch paid him a visit, and offered him his protection. Soon after the archbishop went to Sens, where he was honourably received by the pope, into whose hands he made a formal resignation of the archbishopric of Canterbury, and was presently re-instated in his dignity by the pontiff, who promised to espouse his interest. Becket removed from Sens to the abbey of Pontigny in Normandy, from whence he wrote a letter to the bishops of England, informing them that the pope had annulled the constitutions of Clarendon. From hence too he thundered out excommunications against several persons who had violated the rights of the church. This conduct of his raised him many enemies. The king was so enraged against him for excommunicating several of his officers of state, that he banished all Becket's relations, and compelled them to take an oath, that they would immediately repair to Pontigny, and shew themselves to the archbishop. An order was likewise published, forbidding all persons to correspond with him by letters, to lend him any money, or so much as to pray for him in the churches. Henry wrote also to the chapter of Cisterians at Pontigny, threatening to seize all their estates in England, if they should continue to maintain Becket in their abbey; so that he was obliged to quit the convent, and returning to Sens, was hospitably received by the king of France, from whom he had an honourable allowance in the monastery of St. Colombe. Mean while, the bishops of the province of Canterbury wrote a letter to the archbishop, entreating him to alter his behaviour, and not to widen the breach, so as to render an accommodation between him and the king impracticable. This however had no effect on the archbishop. The pope also sent two cardinals to endeavour to reconcile matters; but these legates finding both parties inflexible, gave over the attempt and returned to Rome.

Becket was at length so far prevailed upon, as to have an interview with Henry and the king of France, at Mount-Miral in Champagne. He made a speech to Henry, in very submissive terms, and concluded with leaving him the umpire of the difference between them, saving the honour of God and the liberty of the church. Henry was so incensed at this reservation, that he told him he would allow of no such evasive subterfuge. "However (added the king) to shew my inclination to accommodate matters, I will make him this proposition: I have had many predecessors, kings of England, some greater and some inferior to myself; there have been likewise many great and holy men in the see of Canterbury. Let Becket therefore but pay me the same regard, and own my authority so far, as the greatest of his predecessors owned that of the least of mine, and I am satisfied. And, as I never forced him out of England, I give him leave to return at his pleasure; and am willing he should enjoy his archbishopric, with as ample privileges as any of his predecessors." All who were present declared that Henry had shewn sufficient condescension. The king of France being surprised at the archbishop's silence, asked him why he hesitated to accept such reasonable conditions. Becket replied, he was willing to receive his see upon the terms on which his predecessors held it; but as for those customs which broke in upon the canons, he could not admit them, for he looked upon this as betraying the cause of religion. Thus the interview ended without any effect.

In the year 1170, the king, upon his return to England, caused his son prince Henry to be crowned at Westminster, and the ceremony was performed by the archbishop of York; this office belonging to the see of Canterbury, Becket complained of it to the pope, who suspended the archbishop of York: and excommunicated the bishops who had assisted at the solemnity. The same year an accommodation was at length concluded between king Henry and Becket, soon after which the archbishop embarked for England: upon his arrival he received an order from the young king to absolve the suspended and excommunicated bishops; but refusing to comply, the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London and Salisbury, carried their complaints to the old king in Normandy, who was so highly exasperated at this fresh instance of Becket's obstinacy, that he could not forbear exclaiming with great warmth, "That he was very unfortunate to have maintained so many cowardly and ungrateful men in his court, none of whom would revenge him of the injuries he had sustained from one turbulent priest." These words were heard by four gentlemen of the court, who immediately formed a design against the archbishop's life, which they executed in the cathedral church at Canterbury, on the 29th of December, 1171. Upon this, all divine offices ceased in the church of Canterbury for one year, wanting nine days, at the end of which, by order of the pope, it was consecrated anew. Two years after his death, Becket was canonized; and in 1174 king Henry returning from France, went to Canterbury, where he did penance as a testimony of his grief for the murder. When he came within sight of the church where the archbishop was buried, he alighted off his horse, and he walked barefoot, in the habit of a pilgrim, till he came to Becket's tomb, where, after he had prostrated himself and prayed for a considerable time, he submitted to be scourged by the monks, and passed all that day and night without any refreshment, kneeling upon the bare stones; which done, he bestowed great benefactions upon the church of Canterbury. In 1221, Becket's body was taken up, in the presence of king Henry III. and a great concourse of the nobility and others, and deposited in a sumptuous shrine, erected at the expense of Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, which was soon visited from all parts, and enriched with the most costly gifts and offerings; and the miracles said to be wrought at his tomb were so numerous, that Gervase of Canterbury tells us, there were two large volumes of them kept in that church; though, forty-eight years after his decease, the doctors of the Sorbonne had a warm dispute whether he was saved or damned.

"He was, says the lord Lyttleton, a man of great talents, of elevated thoughts, and of invincible courage; but of a most violent and turbulent spirit; excessively passionate, haughty, and vain-glorious; in his resolutions inflexible, in his resentments implacable: it cannot be denied, that he was guilty of a wilful and premeditated perjury; that he opposed the necessary course of public justice, and acted in defiance of the laws of his country, laws which he had most solemnly acknowledged and confirmed; nor is it less evident, that during the heat of this dispute, he was in the highest degree ungrateful to a very kind master, whose confidence in him had been boundless, and who, from a private condition, had advanced him to be the second man in his kingdom."

A Letter from an Officer at New-York to his Friend in London.

Dear Sir,

I shall not here enter into a detail of the operations of war in which the king's troops have been so very successful, as the Gazette must, ere you receive this, have gratified your curiosity upon that, but shall acquaint you with some anecdotes that you might little suspect.

Notwithstanding the rebel commanders had all been represented as saints and heroes, entirely devoted to the good of their country, I can assure you this is not the case; as in the midst of war, and carnage, the destruction of towns and cities, they can find time for relaxation from the fatigues of war, and solace themselves in the arms of beauty. Several instances of their intrigues might be given; but at present I shall confine myself to one, which has made much noise, as the effects of this amour have been fatal to the enamorado, who now finds himself in a very pitiful plight.

The gentleman I mean, is no less a man than Mr. (soy-disant general) Washington. When he was in possession of New-York, he took a strong fancy to Mrs. Gibbons, a lady of beauty and good sense, who was a strenuous royalist; but finding herself in his power, and that if she had refused to yield to his intreaties, force would probably have been used, she resolved to make a virtue of necessity: she yielded, seemingly with complacency, to his request, and made him, what he called completely, happy. She frequently lay at his quarters; but as he promised that she should have free egress and regress, she was permitted to depart as early in the morning as she pleased, to have appearances at home; promising to return after she had been visible to the servants. This preliminary enabled her to put her design in execution, to rifle his pockets of his letters and dispatches, repair to a friend, Mr. James Clayford, who copied them in short hand, return with them by the appointed time, and replace them without suspicion.

By this manœuvre, general Howe became acquainted with all Washington's intended operations of the ensuing campaign, the number and condition of his troops, and all that was necessary to counteract them. Mr. Washington was astonished by the general's motions, to think that he should so amazingly hit upon the most judicious plans for frustrating his designs. He began, at length, to think he was betrayed; but could suspect no one but his secretary, in whom he had placed the most implicit confidence, and whose fidelity he thought he had put to the strongest test. The discovery was at length made of the transmitting of their papers by the treachery of Mye, Lellers, and Goff, who were members of a constitutional society, where Clayford assisted as a member, as well as Mr. Mathews mayor of New-York.

They alleged, upon Clayford's trial, that he secretly copied writings of the commander in chief, which were afterwards sent to be communicated to the foes of America; and that he had conceived a plan to seize the person of general Washington, and carry him off as a prisoner to the mercenary army: and that he used frequently to boast of his amours with Mrs. Gibbons, with whose assistance he proposed to seize the general. Clayford acknowledged his acquaintance with Mrs. Gibbons, but denied the rest of the charge. He was however, after a mock trial, without a jury, sentenced to be hanged, which sentence was afterwards executed. Mr. Mathews was found guilty upon the same accusations, and also ordered to be executed; but his sentence being postponed, he was sent to Connecticut, whence he has since made his escape.

When the rebels evacuated New-York, Mrs. Gibbons found means to be left behind, and the secret was revealed; and it may be said that this lady, at the price of so great a sacrifice, like another Pucelle d'Orleans, has saved her country.

You may, Sir, make what use you please of this letter. We are all in high spirits, and you shall hear farther from me very soon.

I am, &c.

P. S. Notwithstanding, at the beginning of my letter, I did not design to enter upon any thing that looked like politics, I cannot refrain mentioning a few particulars relative to the taking of New-York. When Washington fled from that city, he left about thirty of his people, or adherents, to perpetrate the horrid deed of setting fire to it, in which they too effectually succeeded, it being at once in a blaze in various quarters. The engines from the ships were brought on shore to stop the ravage of the flames; but these vile incendiaries, under pretence of passing for friends to the general, being furnished with axes, and similar instruments, in a great measure destroyed their effect, by cutting the leathern pipes, and destroying the buckets. One fellow in particular was detected in the very act: he was possessed of an axe, had a lighted link in his hand, and another was found concealed under his coat. His punishment was as follows: he was first run through the body with a sword, then hung by the neck for five minutes, and afterwards hung up by the heels till dead. He declared in his last moments, that in an hour's time he would have demolished the whole city, with the assistance of his accomplices. What is extraordinary, an old fat woman was detected in the act of setting fire to a house, and she was burnt in the flames she had kindled. A poor unhappy gentleman I could not help greatly pitying: seven contiguous houses belonging to him, which constituted his whole fortune, were all burnt; when sitting down upon the steps that remained of one (with a flood of tears) he said, "I am now sitting on all I possess in the world."

Anecdote of the Ephesian Matron.

THE gaiety, coquetry, not to say intrigues of this lady, have made a great noise. Some reports reached her father's ears, who, notwithstanding his own foibles, which are pretty glaring, was much chagrined at some thing which had transpired, and he could not refrain from remonstrating to her upon the occasion, when she made him no other answer, than by dancing out of the room, singing. "My mother did so before me."

To Delia.

I.

TIS not the lustre of the lilly fair,
Nor the mild blushes of the op'ning rose,
'Tis not her elegance of form and air,
That round my fair such sweet enchantment throws.

II.

Tho' in her eye love's brightest light'nings blaze,
Tho' her soft cheek ou'vie the peach's bloom,
Tho' o'er her bosom sportive Cupid trays,
And her lips breathe the rosy spring's perfume;

III.

Where then the charm that binds each captive heart,
That with resistless pow'r enchains the soul?
What to each look such magic can impart,
And every ruder passion thus controul?

IV.

'Tis beauty's self—in lovely Delia's face,
The soul of beauty animates each line,
Expression breathes o'er all a livelier grace,
And stamps perfection on the work divine.

V.

'Tis this with magic pow'r that beauty arms,
'Tis this that e'en my Delia can improve,
Diffuse a brighter lustre o'er her charms,
And wake each breast to wonder and to love.

Verses written in the first Leaf of Milton's Paradise Lost, being a College Premium, and presented to a young Lady, on New-Year's Day, 1776.

THESE from your friend, accomplish'd fair, receive,
With the best wishes that his heart can give.
In early youth he these from rivals bore,
By your acceptance, now rewarded more.
When you peruse these leaves, you'll there perceive

The disobedience of deluded Eve;
That angels have rebell'd, that man transgress'd,
Thence were his race with many woes oppress'd;
Their faults avoid, still virtue's path pursue,
And have perfection realiz'd in you.

Bedukah, or the Self-devoted, an Indian Pastoral.

By Eyles Irwin, Esq.

The scene of the following Pastoral lies on the coast of Coromandel, where the Gentoo religion generally prevails. The custom of women burning themselves on the decease of their husband is peculiar to the Gentoos.

Mr. Irwin, in the first Book of this Poem, introduces Lycon, an English gentleman, as a spectator of the self-devoted Widow, marching in solemn procession, accompanied by the Brahmins and her friends. The second Canto is as follows:

CANTO II.

BRIGHT Phœbus now emerging from the main,
Had shot his lustre o'er the crouded plain,
When young Bedukah (such the victim's name)
Which here the Muse ambitious gives to fame,

Hapless arriving at her journey's end,
Does calmly graceful from her steed descend:
Slow to the pile she walks with conscious pride,
Then gently turning casts her veil aside.
O could the Poet, like the Painter dare
Conceal the aspect of his suff'ring fair,
As o'er Atreides' grief a shade was throw'd,
Bedukah's beauties never had been known.
But truth and innocence his art command,
Inspire his fancy, and confirm his hand.
From soul to soul then soft amazement flew,
And glisten'd every cheek with pity's dew.
Affecting sight! for o'er her destin'd head
Not fifteen years with downy wings had fled;
Not fifteen years her eyes had view'd the light;
Those orbs now sinking to eternal night!
Her slender form was fraught with beauty's
pow'r;

But beauty waiting her meridian hour.
In purest white her faultless limbs were dress'd,
A silver girdle, and a muslin vest;
One breast was slightly hid, one half display'd,
Which, wild with youthful blood, luxuriant play'd.

Naked her arm, but where the bracelet shone,
Where lustre darted from each orient stone.
Her jetty locks with richest pearl were strung,
And from her nose a matchless diamond hung,
Clear as the crystal of her glossy eye,
And seeming with its brightest beams to vie.
Just to the knee her floating garment fell,
Which ill conceal'd the limb's harmonious swell;
And still the wind, assist'd by her pace,
Betray'd some beauty, and some latent grace
With solemn gesture, and an aspect kind,
Which spoke a resolute yet tender mind,
She paid obedience to the attentive crowd,
Then lowly to her weeping mother bow'd:
The mother trembling by her darling's side,
Flew to her bosom, and thus fondly cry'd:

' Ah, lov'd Bedukah! lov'd, alas, in vain!
' If from affection this my promis'd gain!
' This the reward of all my tender care,
' For rapture, anguish! and for hope, despair!
' Was it for this with conscious pride I glow'd,
' And bashful bare about the pleasing load?
' Was it for this that Hymen gaily smil'd,
' His torch a meteor that deceiv'd my child!
' Curst be the hour thy beauties knew the light,
' But doubly curst the matrimonial rite.
' Wou'd I had 'scap'd a mother's thankless pains,
' Or thou been deaf to love's seducing strains.
' O vain repinings! unavailing heat!
' With motion scarce my feeble pulses beat;
' My aged knees can scarce these limbs sustain,
' While sorrows weigh me to the dusty plain.
' Ah yet, Bedukah! yet consent to live,
' And life and spirit to thy parent give.
' Canst thou behold her sinking to the grave,
' And not stretch out thy pitying hand to save?
' Canst thou?—recall the sentence ere too late;
' On thy resolve depends my dubious fate:
' Thy mother swears her fate is in thy pow'r,
' Whether she live, or this her latest hour:
' The moment dread that gives thee to the flame,
' Devotes to ruin her decrepit frame:
' If this the legacy thy love bequeath,
' With thee united the will welcome death.—
' O blest event! O change for ever dear!
' Good bodes that sigh, and that repentant tear;
' Bedukah's

' Bedukah's hand the trembling parent shields,
 ' And all the daughter to affection yields!
 ' Yes, yes, my love, far hence we will retire,
 ' Far from this country, and this rav'nous pyre,
 ' Far from the place where this fell custom reigns,
 ' Where innocence is doom'd to fiery pains.
 ' To some lone desert we will shape our way,
 ' Leave men for savages more mild than they.
 ' Then come, my child—nor friend nor foe will dare
 ' To vent their malice, and pursue us there;
 ' No priest shall there to broach his mandates stand,
 ' Nor scandal hunt us through the dreary land.
 ' Thy father too, whom Heav'n propitious send
 ' Loaded with treasures to his journey's end,
 ' With heart-felt rapture shall applaud the voice
 ' Which sooth'd thy scruples, and made life thy choice.
 ' He with his fortunes, eagerly shall haste,
 ' And snatch us from the horrors of the waste;
 ' To some new clime our weary feet remove,
 ' And peace and joy in our endearments prove.'

So said the mourner, and had further said,
 But now her tongue to utterance is dead:
 Contending passions all her soul oppress,
 And now the hopes, and now the doubts success;
 Till in despair she casts her eyes below,
 And groans, and looks a spectacle of woe.

Nor bare Bedukah a less trying part,
 Her mother's words had deeply pierc'd her heart;
 The dread resolve of one she held so dear
 Woke the keen pang, and forc'd the tender tear.

But still, whate'er her sadden'd looks express,
 She rose superior as arose distress.
 With solemn grace her mother's hand she took,
 And thus address'd her with a soften'd look:

' And lives the mother at whose breast I hung,
 To use in vain her supplicating tongue?
 Am I so cruel and rebellious grown,
 To hear, unmov'd, her melancholy moan?
 To soothe her sorrows with a fruitless tear,
 And in my purpose still to persevere!
 O! shake this weakness from thy tender breast,
 Forget a wretch thy kindness should detest.
 Sooner the tyger shall with pity glow,
 Rude rocks be soften'd at the plaint of woe;
 The tempest cease, when houseless vagrants plead,

Than stubborn virtue from her path recede.

Tho' terror, peril, ruin bar the way,
 When virtue calls, her votaries obey;
 Obey with joy, as her decrees require,
 To Hymen's altar, or the funeral pyre;
 To the dear youth eternal truth to swear,
 Or here to find a wish'd release from care!
 Yes, fondest object of my aching heart,
 Bedukah joins thee, ne'er again to part;
 Lo! here she stands her plighted faith to prove,
 Nor deems the sacrifice too great for love.
 O! yet withhold thy passage to the skies,
 My soul in ecstasy with thine would rise;
 One moment gives me to th' insatiate flame,
 In death unites us, and unites in fame—
 And thou dear author of my life, adieu!
 These streaming eyes must take their parting view;
 On me no more shall smile that honour'd face,
 These looks our last! and this our last embrace!

Tho' nature pleads, and human weakness feels,
 A voice divine my doom terrific seals.
 Say, with what woes futurity is fraught,
 (Cruel to speak, and horrible to thought!)
 How lost to hope! how lost my honest name!
 Should I consent to lead a life of shame.
 An husband's fate should I refuse to share,
 He to his bosom takes a kinder fair;
 False to my love, he falsehood shall requite,
 And shun my steps in regions of delight.
 If dark and dismal then the prospect there,
 What here remains but horror and despair?
 Cast from the seat my former title gave.
 The widow's mistress must become the slave.
 The mere idea worse than death appears—
 To barter honour for a length of years!
 Elicap'd from calumny's restless tide,
 Allow some foreign clime my shame might hide,
 No solitude the sting of guilt disarms,
 Nor lenient time, nor e'en a mother's arms.
 And thou, whose love this abject step advis'd,
 Couldst thou care for a coward so despis'd?
 Who could so low thro' fear of death descend,
 And meanly live, to shun a glorious end!
 O! let me die while to thy bosom dear,
 Nor meet a father's brow and curse severe;
 While youth and love and fame unspotted bloom,
 Through tort'ring flames Bedukah seek the tomb.'

The Fond Mother.

*Mollissima corda

 Quæ lacrymas dedit.*

Juv.

SOLEMN, sincere, from yonder gloomy shades,
 The voice of woe my boding ear invades;
 I see a woman, thro' the darksome trees,
 All clad in white, upon her bended knees:
 The lovely mourner kisses the cold sod,
 The cold sod kisses, and exclaims to God.

Thou hast, O Lord! laid low my darling son,
 Thou hast, O Father! and thy will be done!
 From thy high throne, all wise, all good, all just,
 Thou knowest what is best for human dust.
 Yet pardon a frail woman, for his sake,
 Who having wept, bade Lazarus awake;
 If still I cannot, as a christian ought,
 Subdue this weary turbulence of thought;
 If still I cannot stop the stealing tear,
 Nor, for my life, forget who still lies here.
 Part of myself, how lately did he rise
 Fair in my sight, and flourish to the skies,
 Like some tall plant which by the river grows,
 And every year some recent beauty shows.
 This was the least—what pleasure did I find,
 To mark the opening graces of his mind;
 His early love of wisdom and of truth,
 How soon religion won the hopeful youth,
 How soon the knowledge of a Saviour sprung
 Within his breast, did animate his tongue;
 His life did beautify, his soul did raise
 To love incessant, and incessant praise.
 He was my darling, that is true, and led
 The years sweet-smiling round my blooming head,

Expanded every hope, and every joy:
 But now my every hope, my dear, dear boy
 Is rotting in the dust—What do I say?
 He mounts redeemed, and he lives for aye.

From

From east to west the happy tidings fly,
 The dead in a Redeemer do not die.
 He lives for ever, in his shining sphere,
 Exempt from pain, and separate from care;
 He lives for ever, on seraphick wings
 From star to star, from sun to sun he springs.
 Why then this timelefs grief? I do not know,
 Except the human heart will have it so.
 For, though I know my sorrow is in vain,
 The more I grieve, the more I would complain;
 And though I know my child exalted flies,
 Wrapt through the blest assembly of the Lies:
 I find I cannot check the coming tear,
 Nor, for my life, forget what still lies here.
 She stopt—together with a ghosly knell.
 The dying dirge flew down the tinkling dell.

Ode to Peace.

COME, lovely nymph, whom glad some gales
 Convey along the smiling vales,
 Propitious Peace! appear once more
 Triumphant on thy fav'rite shore;
 Here once again resume thy sway,
 That all may smile, and all may pray.

Enough we know of civil gore,
 Thy speedy presence to implore,
 Too long calamitous debate
 Has shaken this renowned state,
 The Virtues weep, the Muses mourn,
 And heave each breast for thy return.

Without thee, Peace, how worthless all
 The riches of this ample hall;
 Small joy but what thou dost impart,
 And little good, but where thou art;
 All human ornaments proceed
 From thee, and every noble deed.

Where dost thou wander, lovely maid,
 Till Concord sheath the reeking blade?
 On Snowden dost thou sit and weep,
 Despondent to the shaggy steep?
 By reedy Shannon, or the seas
 That wash the beaten Hebrides?

Thou canst not wholly leave the land,
 Where thou and Freedom, hand in hand
 So long have sported, and so long Assisted Science, Commerce, Song;
 So long made gentle Isis smile,
 And Liffey grace a neighbouring isle!

Come to thy Isis, come again
 To hear a Warton's melting strain,
 See many tuneful bards repair
 To that sweet place, and warble there;
 While the full chorus, down the stream,
 Flows emulous of Grecian fame!

Come, kindly spirit, and reside
 Once more upon the banks of Clyde,
 Where Richardson awakes his lay,
 Chaste as his knowledge, and as gay:
 By Liffey likewise, yet proclaim
 Deserving bards, I cannot name.

Should that avenging day arrive,
 That might thee altogether drive

From hence; what nation could aspire
 To what thy presence doth require?
 Shew christianity so pure,
 And souls that would so much endure?

It cannot be,—the thought was wide,
 Since Providence supports our side;
 To make us yet more wise and good,
 The present war be understood;
 More wise and good then let us be,
 That all returning Peace may see.

A Song. On a Lady recovered from a Fit of Sickness. By the Rev. J. D. L. C.

I.
BEAUTY, whom sickness late essay'd,
 Now trod the scented grove;
 Sun like emerging from the shade,
 That quite eclipsed my love.

II.
 To make reprisals on the Spring,
 She sought the silvan bow'r,
 The Sylphs and Loves were on the wing,
 And perch'd on ev'ry flow'r.

III.
 The v'lets had but shewn their head,
 Young daughters of the year,
 And peep'd above their purple beds
 To see their goddess near.

IV.
 For winter too had stain'd her skin,
 And kept the rose retir'd,
 Disease had lock'd the lilly in,
 And ev'ry bloom expir'd.

V.
 The sun and she put on their rays,
 At once to green the lawn,
 With brighter radiance dress'd the days,
 And bid the primrose dawn.

VI.
 The garden glow'd at their approach,
 And blush'd with sudden heat,
 When Venus lighted from her coach,
 And bid the seasons wait.

On a Lady's Hand. By the Rev. J. D. L. C.

FINE as her taper fingers flow my veins,
 Soft as her hand, and shining as her veins,
 Turn'd as her wrist the lines, and smooth as silk,
 Feel like her palm, where roses swim in milk.
 These o'er my verse a warmer shadow shed,
 And tipt her fingers with a painted red;
 Thro' the blue veins in riper moisture flow,
 And seem to melt with heat the neighb'ring snow.
 The neighbouring snow dissolv'd, in roses blends,
 And with carnations decks her fingers ends:
 Between the leaves the streaks of snow look bright,
 And daisy like are dash'd with red and white.

Think with what lustre o'er her lap it lay,
 And o'er her apron drew the milky way;
 Coarse look'd the cambrick to a hand so fine,
 And shades of lawn are net-work to her skin;
 On her fair fingers brilliant diamonds glow,
 And burn like Ætna between hills of snow.

Cibber's Epilogue, written by himself; spoken by him in the character of Fondlewise, in the year 1742.

NOW worn with age and yet in folly strong,
 Now to ad parts your grand-fires saw when young
 What could provoke me? I was always wrong.

To hope in years I should advance in merit :
E'en age, when acted, asks a youthful spirit.
To know my wants, and shew them thus detected,

Is living to the dotage I have acted.
Perhaps my folly once excus'd might be,
*When I but play'd the fool for charity.
But why repeated? Is the devil in ye?
No, Sirs, like doctors now, I touch the guinea;
And, while I find my physic does affect you,
'Twere greater folly still, did I neglect you.
Tho' this excuse at White's they'll ne'er allow me.
The ralliers there in different lights will shew
me.

They'll say, I only play'd the part, sly rogue,
To fondle cockey. Ah, the doting dog!
And, howsoe'er the audience might regard me,
One kiss of Nykin amply would reward me.
Let them enjoy the jest with laugh incessant,
For, true or false, or right or wrong, 'tis pleasant.

Mixt in the wisest heads we find some folly,
But I've found few such happy fools as Colly,
So long to bear the daily Satyr's stroke,
And stand such blows as would have fell'd an oak,

Yet liv'd to laugh the labour'd libel to a joke.
Suppose the want of feeling proves me dull,
What's my aggressor then? A peevish fool.
The strongest satyr is on blockheads lost,
For none but fools or madmen beat a post.
If for my follies larger lists ye call,
Go read my life, there I have lump'd them all.
There you'll see vanity wild hopes pursuing,
A vain attempt to save the stage from ruin;
There, I confess, I have outdone my own out-doing.

For what remains of life, if yet 'twill do,
'Tis at your service, pleas'd, when pleasing you.
But then, d'ye hear? Pronounce when you've enough;
One sinking house declares both parties off;
Or, truth in homely proverb to advance,
I'll pipe no longer than you'll chuse to dance.

Stanzas, humbly inscribed to the right hon. Earl of Mansfield, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench.

OTHOU! in whom each brighter virtue joins,
Alike in letters and expression great,
Whose generous soul no partial view inclines,
To warp thy justice from her steady seat!
Sav shall a muse from Shannon's stately shore,
(Shannon that rolls in majesty of tide,)
Untaught to try such lofty themes before,
Her-Mansfield sing—of Britain's seas the pride?

NOTE.

* Cither had performed some short time before for an object of distress.

Mark, with what judgment thro' th' intricate maze

Of dubious Law his watchful eye explores;
Justice in fairest robes of white displays,
And falsehood with resistless truth o'er pow'rs.
Whilst at the Bench admiring crowds attend,
And hang with rapture on thy manly sense;
Conviction learns the stubborn heart to bend,
And sweet persuasion charms, with eloquence!

Nor yet does rigid justice nerve thy arm,
To pour relentless terror o'er the mind;
When trembling Pris'ners hear the dread alarm,
And Death with gloomy horror stands behind.

Ah! no,—Compassion swells that speaking eye,

Expressive looks convey the sad report,
Th' expanded soul dissolves into a sigh,
Whilst pity melts the sympathizing court!
Equal in senate are thy pow'rs confess'd,
When some great object glides upon thy tongue
Whilst Britain's glory kindling in thy breast, Glow with fresh ardour thro' th' illustrious throne.

Bless in thy country's love, where all conspire
To give that incense gratitude demands;
Envy herself stands silent to admire,
Abash'd, whilst so much dignity commands!
E'en here the Muse can feel a gen'rous shame, Charm'd with those virtues that adorn thy brow;

Virtues that soar upon the wings of fame,
And shed a lustre good men only know.

Extempore, on a Pipe of Tobacco.

[By the late Dr. Parnell, not printed in his works.]

THRO' worthless tube of brittle clay,
Will I some serious thoughts convey;
My native frailty here I trace,
A perfect type of human race:
Exotic is the noisome plant,
Exotic all, for which I pant,
With sick'ning fumes the air I choke,
What's worldly grandeur but a smoke?
The quick'ning whiffs declare the strife
Of those who gasp for parting life;
The heap of dust that's left behind,
Displays the fate of all Mankind.

Lines sent in an Almanack for the year 1777, as a present to a Lady.

AS year on year succeeding rolls along,
Let virtuous friendship still compose my song.
Be that my theme; nor let a month pass o'er,
Save to improve that blessing more and more.
May ev'ry week its basis firm unite,
May ev'ry day afford it fresh delight,
May ev'ry hour some unknown joy inspire,
May ev'ry minute blaze its purest fire,
Nor for a moment let it ever tire.
Thus when our years our days and hours are spent,
Pleas'd with each other, we shall die—content.

Prologue to the new Tragedy of Gerilda, or the Siege of Harlech. Written by a Friend, and spoken by Mr. Ryder.

BY bright example, precept to enforce,
To trace each fine emotion to its source,
To form the manners, and refine the age,
Were the great objects of the rising stage.
Hence Grecian bards caught the extatic flame,
Hence Roman poets found immortal fame;
Hence Shakspeare glows with a diviner art,
Excites the passions and explores the heart.
But wherefore form our scenes from Greece or Rome

When glorious models may be found at home?
Is worth alone in Latian bosoms found,
And valour but the growth of classic ground?
In Scythian wilds, full many a hero bled,
Unnotic'd living, unregard'd dead.
No clime to virtue bars the gen'rous claim,
Thro' every age, in every land the same,
With steady boldness, and with honest rage,
It fires the savage, and it warms the sage.
And must the noble ardour be depress'd,
Because it animates a British breast?
Forbid the thought!—To foreign merit kind,
You cannot be to native genius blind.

Here when our bard his first production try'd,
To you he gave its fortune to decide;
Coulcious of favour, certain of success,
Shou'd you with kind applause, his labours bless:
You smil'd—Th' event declar'd his judgment
true,

And sister kingdoms form'd their taste, from you.

The nice criterion once again he tries,
On well known candour, once again relies;
As you approve, content to risk his name,
And on your smiles or frowns—He rests his fame.

Epilogue to the same, awritten by a Friend, and spoken by Miss Barsanti.

THESE tragic bards must sure be gloomy creatures,
Who deal in nought but melancholy features;
In trumpets, drums, in sieges, battles, dying,
In sable Cupids—and in doleful sighing.
In things most strange that strike the Gods with wonder,
In wiches, spirits, traps, and rattling thunder—
What heart but shrinks, when thro' the yawning stage,
Pale spectres rife attention to engage!
What bosom does not feel a taint of fear,
When rolling bullets shake our wooden sphere!
Melpomene, when pleasures all forsake her,
Stalks forth a mere dramatic undertaker;
A pretty way indeed to be delighted,
First to be drown'd in tears, and then affrighted.
Would sober reason ever strive to borrow Bright beams of pleasure—from dark clouds of sorrow;

For my own part—I hope you'll all agree—
I like the smiles of laughing comedy;
In which the verbal muse more sweetly sings,
Than when the bellows thro' the throats of kings—

Not but I think a little serious love sometimes does rue 'l—and may fine feelings move,
January, 1777.

Tho' nothing practis'd in the ways of men,
Love is I scarce knew what, and goes I know not when.

Yet what's the reason, gentlefolks! that I
Because I make you laugh—can't make you cry?

Upon my life—I've twenty minds to try.
For a small sample—see this polish'd dagger—
[Taking out her fan.

I hope the sight won't make your courage stag-ger.—

This is thy sheath—there rest and let me die—
I won't fall down, as here's no lover nigh.—
Shall I like Deldemona yield to death,
And tamely let a husband stop my breath?
One way there is I shou'd not think amiss,
I'd challenge him to stop it with a kiss.

Or wou'd you madness wish, that may af-fright,
Dishevel'd hair—wild eyes—to strike your sight,

I'll take a touch at them—but not to night.

This piece, no doubt, imported neat from Wales,

You've fairly weigh'd in criticism's scales.
Why shou'd I plead—the author's in no danger,
Hibernia's sons ne'er yet oppress'd a stranger.
What say ye, critics? is it no or aye?
Your smiles acquaint me that your hearts comply;

Inform him then, behind he anxious stands,
And only lives by your protecting hands.

An Ode performed at the Castle of Dublin, on Saturday the 18th of January, 1777; being the Day appointed for the Celebration of the Birth Day of her most excellent and sacred Majesty Queen Charlotte.

RECITATIVE, Accompanied.

LET the soft captivating strains
Of swelling harmony begin!
In tuneful numbers let the swains
The viceroy's due attention win!
Hibernia, charm'd, will animate the lay
That welcomes in great Charlotte's nat'l day.

A I R.

Hail, day of joy! great queen, renown'd,
Belov'd, with ev'ry virtue crown'd!
The social titles all are thine—
They make thee great illustrious shine;
The muse can with delight commend
The wife, the mother, and the friend.

RECITATIVE,
Ne'er may corroding cares her breast intrude,
For such can no admission find
Within the bright, accomplish'd mind,
That knows the joy of heav'nly solitude.

A I R.

Britons, admire her blest retreat,
Kind nature's hospitable seat,
Which every good contains!
Where, from invidious scenes of state
Secure, and eminently great,
Virtue triumphant reigns.

RECITATIVE.

There happy, free from public strife,
Our Queen enjoys the sweets of life;

Blest with her lovely, blooming race,
With whom our hopes and joys enclose;
Future sceptres they shall wield,
Shine in courts, and grasp the shield.

A I R.

Long live our king, t' instruct their youth
How to rule where freedom reigns;
More than crowns to value truth,
And bind hence tyranny in chains.

D U E T T.

May those heirs of royal blood,
Prosperous, healthy, wise, and good,
Thro' ev'ry age arise,
'Till seasons leave the circling years,
'Till Heav'n dissolves its radiant spheres,
'Till CHARLOTTE's virtue disappears
Or GEORGE's glory dies.

C H O R U S.

Amen, with heart and voice,
Hibernia's sons will thus rejoice.

Political Character of Mr. Dunning.

THIS eminent lawyer, distinguished orator, and more distinguished patriot, made his first appearance on the public stage during the administration supposed to have been formed, and for some months to have been conducted, by the Earl of Chatham. He was appointed Solicitor General at his lordship's accession into power; and as long as he remained in office, discharged the duties of it with real integrity and ability. His talents recommended him to the noble lord last mentioned, when the first prince in Europe would have been glad to be honoured with his lordship's friendship, and when the foreign and domestic foes of Britain trembled at the thunder of his voice; when the secret favourers of despotism lay in concealment, and a government unconnected with the cabinet, a constitutional parliament, or the people, had not been, as yet, publicly manifested, or consequently avoided.

The time at length arrived, when Mr. Dunning could no longer endure his situation. At the commencement of that celebrated session (1770) which will be transmitted to future ages, by the expressive and well-suited description of the horned cattle session, when the minds of all men were occupied respecting the petitions concerning the decision relative to the Middlesex election, and great expectations were formed relative to the manner those great points would be taken notice of in the speech from the throne, that ministerial performance very gravely recommended to parliament, to provide the best means of preventing the infection, which might arise from the distemper that lately broke out among the horned cattle, from spreading. Mortified to the quick at such a solemn mockery, he thought, of every thing that was great and sacred, as soon as a motion was made for introducing an amendment to the address, in answer to the king's speech, he rose and apologized to the house. He said, that nothing but his ill state of health would have prevented him from giving his opinion in detail upon the present critical state of affairs; but more particularly on that part of the amendment proposed by his honourable friend*, which was, to take into the most serious consideration the proceedings in that house, touching its late vote for incapacitating John Wilkes, Esq; but he could not content himself with a silent vote, nor sit down without assigning his two leading reasons for voting for the amendment. One was, that a general uneasiness and discontent had gone forth among the people; the other, because he thought the words of the amendment would be some mark to the public, that the national grievances would, as they ought, come under the consideration of parliament.

As a man of spirit, as well as principle, he immediately resigned: but offered very generously to discharge the duties of his office, till another fit person should be pitched upon to succeed him. In this situation, during the several great changes which happened in the course of nine or ten weeks, particularly the resignation of the duke of Grafton, and the appointment of lord North in his room, he remained inflexible, though often in the interim pressed to relume his post. At length, all attempts to bring him back to his former situation proving fruitless, our present worthy Attorney General was appointed Solicitor in his place.

From that time to the present, Mr. Dunning has continued in opposition, and has been felt by administration, as a most powerful, weighty, and galling antagonist. To point out the particulars, would in fact be to give a history of almost every leading question agitated in parliament for the last six years. We cannot, however, pass that part of his parliamentary conduct in silence, which relates to America, without relinquishing the general motives which first induced us to the present undertaking, that of marking, by the event of the present unnatural civil war in America, the comparative wisdom, public virtue, and political value, not only of the two parties which at present divide this nation, but likewise the several leading individuals of which each is composed.

The first question relative to America, which Mr. Dunning distinguished himself particularly in, was the celebrated Quebec bill. In the course of that struggle between constitutional freedom and arbitrary power, though he had the whole phalanx of professional mercenaries, as well as the weight of the treasury-bench, and all their immediate associates and dependents, to contend with, he proved two positions, too evident to be evaded and too clear to admit of a minute's serious controversy or impartial discussion. He proved that the constitution intended to be given to the people of Canada by the bill, was essentially the same in form, and more liable to abuse than the one they enjoyed under the crown of France; and that the ecclesiastical establishment granted to them under the idea of a mere liberty of conscience, or a permission for the free exercise of their religion, was intended to cheat them out of their civil liberty, as British subjects. It was intended, he said, to operate two ways; first, for the purpose of establishing arbitrary power power in that vast extent of country, comprised within the limits described in the bill; and secondly, to employ that power, thus modified and rendered obedient to the will of the possessor, in assisting to overthrow the liberties of America.

He has ever since strictly adhered to the same line of conduct. He does not barely confine himself in detecting the blunders of administration; his opposition has been general; and if truth and the most able and intimate knowledge of the laws and constitution of his country were to decide uniformly in St. Stephen's chapel, we may venture to affirm, without any imputation of partiality, that he would at least sometimes prove victorious, and vote in a majority. He exhibited frequent proofs in the course of the last session, and indeed in the two preceding, of his early fathoming the intentions of administration. He predicted the consequences of the proposed parliamentary address to his majesty in January 1775, declaring and offering to support his majesty with their lives and fortunes. He was no less sagacious and penetrating in the court doctrines meant to be established and drawn hereafter into precedent, relative to the introduction of foreign troops into any part of the dominions of the British crown, without the previous consent of parliament. The apparent tendency of the militia bill soon attracted his notice; nor was he less sagacious in discerning in the earliest stages of the capture act (long before the new Secretary's entrance into power had totally altered the parliamentary language of the ostensible minister) as he thought, the determined resolution of its secret advisers and professed conductors to force America into open rebellion, to gratify some body, and verify their own repeated predictions; as it must follow, that the Colonists finding themselves reduced to the alternative of submitting like slaves, or being doomed to inevitable destruction, would declare themselves independent, as the first step to the procuring of foreign assistance.

This will, we presume, convey some tolerable idea of the political opinions and public conduct of Mr. Dunning during the last six years; and will likewise serve to shew hereafter, whether he be, or be not, as good a speculative statesman as he has been long known to be a great lawyer and able orator. We would wish not to consider him particularly under the latter description, because we are conscious of our own inability to do him justice, and at the same time to meet the approbation of either his friends or adversaries. Were we asked, Is Mansfield more acute, discerning, persuasive, or pointed? is Camden more penetrating, logical, or ingenious? is Burke more flowing, elegant, comprehensive, well-informed, or sarcastically witty? we should certainly answer, No. Is Thurlow as sound a lawyer, or Wedderburne as able an advocate? we should still reply in the negative. But again, if we were asked, Is Mr. Dunning, in his present state of health, as good an orator as any of those? truth would compel us to say, he is not.

HISTORICAL

Calais, November 22.

ON the 19th ult. a large brigantine, with a number of guns mounted, and full of men, supposed to have been an American vessel, foundered about sixteen leagues from the above place, and all the crew were drowned.

Utrecht, Nov. 28. In the night of the 20th of this month there was a most dreadful inundation almost equal to that which happened last year: Delfhaven suffered most, as the waters rose there one inch and a half higher than they were last year, and breaking down the repairs which had been made and were making in the dyke, ran with such impetuosity through the streets, that every one was in fear for the grand lock or sluice, upon the standing of which the preservation of the whole town depended: But by the wise measures taken by those who had the direction, and the indefatigable labour of the workmen, the force of the torrents of water were stopped, and we are in hopes that the country is out of danger for the present. The dyke which goes from Delfhaven to Rotterdam and Scheidam was with very great difficulty preserved; part of the city of Rotterdam was overflowed, and the water rose there half an inch higher than last year. It was remarkable, that the rising of the water lasted nine hours, which is full four hours and a half longer than usual. The waters undermined some of the ramparts of Haerlem, carried away part of the Liebrug, and overflowed most of the suburbs of that city. This vast rise of water was in a great measure occasioned by a violent north west wind, which blew down many chimnies, tore up trees, and untiled houses; but happily we do not hear of any lives lost, or cattle drowned.

Berlin, Nov. 30. Her royal highness the Princess Ferdinand of Prussia was delivered yesterday morning, at six o'clock, of a prince, at her country palace of Fredericksfeldt.

SCOTLAND.

Edinburgh, Dec. 17. A genteel bounty has been allowed to a grocer in this city, by the society of London, for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce, as a testimony of their approbation of his great improvement on the diving bell. By this new invention, the persons in the bell lower themselves with the machine, from the surface of the water to the bottom, independent of all other assistance, and at pleasure return. The dangers of being overturned by rocks, slumps of wrecks, &c. are hereby avoided; and except in rapid currents, or a very unequal bottom, the men in the machine can proceed with it to a considerable distance from the line in which they go down. It is thought this improvement on Dr. Halley's diving-bell will be of great utility in coasts and rivers, as well as at sea, for the discovery of marble and mines.

Birmingham, Dec. 12. Friday evening last, or early on Saturday morning, some villains, by means of a large iron couller, with which they forced out some of the bars of the window, broke into the parish church of Solihull, in this county, county, from whence they stole the gold fringe belonging to the velvet cloth of the pulpit and desk.

The parish church of Knowle was also attempted, but the people in an adjoining house being up, discovered the villains, who immediately made off without any booty.—The parish church of Honnily has likewise been attempted, but there also being disturbed, they made off without accomplishing their design.

On Monday night, the 2d instant, some villains broke into Quarendon church, and robbed it of the communion plate and linen, viz. a silver cup and cover; upon the cup was engraved Quarendon, with a Latin inscription, which is forgot; they also took a napkin and one breadth of a new surplice, which it is supposed was torn off to wrap up the other part of their spoil.

The parish churches of Bingham and Ratcliff upon Trent, both in Nottinghamshire, were broke open on Sunday night, the 1st instant, and robbed of various articles, particularly the latter of a silver chalice.

On Thursday night last, or early on Friday morning, the parish church of Kenilworth, in the county of Warwick, was broke open by several villains, with an intent, as is supposed, to steal the communion plate and other things of value, but missing the place where those articles were deposited, they decamped without their booty.

19.] Last night were interred in Westminster Abbey, the remains of the most noble Elizabeth, Duchess of Northumberland. By her Grace's repeated desires, the funeral, though decent and solemn, was as private as it could be, consistent with her rank. About ten o'clock, the procession moved from Northumberland House in the following order:—First a gentleman on horseback; then four conductors on horseback with staves; four horsemen in cloaks, who, as well as the former, went two and two.—A gentleman carried a banner, on which were emblazoned the principal quarters of her Grace's arms: If they had all been displayed, they would have amounted to 156 quarters.—Four horsemen in cloaks, two and two.—A gentleman of the household on a grey horse, led by two pages, bore her Grace's coronet on a cushion of crimson velvet.—Then came the hearse ornamented with escutcheons, penons, &c.—This was followed by six coaches and six, in which were two chaplains, and ten gentlemen in cloaks as deep mourners.—Then came her Grace's own chariot empty, drawn by six horses, attended by her footmen, which closed the procession.

At the west door of the Abbey church, the corpse was met by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Rochester, as Dean of Westminster, attended ended by the Chapter and full Choir, &c. who performed the last offices in the most solemn and respectful manner.

The same day his Grace the Duke of Northumberland ordered 600*l.* to be given away in charity, of which five hundred were distributed in several parishes to the poor of Westminster, the remainder to such as reside near the families and castles in the country, which his Grace desired might be considered as a donation to their late most generous benefactors.

[.] Early in the evening of Wednesday, marriages had gained admittance within the iron hat leads to the chapel in Westminster-Abbey, where the remains of her Grace the late Duchess of Northumberland were deposited, and of whom had placed themselves upon stools, and other parts, the better to see the obsequies as it passed; and a number of men and women had climbed up, and seated themselves over the front of St. Edmund's chapel, which joins to that of St. Nicholas. The Dean and attendants had not passed the above-mentioned place above three minutes, before the whole front came down, consisting of thick, heavy oak, with iron bars, and part of the stone-work, supped, in the whole, to be upwards of three ton weight. Among others were the following accidents:—One gentleman had both his legs broke; a little boy met with the same misfortune; three persons had their arms broke, and were otherwise hurt; a serjeant, or soldier of the guards, was cut in the head, and so much bruised, that it is thought he cannot live; many others were much bruised and hurt. This misfortune delayed the ceremony upwards of two hours.

On Wednesday night last the house of a gentleman in Mark-lane was broke into by a gang of ruffians, who stole therefrom fifty-nine India bonds, besides a considerable quantity of cloaths: They were, however, pursued by a servant, and one of them was taken. The bonds had been placed in an iron chest, which the villains wrenched open.

25.] Saturday morning, about five o'clock, a dreadful fire broke out at Mr. Wals's, near George's-Stairs, Shad Thames, which in a short time consumed the premises, as well as the house of Mr. Hayes, and another on either side adjoining, besides variously damaging some other houses and sheds contiguous.

27.] Wednesday, during the time of divine service, in the church of St. Ann, Black-friars, a man genteelly dressed, with a watch in his pocket, was seized with a fit of apoplexy and carried out of church, dead.

Wednesday being Christmas-day, the same was observed at court as a high festival; at noon their Majesties, preceded by the heralds, &c. went to the chapel royal, and heard a sermon on the occasion, by the Rev. Dr. Kaye, Sub-Almoner; their Majesties afterwards received the sacrament from the hands of the bishop of London, assisted by the sub-dean; the Lord Chamberlain in behalf of his Majesty made the usual offering.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

Extract of a Letter from Newry, dated December, 23.

ON the 4th of this month a duel was fought at a place called Crofhill, about the centre between Cullybachy, in the county of Antrim, and Hillsborough, in the county Down, between a Mr. Peter Miller, of the former, and a Mr. Sam. Davison, of the latter; Mr. M. was desired to fire first, which he did, and missed him; Mr. D. fired and wounded Mr. M. in the back part of his thigh. He was immediately carried to a surgeon in the neighbourhood. The ball is not yet extracted. It is doubted the thigh must be cut off. It was about a young lady the dispute began.—Mr. M. sent for her to come and see him, which she refused, saying as he did not act like a gentleman, she would never speak to him again.

Kilkenny, Dec. 28.] Early last Saturday Morning, a large party of White Boys on horseback, with horns sounding marched into the town of Urliegford, from whence they took four Munster men forcibly out of their beds; whom they carried a mile off, and there swore them to return immediately to their own province, and never at their peril to work at any business in Leinster. They gave them the oaths of secrecy and obedience, and dismissed them.

Tralee, Jan. 10.] Wednesday se'nnight John M'Elligot, at Drumkeen, being warned by two credible friends, at his peril, not to sleep at his house, he fled to Tralee, to crave the protection of the gentlemen and the law; but those nefarious villains, the Causeway White boys, finding he escaped with life, in the night time most barbarously cut the ear close to the skull off a valuable Mare of Mr. Arthur Raymond, which said Mr. Elligot kept, and which the wicked wretches took to be his. Informations, on the White boy act, are lodged against some of the ringleaders. It is earnestly wished that the gentlemen of the county may prevent a general insurrection, by timely breaking those daring and dangerous combinations. John M'Elligot is very well known to be remarkably quiet, honest, and industrious.

Newry, Jan. 13.] Yesterday morning early, a part of the 30th Regiment, now in this town, on their March to Armagh, went, headed by two revenue officers, to Kelleys mountains, in order to seize an unlicensed still; the country people assembled, to the amount of some hundreds, and defended themselves with uncommon spirit, by throwing Stones, &c. at the soldiers, upon which they were obliged to fire in their own defence, and unhappily wounded several, two of whom it is thought will not recover.

Corke, Jan. 16.] On an information given Thomas Hungerford, of Foxhall, Esq; on Sunday last, of several deluded persons, patronized by captains Fearnot and Lightfoot, having committed many outrages, by houghing cattle, burning houses, stacks of corn, and extorting money from several persons in that country, the said Mr. Hungerford, assisted by other gentlemen of that neighbourhood, did, on the same day, apprehend in one house three of the principals of said gang, whereof the above captains were, the latter of whom, in attempting to make his escape, received a shot, of which he died next morning. The remaining two, and another of their accomplices, (who was taken the same day) were on this day committed to the county goal by Thomas Hungerford, of Cathermore, Esq; escorted by forty of the inhabitants of Cloughnakilty, well mounted and armed.—This spirited resolution to suppress such dangerous assemblies, it is hoped will be followed by the gentlemen of the county.

Extract of a letter from Londonderry, Jan. 17.

“Yesterday a remarkable trotting match was performed between two mares, one the property of Mr. M'Causland of Derry, the other of Mr. Aul, of N. Lemavaddy, which was won with difficulty by the former; the bet was twenty guineas, the distance three miles on the Newtown road to the water side, was rode in 16 minutes, and had not the losing mare fallen, it is generally thought she must have won. Mr. M'Causland, we hear, has generously given his winnings for the benefit of the poor.

George M'Clellan, of Donduff's fort in the county of Donegal, farmer, was on the night of the 17th of October last found dead at Garney, on the great road leading from Derry to Castleforward, supposed to have been robbed and murdered by some villain or villains unknown. The gentlemen of the counties of Derry and Donegal have offered one hundred guineas for apprehending the principal in said murder and robbery.

Kilkenny, Jan. 15.] By letters from Belfast in the north of this kingdom, we have advice, that a large vein of coals has been found in the parish of Kilmoney near the cave mountains, between the towns of Belfast and Carrickfergus, which it is thought will be a saving to the province of Ulster [in White-haven and Scotch coals] to the amount of about 8000l. per annum.

We hear that Sir Joshua Reynolds, David Garrick, Esq; and Edward Gibbon, Esq; Author of the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire, intend visiting this kingdom in May or June next.

We hear from Nenagh, co. Tipperary, that a most dreadful accident happened in that neighbourhood. As Mr. John Clibborn and Mr. George Tew, were returning from hunting on St. Stephen's day, they met one Prosser a noted poacher, who as usual, had a brace of hares, and upon Mr. Clibborn's demanding said Prosser's gun, which Prosser refusing to deliver, Mr. Clibborn alighted, in order to force it from him; Mr. Tew alighted also, fearing the consequences that might attend a struggle if Prosser persisted in his refusal, but before he could come up to Mr. Clibborn's assistance [who had seized Prosser's arm] the piece unfortunately went off, and killed Mr. Clibborn on the spot. Mr. Tew narrowly escaped, having received a few grains in the groin; Prosser is lodged in Clonmell jail.

One day last week eight men [seven of whom were near relations] set out on a fowling party; after a long and fruitless search for game, they adjourned to a public house for some refreshment, where they drank three bottles of Whiskey; this so elevated their spirits, that an agreement was made to have a regular engagement in an adjoining field, four and four, the distance limited to forty yards, and to charge with powder and shot; this friendly amusement continued so long that most of them were wounded in several parts of the face and breast, and their ammunition nearly exhausted; one in particular being in want of shot, turned his back to his opponents till he could procure a fresh supply, which they perceiving, the four immediately discharged their pieces at him, and lodged the contents in his back, which wounded him severely, and so far deprived him of his reason, that he flew to the house for pewter spoons to cut in pieces for the purpose of firing at those who had wounded him, and had not the people of the house prudently seized both him and his gun, something very fatal would have attended this dangerous sport.

Extract of a Letter received last Week in Dublin from Marseilles.

“The son of the Great Mogul arrived yesterday in this city, and will set out next week for Paris: He travels in the quality of a prince with a train of upwards of 200 persons, amongst which are twenty-five ladies of his seraglio. His Father allows him for his expences a million of Livres [about 5000l.] a month. He intends going through the principal countries of Europe, and end his tour in England. The residence of this prince in Paris, together with that of the Emperor of Germany, will doubtless draw a great number of English guineas hither.

Last week, a lady near Stephen's green, undressing herself for bed, left her system on her toilet. In the night a mouse ready to kindle came and chose that part of the lady's head-dress to deposit her young, and remaining closely enconcealed therein till the next morning, the lady put it on her head without perceiving the new inhabitants. The mouse and her young ones kept their lodging, till being pressed with hunger, the old one risked appearing to seek out somewhat to satisfy the calls of nature. This happened just as the lady sat down to dinner; when she first heard the cries of the little orphans, and felt their mother run down her neck; upon which she overturned the whole system with great precipitation on the table; and seeing five or six young ones crawl out of it, she, uncertain of the cause, fell into convulsion fits, and now remains dangerously ill.

A few days since a corpse was brought to be interred in Glainevin church yard, when the Sexton (Hanegan, a Stay-maker) refused to open the gate unless he was paid his fee. The fee had been paid before, but the fellow insisting it was not so, he was paid a second time on promising an affidavit that he did not receive the first. Thus the matter seemingly ended, and the corpse was interred. But when the company were returning, this Hanegan seized one of them by the breast, which was a signal for the attack, and a number of desperadoes instantly came up, knocked down some, and threw others over the bridge. One unhappy man is since dead, another is past hopes of recovery, and many more lie dangerously ill. Examinations being lodged, a number of constables went to Glasnevin and fortunately took the Sexton, whom they brought to the Justices office, from whence he was committed to Kilmainham. Diligent search is making after the rest of these bravoos, and it is hoped for the safety of the public that they will be soon apprehended.

A Chairman was committed to Newgate upon a writ, issued on a Judge's fiat, for fifty pounds; this man was thus punished for the insolence of his tongue. A gentleman sent a message by him, and paid him six-pence on his return; but that payment did not satisfy him, and when he could not extort more, he abused the gentleman before his door, in the most wanton and outrageous manner, and amongst other shocking expressions uttered many actionable words, for which he is now suffering the penalty of the law. The infliction of this punishment may have a good effect: The insolence of coachmen and chairmen is a general complaint; but if their employers, instead of personal correction, by which they themselves became subject to legal censure, would adopt this mode of chastisement, when similar occasions offer, they would teach them a proper lesson, and perform a service to the community.

On New Year's day last, Mr. Richardson, master of the angel at Camberwell, (England) killed a Hog, weighing 105 stone, and the length from snout to tail measured 18 feet 2 inches, the head, without tongue and ears, four stone two pounds.

Four constables went to execute a warrant on a captain of a ship in this harbour, for a debt due upwards of two years; they had often disguised themselves efoie, but to no purpose, as he kept himself secure in his cabin whenever he came to this port; at this time, however, they thought effectually to do their business, by dressing as sailors, went on board, enquired for the captain. Word was sent down that four seamen wanted to speak with him; being short of hands, and imagining they wanted to engage, he desired they should be immediately admitted; as soon as they entered, they declared the real purpose of their errand; he, without hesitation, acknowledged the debt, desired they would wait till he could procure bail, (for which indulgence he promised them a reward) or else accompany them to prison: they sat down to drink some grog, and he dispatched a messenger for the press-gang (who happened at that time to be on Aston's quay) who instantly attended his summons, and released the captain from the horrors of a jail, by safely lodging the four fellows on board the tender.

Being general quarter assembly day, John Lee, Esq; secretary to his excellency Simon earl Harcourt, and secretary and comptroller of the general post-office, was unanimously voted to the freedom of the city of Dublin at large.

Matthew Cunningham was tried and found guilty at Kilmainham, for robbing the house of Mr. Farran at Inchicore, and received sentence to be executed on Saturday the 1st of February next.

Some Memoirs of Mr. Jackson,

(With an elegant Engraving of that Gentleman, in the Character of Albertus, in his own Tragedy of the Siege of Harlech.)

MR. JACKSON is the son of the Revd. Mr. Jackson, Vicar of Beenhams, (and successor in that vicarage to the celebrated Mr. Stackhouse, author of the much esteemed History of the Bible) and was intended for the church, having received a suitable education. He was born in the year 1742, and shewed an early attachment to literature, so that it is not to be doubted but he would have succeeded in the ecclesiastical function, had not his attention been early alienated from a clerical pursuit, by the inticements of the stage, on his first visit to London. Regardless of advice, his "Stage-struck mind" could not resist following its bent: he made his first appearance in Covent Garden theatre in the year 1759, in the character of Theodosius, and afterwards in that of Osmyrn, in the tragedy of Zara, where he was honoured with uncommon applause. But Mr. Jackson's uncle, who had a strong antipathy to the stage, having heard of this circumstance, immediately disinherited him, cutting him off from hopes of inheritance.

riting the family estate he possessed in the county of Westmoreland.

However fond Mr. Jackson was of the stage, and however flattering the applauses were that he had received, still he was not so deaf to his own interest, as not to be deeply affected with the determination of his uncle, on whom, after his father's decease, he had his chief dependance; he began to reflect on the necessity of regaining the old gentleman's favour, and thought nothing could conduce to it so much, as quitting immediately the first cause of his displeasure. This he did, though in the high way to theatrical eminence, and his uncle was so pleased with the sacrifice the Tragedy hero had made to his opinion, that he reinstated him in his favour, which he continued till his death, which happened not long after.

residence, but also gave him an entire liberty to return to his favourite delight, the stage, which was rendered still more desirable to him, from the temporary absence, which prudence rather than inclination had called; he therefore went to Edinburgh, where he was well received in the capital characters of Romeo, Oroonoko, Castalio, Jaffier, Douglas, &c. &c. &c.

The next season he appeared on the Druery-Lane stage, in most of the characters he had performed at Edinburgh, with equal approbation. For three seasons he continued there in a very respectable light, and in possession of a number of striking characters; where his progress as an actor was again broke in upon, by an attachment he had contracted with a lady of condition in Edinburgh, at whose solicitations he again quitted the stage, was admitted as a lieutenant in the Berkshire militia, and turned the bent of his genius towards a very arduous undertaking, which he would probably have accomplished, had not fortune thrown an insuperable bar in his way, by the death of the lady, just before the time of his intended marriage with her.

The shock Mr. Jackson received by this unfortunate event, was almost too great to be sustained; it preyed on his spirits, and undermined his health, so that he visibly declined, when a gentleman whose seat was in the mountainous parts of Wales, near the foot of Cader-Iddris, insisted on his accompanying him thither, and there he happily regained his health. It is to this visit we are indebted for Mr. Jackson's two Tragedies, the scene of which he has placed in those parts, and also for a History of Wales, now in the press.

His health being re-established, on his return from Wales, thinking himself slighted by the family of the deceased lady, and finding it would be difficult for him to prosecute the plan of life he had laid down, without their aid, he turned his attention a third time to the stage, and appeared again at Edinburgh in the character of Romeo.

At this time the part of Juliet was performed by a young lady of beauty and merit, and as it has not been unfrequent that the feigned love of these two characters, has kindled a real passion in the performers of them, so did it with Mr. Jackson and that lady, who were married shortly after this event, and she is now one of the first actresses in London, possessing (in the absence of Mrs. Barry) the most respectable characters on the Covent-Garden stage.—Of this lady we hope to have an opportunity of speaking more amply, as it must give pleasure to every lover of the drama, to see her again on the Irish stage.

After continuing three years in Edinburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Jackson came over to Dublin, and in the year 1772, they performed the most capital characters in the principal acting plays during the theatrical commonwealth in Smock Alley.

In the year 1773, Mr. Jackson brought out his tragedy of Eldred, or the British Freeholder, in the little Theatre in Capel-street, and the following year it was played at the Theatre in the Hay-market, and finally at the Theatre Royal in Covent-Garden, where it was capitally received.

Mr. Jackson has been beheld by us in the two-fold light of actor and author.—As an actor, his person is pleasing, his countenance manly, his voice deep, full and sonorous: he fills many characters with great propriety, especially those of Evander in the Grecian Daughter, and Alcanor in Mahomet, to which line of playing he seems peculiarly adapted. As an author, we have two tragedies, that of Eldred, and that lately produced here, entitled the Siege of Harlech. We have already given accounts of those pieces, therefore shall only add, that in his writings, Mr. Jackson seems to breathe a strong spirit of Liberty; that his style is, in general correct, his language flowery, and his descriptions picturesque.

An Examination of the Question, would a Relaxation of the Popery Laws be of advantage to Ireland? Most humbly inscribed to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and the Legislature of this Kingdom.

Oh! is there not some Patriot, in whose Power

*That best, that God-like Luxury is placed,
Of blessing thousands, thousands yet unborn,
Thro' late Posterity? Some, large of Soul,
To cheer dejected Industry? to give
A double Harvest to the pining Savain?
And teach the lab'ring Hand the sweets of Toil?*

Thomson's Seasons.

I AM satisfied that, in the investigation of this proposition, we are, generally speaking, biass'd by a parade of words, and apt to take assertions for argument; and invective, and the dictates of prejudice, for good sense;—for wherever there is dislike, defects will appear and be magnified to your view;—and the phantom passes for reality.—Now, in this question, early prejudices are against the affirmative of it; and, in such a situation, either to discuss with impartiality, or to decide with justice, is extremely difficult.—Perhaps there is no situation the human mind can can be placed in, that requires more strength of understanding, or goodness of heart.—Besides, the only information our public orators have obtained in this matter, has been from the inflamed reports of party writers; for papists have not till very lately been permitted publicly to plead.—Whenever they have written their defence, it has been done in private, and this has scarcely ever reached our hands. They have consequently been condemned, unheard, and their principles estimated from the inflammatory charges of controversial writers.

When I consider how much every man is concerned in the public interest, and how highly the popery laws operate against it, I am surprised that a malady of such uncommon magnitude has not long since been removed.—These laws comprehend no less, than the discouragement of industry and national improvement;—to alienate two thirds of the inhabitants of this kingdom from our established government, and make them wish for a change, in hopes of bettering their conditions;—to depopulate the nation, by forcing the natives to seek for that property abroad, which they cannot secure at home;—to lessen our current cash, by compelling popish parents to transmit their property to foreign countries, where they have been obliged to send their children in seminaries for their education, or into the army for bread;—to dissolve that most sacred engagement, the marriage vow;—to weaken our strength, by preventing papists from a possibility of aiding us in war;—to promote incurable divisions and animosities in society; and dissoluteness, profligacy, and undutifulness, with a total extinction of every affectionate or benevolent principle in the offspring of papists, or between brothers of the same blood;—to entail inevitable beggary, and abject slavery on the majority of the inhabitants of this country, to the destruction of the country in general; and this is to them the more intolerable, as they are satisfied that they hold no principle inimical to the welfare of their country, which might justify such severity; and as they suffer amidst that liberty and security which they see all around them, under the happy influence of a free government and a fine climate—and which they alone are rendered incapable of enjoying. In a word, these laws are, according to a definition of them, given in the British house of lords, by our present head and rock of the law, its great ornament and lustre, the friend to truth, and the despiser of all base artifices of injustice, “A HEAP OF MONSTROUS ABSURDITIES AND VILE OPPRESSION; THEY ARE SUBVERSIVE OF

As a relaxation of these laws would remove such a hideous catalogue of civil and religious enormities; and as the continuance of them can only be supported by distant apprehensions, and from supposed bad principles in papists; when I see many respectable legislators, for whose judgment and integrity I have the highest respect, stand up and oppose it, I am astonished and amazed. I do not, indeed doubt but they oppose it on public principles. I would not wish to insinuate that early prejudices had the least weight in their determination. But I am surprised that, in a proposition wherein national advantage is so eminently concerned, such opposition should be met with, and the more so, as this opposition could only arise from the want of due information. Surely, it is impossible to conceive, that the grand council of the nation, a body of men whose education ought to raise them beyond vulgar impressions; a set of freemen, philosophers, and christians; could wish to enslave and beggar two-thirds of their fellow-citizens, without a rational and just end for so doing! As for my part, I have attended with patience to every argument that has been urged for the negative of this question; but I have heard and read in vain. The truth is, there is no argument that can weigh in its favour;—for the utility and justice of a relaxation are so self-evident, it is in short, a proposition of such a weighty nature, that you can neither lighten it by argument, nor perplex it by sophistry.

Investigate every argument that has hitherto appeared against a mitigation of these laws, and you will reduce them to this one objection;—that papists hold principles incompatible with the welfare of a Protestant government; and that, if penal restrictions were not laid on them, these principles would produce attempts to overturn our civil and religious establishments. Now, if it appears that Roman Catholics have from the reformation to this day, in their writings and public discourses, disclaimed any such principles;—if they have all along rejected them as the vilest calumny—if their invariable conduct in every Protestant country, and more especially in such places as they are tolerated in, appears to be dutiful and loyal; and that such principles do not appear by their conduct;—surely, it is a sufficient proof that the charge is false, and that so much public injury should not be licensed, when the reasons for doing so are supported by so little evidence? I own I am at a loss how to account for it. It would appear harsh to charge the majority of our parliaments, who uphold these laws, with ignorance in reading, for if they had examined they might be better informed relative to the civil principles of papists; and yet, to charge them with want of candor would be much the worse character of the two. It is shameful to see truth and charity so little cultivated;—they should never be sacrificed to the paltry ends of party, in direct contradiction to both.

I do not indeed pretend to say that there have not been popish writers who advanced unwarrantable principles. But I do insist upon it, that to charge these upon the body of Catholics in general; in express contradiction to their most avowed sentiments, and declarations upon oath, is a method the most disingenuous, and by which, if once allowed, no body of men could escape. What a strange representation would even the church of England make, if she were to be charged with all the wild and dangerous principles advanced in the writings of Sibthorp, Manwaring, Hicks, Dodwell, Lestly, and Sacheverell; or even in some convocations themselves, and university decrees? I do think, without any breach of modesty, I may affirm, that papists have in every mixt government wherein they reside, manifested all along as steady loyalty and obedience, and as peaceable dispositions as any other body of christians. Each party has frequently been criminal; but such is the lot of mankind—not the consequences of tenets held by any sect for every species of religion has morality for its basis. After all this, shall we continually hear them arraign'd of principles the most odious and disloyal?

Again, the majority of Irish Papists, Clergy and Laity, without any interested motive, have taken a test, as prescribed by our last parliament; wherein they abjured every hurtful or dangerous tenet that they have long, by their enemies, been accused of holding. It will here be objected, as it has frequently been before, that they could hereafter, if the interest of their church required it, be absolved from the obligation of this oath. But this when considered, will be found to be a mere pretence for not believing them; for, surely, nothing could promote the temporal interest of their church more effectually, than to license them to take the qualification oath. Then, indeed, from their money, could there be found a sufficient number to fill almost every public office; then might our houses of parliament have qualified papists in abundance, by which means such laws might be enacted as would fully establish them in every liberty, and every offensive law might be removed. But their obstinate refusal is an uncontrovertible proof that this vulgar charge of a dispensing power has no foundation; as they have for near a century past, persevered in an absolute submission to the force of those desolating laws, and suffered complete destruction and poverty, sooner than enjoy the blessings of riches and liberty by the guilt of perjury. After so long and trying a proof then, of the sincerity of papists, can any candid objection be made against the integrity of those who lately took this oath of allegiance? If any argument should be offered against the sufficiency of this test for our security, it might be shown why papists in Holland, Prussia, and the other protestant states, wherein they are tolerated, have not violated their fealty to their rulers? If tests of civil orthodoxy bind papists to obedience in those countries, why should they not have a similar effect in this one? Those who lately took the oath of allegiance here, had no motive for doing so, but to remove from the eyes of every candid person, that film of prejudice which has long prevented them from seeing the truth; and to convince government that their religion neither inculcates nor countenances those dangerous principles with which they have long been unjustly charged. Surely, now, there can be neither wisdom, nor justice, in tying up their hands who have voluntarily entered into the pale of our civil establishment; and the more so, as those hands would, if set free, contribute much to the strength and riches of the nation. Surely also, government cannot in equity continue those penalties, in order to compel them to enter into the pale of our religious establishment, as such compulsion would be destructive of the inherent rights of mankind, for no person ought to have a restraint laid on his liberty of conscience, in spirituals—as such a freedom can never disturb the good order of society, and as he should be accountable to duty alone, for his religious belief. As liberty of conscience is peculiarly essential to a free government; to obstruct it by penal laws is the very essence of bigotry and gross persecution. Such papists then, who become politically orthodox, should be freed from those penalties, if we claim the title of a free constitution? If the legislature refuses them this privilege, it cannot with justice be said, that they continue those feverities for their maintaining dangerous principles ; but for adhering to that mode of faith which they believe to be most acceptable to the Deity, and which of course they value more than their lives ; and which they have not taken up by accident, but has been handed down to them from time immemorial by their ancestors.

The advocates for penal laws talk much of the wisdom of our ancestors, and how differently they thought of papists from what the friends of a relaxation do ; as for my part, I shall say nothing of their wisdom ; it might appear invidious, and it is not necessary in the present case. I shall only observe, that they who rely on the weight of that reflection, should remember, that as circumstances alter, our conduct should consequently alter. Formerly papists had been recently deprived of their liberty and property, and it might very naturally be supposed that they would endeavour to recover them, if not incapacitated by restraints. But now these claims are forgotten ; and the sanction of an established government, with a long undisturbed possession, are sufficient securities against any attempt of this kind ; for such an attempt would precipitate them into ruin and destruction, and the more so, as they are so blended with us by commerce, that they must suffer considerably in their property, by any effort of this nature. But surely, this apprehension will have no weight if it be considered, that there are so many effectual laws—independent of the popery laws—by which such a conduct might be prevented or punished: Formerly also, Europe in general was not so commercial and improving as it is at present ; and we should endeavour to keep pace with our neighbours ; as the penal laws then against papists have kept us considerably backwards, in every species of industry, they should now be removed. In fine, the case is now very different from what it was formerly, and no natural rights should be taken away from any great body of people, to the hurt of the nation in general.—Encouragement is the very soul and essence of trade, and a sad experience of near a century shews us, that penalties and restraints are its perdition.—The laws ought to be equally indulgent to all.—A free government should know no partiality.—And any discouragement to particular denominations of men, in such a state, is a solecism of the grossest nature.—As we have subdued papists, we should scorn to inflict upon them that oppression from which the laws protect ourselves ; otherwise, we leave it in their power to say with justice, that we are most imperious tyrants : so that upon no principle of liberal legislation whatsoever, can the continuance of these laws be supported—for it is monstrous injustice to a loyal and obedient people. I flatter myself, therefore, that the time is near at hand, when a wise legislation will put an end to such partial and impolitic proceeding.

The more I reflect on the penal laws, the more I am convinced that they are unnecessary for our security, and very severe in their operation, and hurtful to the nation in general. Papists, though sorely oppressed by this government, have nevertheless, been obedient and loyal ; would not, then, an obligation beget every security for their attachment ? Surely, if they have demean'd themselves as friends, whilst treated as enemies, it cannot be supposed they would behave as enemies, if they were treated as friends ? A people who labour under so many discouragements as they do, may possibly be extremely dangerous in times of war ; for, if a motive of duty did not stop the natural movement of the human heart, they ought not to be averse to a change, from which they would have something to hope, but nothing to fear.—And when there is no tie but a motive of duty, daily experience, alas ! shews that it is but a very slender obstruction—when interest appears beyond the bounds of it. There is nothing that attaches and conciliates people of jarring and discordant opinions, so much as interest. This is the political cement that joins enemies to friends—and reconciles every animosity. Make it then the interest of papists that this constitution and government should continue and flourish ; and, except the very order of nature should change, papists will be staunch friends and secure subjects. Heretofore they took up arms when we oppressed them, and made them labour under disadvantages to which they had been strangers ;—must it consequently follow, that their posterity would do the like, if they were well treated ? It would not be the interest of any man to disturb a state, wherein he was indulged with natural privileges. Should not the punishment cease with the crime ? Shall we persevere in so consuming a remedy, after the disorder is cured ? And, is it common policy to treat so large a body of dutiful and peaceable subjects, as if they were the most inveterate enemies of the State ? Draw but a comparison between Ireland, and those Protestant States wherein Papists have full toleration: For instance, Holland ;—we shall find the one divided, impoverished, and weak ; whereas the other is united, rich, and powerful. From whence arrives this difference of condition ? It cannot be from nature, for we have a finer climate, and a finer soil; it must be then from a different policy. In Ireland, penal laws have kept enmity alive, and beggared two-thirds of the people, to the indigence of the nation in general; for you cannot possibly impoverish them, without abridging your own property; whereas in Holland, a free government, and an equal liberty, have turned enmity into friendship, and effected the prosperity of all its inhabitants. In Holland, Papists can realize the produce of their labour for themselves and their posterity, which is a necessary incitement to industry; whereas, in Ireland, they are totally prohibited from doing the like: Hence they become lazy and indolent; and it would be no wonder if they were totally detached from any concern in the welfare of this kingdom. Will the Papists of Holland be more likely to attempt an injury to their country, because they are interested in its prosperity? Or, will Irish Papists be industrious, because they are discouraged from industry?—or be more firmly attached to the preservation of this country, because they have no stake or interest in it?—Loose, then, those fetters on the industry and affection, and you will partake of their wealth and their love.

Many legislators, I believe, object to a relaxation of those laws, because a relaxation is unpopular with their electors; but they should reflect that true popularity is that applause bestowed by after ages on good and virtuous actions;—not that phantom popularity that appears without merit, and is gone without crime. The fading popularity of the day should have no influence on the actions of an honest man—he ought to be governed by a more steady and permanent rule,—the real dictates of his own understanding. I pity the man who has sacrificed that pleasing monitor, to every popular impulse.—The shouts and buzzes of a mob are not the real trumpets of fame.—They who look for true applause, should act so as to appear unobscured on the Historian's page, where truth shall triumph over popular outcries, that assassin of genuine liberty. It is astonishing to think what effect those popular sentiments have over weak minds; inasmuch, that some of our parliamentary orations, relative to the proposition before us, have been shamefully and deeply tinged with them.

I apprehend it were needless at present, to urge more upon this question. Let it suffice to remark, that as Irish Catholics and Irish Protestants, are now so blended together by mutual good offices, and by blood, they should forget former contests wherein they were not concerned, and should adopt sentiments of true charity and christian benevolence. Though they have a religious distinction, they should have no political one; and the sacred name of religion should not be prostituted to the base purpose of lighting the fuel of animosities. Parties should subside, and unanimity take place; for unanimity makes the strength and welfare of every government. They should be as one people, equally interested in the prosperity, and equally enjoying the advantages of, a free constitution.

A Friend to Ireland.

Memoirs of the Earl and Countess of Somerset, and the unfortunate Sir Thomas Overbury. As a New Tragedy, founded upon some of the most interesting Transactions in the Reign of James the first, written by Richard Savage, Esq; has been presented at the Theatre in Covent-Garden, we apprehend the following Recital will not be unacceptable to our readers. ob

A ABOUT the year 1609, Raert Carre, a youth of about 20 years of age, came to London, and became a great favourite to King James. He was not, at first, so intoxicated with advancement, as not to be sensible of his own ignorance and inexperience. He had recourse to the assistance and advice of a friend; and he was more fortunate in his choice, than is usual with such pampered minions. In Sir Thomas Overbury, he met with a judicious and sincere counsellor, who, building all hopes of his own preferment on that of the young favourite, endeavoured to insinuate into him the principles of prudence and discretion. By zealously serving every body, Carre was taught to abate the envy, which might attend his sudden elevation: by shewing a preference for the English, he learned to escape the prejudices which prevailed against his country. And, so long as he was contented to be ruled by Overbury's friendly counsels, he enjoyed, what is rare, the highest favour of the prince, without being hated by the people.

To complete the measure of courtly happiness, nought was wanting but a kind mistress; and, where high fortune concurred with all the graces of youth and beauty, this circumstance could not be difficult to attain. But it was here that the favourite met with that rock, on which all his fortunes were wrecked, and which plunged him for ever into an abyss of infamy, guilt, and misery.

No sooner had James mounted the throne of England, than he remembered his friendship for the unfortunate families of Howard and Devereux, who had suffered for their attachment to the cause of Mary and to his own. Having restored young Essex to his blood and dignity, and conferred conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the house of Norfolk, he sought the farther pleasure of uniting these families by the marriage of the Earl of Essex with Lady Frances Howard, daughter to the Earl of Suffolk. She was only thirteen, he fourteen years of age; and it was thought proper, till both should attain the age of puberty, that he should go abroad and pass some time in his travels. He returned into England after four years absence, and was pleased to find his Countess in the full lustre of beauty, and possessed of the love and admiration of the whole court. But, when the Earl approached, and claimed the privileges of a husband, he met with nothing but symptoms of aversion and disgust, and a flat refusal of any farther familiarities. He applied to her parents, who constrained her to attend him into the country, and to partake of his bed: but nothing could overcome her rigid fullness and obstinacy; and she still rose from his side, without having shared the nuptial pleasures. Disgusted with re-iterated denials, he at last gave over the pursuit, and, separating himself from her, thenceforth abandoned her conduct to her own will and discretion.

Such coldness and aversion in Lady Essex arose not without an attachment to another object. The favourite had opened his addresses, and had been too successful in making impressions on the tender heart of the young Countess. She imagined, that, so long as she refused the embraces of Essex, she never could be deemed his wife, and that a separation and divorce might still open the way for a new marriage with her beloved Rochester. Though their passion was so violent, and their opportunities of intercourse so frequent, that they had already indulged themselves in all the gratification of love, they still lamented their unhappy fate, while the union between them was not intire and indissoluble. And the lover, as well as his mistress, was impatient, till their mutual ardour should be crowned with marriage.

So momentous an affair could not be concluded without consulting Overbury, with whom Rochester was accustomed to share all his secrets. While that faithful friend had considered his patron's attachment to the Countess of Essex merely as an affair of gallantry, he had favoured its progress; and it was partly owing to the ingenious and passionate letters which he dictated, that Rochester had met with such success in his addresses. Like an experienced courtier, he thought that a conquest of this nature would throw a lustre on the youthful favourite, and would tend still further to endear him to James, who was charmed to hear of the amours of his court, and listened with attention to every tale of gallantry. But great was Overbury's alarm, when Rochester mentioned his design of marrying the Countess; and he used every method to dissuade his friend from so foolish an attempt. He represented, how invidious, how difficult an enterprise it was to procure her a divorce from her husband: how dangerous, how shameful, to take into his own bed a profligate woman, who, being married to a young nobleman of the first rank, had not scrupled to prostitute her character, and to bestow favours on the object of a capricious and momentary passion. And, in the zeal of friendship, he went so far as to threaten Rochester, that he would separate himself for ever from him, if he could so far forget his honour and his interest as to prosecute this intended marriage.

Rochester had the weakness to reveal this conversation to the Countess of Essex; and, when her rage and fury broke out against Overbury, he had also the weakness to enter into her vindictive projects, and to swear vengeance against his friend, for the utmost instance, which he could receive of his faithful friendship. Some contrivance was necessary for the execution of their purpose. Rochester addressed himself to the king; and, after complaining, that his own indulgence to Overbury begot in him a degree of arrogance, which was extremely disagreeable, he procured a commission for his embassy to Russia; which he represented as a retreat for his friend, both profitable and honourable. When consulted by Overbury, he earnestly dissuaded him from accepting this offer, and took on himself the task of satisfying the king, if he should be any way displeased with the refusal. To the king again, he aggravated the insolence of Overbury's conduct, and obtained a warrant for transmitting him to the Tower, which James intended as a slight punishment for his disobedience. The Lieutenant of the Tower was a creature of Rochester's, and had lately been put into the office for this very purpose; he confined Overbury so strictly, that the unhappy prisoner was debarred from the sight even of his nearest relation; and no communication of any kind was allowed with him, during near six months, which he lived in prison.

This obstacle being removed, the lovers pursued their purpose; and the king himself, forgetting the dignity of his character, and his friendship for the family of Essex, Essex, entered zealously into the project of procuring the Countess a divorce from her husband. Essex also embraced the opportunity of separating himself from a bad woman, by whom he was hated; and he was willing to favour their success by any honourable expedient. The pretence for a divorce was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties: and he confessed, that, with regard to the Countess, he was conscious of such an infirmity, though he was not sensible of it with regard to any other woman. In her place too, it is said, a young virgin was substituted under a mask, to undergo the legal inspection by a jury of matrons. After such a trial, seconded by court-influence, and supported by the ridiculous opinion of fascination or witchcraft, the sentence of divorce was pronounced between the earl of Essex and his countess. And, to crown the scene, the king, solicitous lest the lady should lose any rank by her new marriage, bestowed on his minion the title of earl of Somerset.

Notwithstanding this success, the Countess of Somerset was not satisfied, till she should further satiate her revenge on Overbury; and she engaged her husband as well as her uncle, the earl of Northampton, in the atrocious design of taking him off secretly by poison. Fruitless attempts were re-iterated by weak poisons; but, at last, they gave him one so sudden and violent, that the symptoms were apparent to every one who approached him. His interment was hurried on with the greatest precipitation; and, though a strong suspicion immediately prevailed in the public, the full proof of the crime was not brought to light, till some years after.

The discovery of Somerset's guilt, in the above murder, exposed him to the ruin and infamy, which he so well merited in the following manner:

An apothecary's apprentice, who had been employed in making up the poisons, having retired to Flushing, began to talk very freely of the whole secret; and the affair at last came to the ears of Trumbal, the king's envoy in the Low Countries. By his means, Sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, was informed; and he carried the intelligence immediately to James. The king, alarmed and astonished to find such enormous guilt in a man whom he had admitted into his bosom, sent for Sir Edward Coke, lord chief justice, and earnestly recommended to him the most rigorous and unbiassed scrutiny. This injunction was executed with great industry and severity: the whole labyrinth of guilt was carefully unraveled: the lesser criminals, Sir Jervis Elvis, Lieutenant of the Tower, Franklin, Weston, and Mrs. Turner, were first tried and condemned: Somerset and his countess were afterwards found guilty; Northampton's death, a little before, had saved him from a like fate.

It may not be unworthy of remark, that Coke, in the trial of Mrs. Turner, told her, that she was guilty of the seven deadly sins: she was a whore, a bawd, a forcer, a witch, a papist, a felon, and a murderer. And, what may more surprise us, Bacon, then attorney general, took care to observe, that poisoning was a popish trick. Such were the bigotted prejudices which prevailed in this age: poisoning was not, of itself, sufficiently odious, if it was not represented as a branch of popery. Stowe tells us, that, when the king came to Newcastle, on his first entry into England, he gave liberty to all the prisoners, except those confined for treason, murder, and papistry. When one considers these circumstances, that furious bigotry of the catholics, which broke out in the gun-powder conspiracy, appears the less surprising.

All the accomplices in Overbury's murder received the punishment due to their crime: but the king bestowed a pardon on the principals, Somerset and the Countess. It must be confessed, that James's fortitude had been highly laudable, had he persisted in his first intention of consigning over to severe justice all the criminals: but let us still beware of blaming him too harshly, if, on the approach of the fatal hour, he scrupled to deliver into the hands of the executioner persons whom he had once favoured with his most tender affections. To soften the rigours of their fate, after some years imprisonment, he restored them to their liberty, and conferred on them a pension, with which they retired, and languished out old-age in infamy and obscurity. Their guilty loves were turned into the most deadly hatred; and they passed many years together in the same house, without any intercourse or correspondence with each other.

Anecdote.

WHEN news was brought to Agesilaus, king of Sparta, during the civil war in Greece, that a bloody fight had happened at the city of Corinth, but that the Spartans were victorious, and the number of their troops killed was but inconsiderable, compared to the loss of the enemy, instead of exulting with joy, that wise and humane monarch, with a deep sigh, cried out, "Oh unhappy Greece, who hast slain so many of thy best warriors with thine own hand, who had they lived, might have proved a match for all the barbarians in the world." The

*The Adventures of Miss Sophia Sternheim :
From the German of Mr. Weiland.*

PART III.

Sophia visits England—A strange Occurrence there—Sophia carried off—Her Exile—An Attempt to destroy her—Her singular Deliverance—Derby's Repentance—Sophia discovered by her best Friends—Lord Rich's Generosity—Sophia's Marriage, and happy Situation.

LADY SUMMERS, an English woman of great fortune, had been some time at Mrs. Hill's, in Alsace, and saw, with the utmost satisfaction, the great progress the pupils of Sophia made in virtue and useful learning; in short, she conceived such an esteem for the unfortunate Mrs. Leidens, that a proper tutorefs having been found to preside over the seminary in her room, her Ladyship invited her in the most pressing manner, to accompany her in a visit to England. After a short time, Mrs. Leidens consented to her friend's request, and they embarked for Harwich, and in a few days safely arrived at Summer-hall, the seat of her Ladyship in Northumberland.

In this Lady's circle of friends was Lord Rich, a worthy Nobleman, who was soon inspired with an affection for Mrs. Leidens; and, some time after their acquaintance, made her offers of the most advantageous kind. She shed a torrent of tears at his proposals of marriage. 'Divine creature, said he, what is the occasion of these tears? Tell me, my dear Mrs. Leidens!' 'My good Lord, said she, you shall know the whole without reserve—you merit my confidence too well.'—Scarce had she pronounced these words, when a servant acquainted her, that Lady Summers wanted her, on account of some letters from London. Lady Summers informed her she had an only niece, who had just married Lord N. and in fifteen days she should receive a visit from the young couple. We must, said she, contrive, in the best manner, a rural festival, to amuse them at their old aunt's. On this she rose, and put Lord N's letter into Sophy's hands, and left the room, to give an answer to the messenger. With what horror was Mrs. Leidens seized, when she recognised the hand writing of Lord Derby, who had acceded to his brother's title of N—, and was then the real husband of young Lady Alton. With trembling steps, she repaired to her chamber that she might conceal her consternation from Lady Summers. She could not shed tears. How painful did she feel her imprudence for coming to England? 'Ah! said she, I do not envy the villain his happiness; but why must I become his victim? Oh God! she cried, who directed every thing, support me in my adversity! What must I do!

It was by a kind of miracle she could keep up her spirits; but at length she resolved totally to dissemble, and to assist Lady Summers in preparing for their reception; and afterwards to feign an indisposition, which by obliging her to keep her bed, would prove a sufficient excuse for her not seeing strangers. She therefore rejoined Lady Summers, and prepared for the entertainment. A few days after, Lord Rich was led round the apartments to see the new decorations. Lady Summers for some minutes left them alone; he approached the table where Sophy was sorting some Italian flowers; took her by the hand, and said, with the tenderest concern: 'You are not well, my dear friend; your hands tremble; a certain precipitation in all your motions pierces, in spite of all your endeavours, through an assumed cheerfulness—your smiles do not come from the heart.' At this Lady Summers entered, and Lord Rich left them, without receiving any satisfaction upon the subject.

A few days before the arrival of Lord N— and his bride, Miss Sternheim received a pretended message from Emmy, a young Lady who lived at some distance from Lady Summers, with whom she had contracted a friendship, intreating Sophy to meet her in the Deer-park the next morning on a particular circumstance nearly relating to herself. The next morning Sophia went to the Park, and waited in anxious expectation of seeing her friend. She waited some time, when, all on a sudden, an elderly mean-looking woman beckoned to her. Sophy went up—the woman instantly seized her; and, that instant, two other people appeared, masked, who surrounded the unhappy girl, muffled her up, and violently hurried her away; her resistance, her efforts to cry out, were ineffectual. They put her into a carriage, and travelled all night, till they arrived at the hut of a miner, in the mountains of Scotland. She scarcely possessed the smallest remains of life when she arrived; and for three weeks her mind was in a situation impossible to be described. The miner and his family had strict orders not to let her go from their house beyond a certain distance.

Suffice it to say, that, some weeks after Sophy's exile, the perfidious Lord N— sent his servant John to make the following proposals to her, viz. to set out with him towards London; because, his Lordship not liking his Lady, and having been indisposed for some time, her company would be very agreeable to him at Windsor, where he principally resided. He wrote himself to her, that, if she would cordially consent to join him, and were disposed to love him, he would think of dissolving his marriage with Lady Alton, and confirming theirs, as her merit and the laws required him to do.

Amidst all these insults, the sight of the wretch who personated the chaplain in their false marriage, irritated Sophia to the highest degree; she repulsed his offers with indignation. After she had twice repeated the most peremptory refusal, John, enraged, seized her arm, pulled her out of the house, dragged her to an old neighbouring tower, and, pushing open a door, flung her among the ruins: 'May you perish there,' he thundered out to her, 'that my master and myself may have a final riddance of you.' Sophia passed the whole night in this deplorable situation; it rained hard, and she was deluged in the water that flowed in under the gate.

This villain John was the person who forced her away from Lady Summers, having accidentally seen her at that Lady's house the day he came there to announce the arrival of Derby and his bride; and who, by Derby's order, seized her in the Park, for fear of seeing Lady Alton, and acquainting her with his villainy.

Sophia was seized with strong convulsions. On the recovery of her senses, she found herself on her bed, surrounded by her frightened hosts, who had discovered her in the above condition, and brought her home, to all appearance dead.

While Sophia was in her exile, Lady Douglass, who did not live far from the hut, and had often seen Sophia, and the distress which was visibly painted on her countenance, from the amiable character she had heard of her from the old people, was inspired with a desire of being better acquainted with her.

Sophia, in her illness, sent for this Lady's chaplain. The clergyman arrived with Lady Douglass. They both listened to her with attention and an eye of pity. Lord Dorset had brought her some cordials and medicines. When Sophia was somewhat recovered, Lady Douglass, in the most obliging manner, made her an offer of her house, her services, and her friendship, which she accepted with the greatest joy and gratitude.

The good old people, by Lady Douglass's direction, dug a hole in the garden for the pretended interment of Sophy, and ordered them to acquaint Lord N—, if he should send, that she was dead. Sophia took leave of her worthy hosts, and set off with the Countess to her brother's, Earl Hopton's seat. Here Sophy wrote to Lady Summers, and gave her a detail of her misfortunes, as she had never heard any thing of her from the time of her disappearance from that Lady's house, and who thought her flight was occasioned by the professions of Lord Rich.

Lord N—, who was soon after afflicted with a severe illness, sent for Seymour and Lord Rich, who was own brother to Seymour. Seymour instantly repaired to Windsor, where Lord N. was dying. In this state, he made the whole discovery of his villainous transactions, and related how his servant had thrown Sophy among the ruins of an old castle, where, he told them, he supposed she died.—'There she died!' exclaimed Seymour.—'And thou monster! dæmon! art thou still alive?'—Lord N— wept bitterly on this occasion, and intreated them to go to Scotland, and order the body of Sophy to be dug up, and be conveyed to his family-vault in Derbyshire. He offered a very considerable sum to erect a monument, which was to announce to posterity the virtues and misfortunes of Sophia, as well as the repentance of him who offered her so many outrages.

The next day Lord Seymour and Lord Rich set out for Scotland. When they arrived, and were shewn, at the foot of a tree, a hillock of sand, which was supposed to contain the remains of Sophy, Seymour fell breathless by the grave, and Lord Rich was obliged to call the servants to his assistance. The next day they intended to dig up the remains of Sophy. Pale, trembling and in mournful silence, the distressed brothers, accompanied by the hostess and her husband, advanced slowly to the mournful spot. When they came near the raised hillock, Lord Rich said to the people, 'Take away the earth.' Seymour threw himself on his neck, and hid his face the instant he saw the spade go into the ground, when, all on a sudden, the husband and his wife fell on their knees, imploring their protection, telling them the truth, that Sophy was not dead, but that she was gone to Earl Hopton's, with his sister, Lady Douglass. We loved her so much, said the woman, that we suffered her to go; but, if my Lord N— hears it, he will be revenged on us.

Seymour then embraced the man, in a transport of joy: 'My friend, you shall go along with me; I will protect you, and will requite you.' They then ordered every thing ready for their departure. He joined to this discourse a handful of guineas, and dispatched a messenger, with this pleasing discovery to Lord N—, to console him. They set off for the Earl's, where they soon arrived. Scarce had the valet time to knock at the door, but they were in the room. The Countess was sitting with Miss Sternheim, who was reading ing to her, and had her back to the door.

The precipitation of Seymour, the clamour of the domestics, and their repeated questions, obliged Sophia to turn her head. 'O God! exclaimed she, with the liveliest emotion, letting her book fall to the ground.' Seymour was instantly at her feet. 'O Heaven! said he, stretching out his arms, she is still alive!—O my divine, my adorable Sternheim!' Almost bereft of her reason, she cast her eyes by turns on Seymour and Lord Rich, and let her head fall on his trembling arm. The Countess looked round her with astonishment. 'My good Lord, said Sophy to Lord Rich, how did you discover me? did Lady Summers inform you where I was? How does she?' She is well, he replied; and will be happy to see her beloved Sophia again; but it was justice and repentance which brought my brother and myself hither. 'Is Lord Seymour your brother, said Sophy, colouring.'—'Yes, we are sons of the same mother.' They then related to her the conversation they had with Lord N—, before their departure from Windsor. After some conversation, Sophy retired, and left Seymour in the greatest agitation. 'O heaven! said Seymour, I must have her or die;—but who will speak in my favour?' 'I will speak to her, replied Lord Rich.' 'O thou dearest and noblest of brothers, exclaimed Seymour, ask my life; every thing I possess; I can never pay thee too great a sum;—Will you intercede for me?—May every blessing be showered on my faithful, my generous friend!' Here the Ladies re-entered, and they turned the conversation. The next day Rich found means, in the most delicate manner, to acquaint her with Seymour's offer of his hand. 'It depends on you, said he to her, to constitute the happiness or misery of a young man of singular merit—you, alone, can spare my mother the distress of seeing both her sons form a vow of eternal celibacy.' 'Ah, my Lord! said she, with emotion, how urgent you are; but do you not see the difficulties?'—She covered her face with her hands. He embraced her. 'Dearest Sophy! I understand your difficulties; the delicacy, that suggests them, renders you still more adorable: But blast not the expectations of Seymour; I conjure you, give him permission to hope.' 'There is no occasion, Sir, said she, to have recourse to art, in order to engage me to become what you so ardently wish me to be'—Lord Rich repeatedly blessed her; and ran with eager haste to make Seymour happy. Suffice it to say, they were soon after united by the most indissoluble bonds.

Lord Rich gave his brother that hand which was so long the object of his wishes, and which he only renounced, because he found himself more capable than him of supporting the loss of it. After the death of Lord N—, the villainy of his creature John having been made public, he was universally execrated, and, some months after, met the fate he had long so justly deserved, by the hands of the common executioner, for being concerned with a gang of desperate ruffians in breaking open a Church and stealing the Communion-plate.

We shall conclude our narrative, with acquainting the Reader, that Lord and Lady Seymour, with their brother, live at Seymour-House, in a state of the highest felicity. A blessing reposes on every spot of their domain. With one hand they relieve merit in distress, and with the other scatter embellishments on the whole Lordship, in which the most elegant taste is their directress. The company of Lady Seymour is sought by all persons of virtue, while vice and folly dread and avoid it.

What benedictions, what recompences do they not merit, who in this manner hold up to the whole world a demonstration, that every thing that mortality requires is possible to be fulfilled; that the discharge of our duties, far from incommoding our pleasures, ennoble them, insures us the fruition of them, and becomes itself our real and substantial felicity in all the various situations and scenes of life!

TERRA-Firma is a very mountainous country. Terra-Firma Proper mostly consists of prodigious high mountains, and deep vallies, flooded more than half the year. The mountains in the provinces of Carthagera and St. Martha, according to Dampier, are the highest in the world, being seen at sea two hundred miles off: from these run a chain of hills, of almost equal height, quite through South-America, as far as the Straights of Magellan, called the Cordilleras des Andes. The province of Venezuela also, and district of the Caraccas, the most northerly parts of South-America, are almost a continued chain of hills, separated by small valleys, pointing upon the coast of the North-Sea. A chain of barren mountains, almost impassable, runs through the province of Popayan, from north to south, some whereof are volcanos; but, towards the shores of the Pacific Ocean, it is a low country, flooded great part of the year.

The principal rivers of Terra-Firma are the Darien, Chagre, Santa-Maria, Conception, Rio Grande, or Magdalena, Maracaibo, and Oroonoko.

The most considerable gulphs or bays, whether on the South or North Seas, are the gulphs of Darien, Triclio, Venezuela, and Paria or Andalusia; the bays of Panama, St. Michael, Porto-Bello, Guaira, Curiaco, Carthagenia, and Sino. The chief capes are, Samblas Point, Cape Canoa, Cape del Agua, Swart Point, Cape de Vela, Cape Conquibacoa, Cape Cubelo, Cape Blanco, Cape Galara, Cape Three Points, and Cape Nassau; all on the north shore of Terra-Firma.

Terra-Firma contains the provinces of Terra-Firma Proper or Darien, of Carthagenia, St. Martha, Rio de la Hacha, Venezuela, Comana, New-Andalusia or Paria, New-Granada, and Popayan.

Terra-Firma Proper lies in the form of a crescent, about the spacious bay of Panama, being the isthmus which joins South and North-America; and extending in length, between the two seas, three hundred miles, but in breadth, where the isthmus is narrowest, only sixty. Here are found gold mines, gold sands, and fine pearls; and though the land is generally rough, there are some fruitful vallies watered by rivers, brooks, and springs. The chief places are, Panama and Porto-Bello.

Panama stands, according to those excellent astronomers Don Juan and Antonio Ulloa, in latitude 8 deg. 57 min. 48 sec. $\frac{1}{2}$ north, upon that capacious and beautiful bay to which it gives name. In 1737 it was entirely consumed by fire; but hath been since rebuilt with elegant houses, but not magnificent. It is strongly fortified and garrisoned, and the walls mounted with large cannon. Here is the residence of the governor of the province, and the seat of a royal audience, with a convenient harbour, well secured against storms by a number of surrounding islands. Both the road and whole coast abound in a great variety of excellent fish. At the bottom of the sea are found numbers of pearls, and the oysters in which they are concealed are remarkably delicious. This kind of fishery is of great advantage to the inhabitants of all the islands in the bay; and there are few persons of substance about Panama, who do not employ at least a part of their slaves in it. The slaves thus employed must be expert swimmers, and capable of holding their breath a long time. During the season, eight, ten, or twenty of them set out, under the command of an officer, in a boat, from the islands, where they have huts built for their lodgings, to such parts of the bay as are known to produce pearls, and where the depth of the water is not above ten, twelve, or fifteen fathoms. Here they come to an anchor; and the negroes, having a rope fastened round their bodies, and the other end to the side of the boat, take with them a small weight to accelerate their sinking, and plunge into the water. On reaching the bottom, they take up an oyster, which they put under the left arm; the second they hold in their left hand, and the third in their right; with these three oysters, and sometimes another in their mouth, they rise to breathe, and put them in a bag. When they have rested themselves a while, they dive a second time; and thus continue till they have either completed their task, or their strength fails them. Every one of these negro-divers is obliged daily to deliver to his master a certain number of pearls; so that, when they have got a sufficient number of oysters in their bag, they begin to open them, and deliver the pearls to the officer, till they have made up the number due to their master; and if the pearl be but formed it is sufficient, without regard to its being small or faulty. The remainder, however large or beautiful, are the negro's own property; nor has the master the least claim to them, the slaves being allowed to sell them to whom they please, though the master generally purchases them at a very small price.

Besides the toil of this fishery, from the oysters adhering strongly to the rocks, the negroes are in no small danger from some kinds of fish, which either seize them, or run against them so violently as either to kill them, or crush them against the bottom. Every negro, to defend himself against these animals, carries with him a sharp knife, with which the fish being struck, immediately flies off. The officers keep a watchful eye on these voracious creatures, and, on discovering them, shake the ropes fastened to the negroes bodies, that they may be upon their guard. Many, on the diver's being in danger, have thrown themselves into the water, with the like weapon, to assist in his defence; but all their dexterity and precaution frequently have not been sufficient to protect the diver from being devoured by these fish; or losing a leg or an arm by their bite.

Some of the pearls are sent to Europe; but the greatest part of them are carried to Peru, where they are universally worn by all persons of rank.

LETTER II.

*St. James's Street, Saturday Night,
Jan. 11, 1777.*

Sir,

I pity from my heart the author of the inconsistent, yet jesuitical epistle, which I have just read. No person could with propriety have made the concessions, which were conveyed to me in your last, but one whose hypocrisy, and impudence, are equal to his indecency, and scurrility. I should laugh at your fictitious regard for your ministerial character, was not that regard, particularly from you, profane, sacrilegious, and shocking. Your letter has convinced me, that mine to you was not indecent and scurrilous, but proper and manly; but I find it is easier for you to write violent epithets, than to ratify them, when written either by your pen, or by the sword. Observe, Sir, this is the last letter I shall ever send to you, therefore give due attention to my following remarks and demands:—

I verily believe, that if I had applied to your Printer for a redress of my insults, I should have applied to a person of more real honour and dignity than yourself, but your sneaking sophistry cannot defeat my knowledge of the town, and of public business. I know that the Printer is only a machine, a mere subordinate Devil, and that you are the Belial, the ostensible minister of your infernal republic. As you are the Editor, I do, and will consider you the supervisor of the Morning Posts, and therefore you are responsible for the aspersions which have been thrown on me in that paper, unless you inform me of the names, and places of abode, of the authors.

To the copies of your scandal, I shall not vouchsafe a perusal:—the derogatory terms you apply to lady Strathmore's friends, calling them her partizans, and her panegyrists, betray your vile and inhuman disposition, eager to injure an object, which is always deemed sacred by generous minds, viz. the reputation of a lady. The virtues of whom I respect, and I shall ever be grateful for the honour of her acquaintance.

I now finally insist, that you either let me know the authors of the calumnies, which at present fix my attention, or that you solemnly promise before witnesses I shall chuse, that a word shall never again appear in the Morning Post injurious to lady Strathmore, or to any of her friends, who have been traduced in that paper. If you comply not with one of these alternatives, I am inflexibly determined immediately to publish the letter which I sent you this morning, to which I shall prefix an advertisement, importing the scurrility which occasioned it, and asserting that the Rev. Henry Bate is a coward and a scoundrel.

I am, Sir &c.

A. ROBINSON STONEY.

To the Rev. Mr. H. Bate, Adelphi.

To this was returned by Mr. Matra, the following

ANSWER.

Sir,

All your terms of personal reproach against me have no effect whatever, since my own feelings declare them unmerited. I shall not return raillery for raillery, but persist,—and will persist to the last moment of my life, that I never gave you offence by thought, sword, or deed. I have taken every method that I thought most likely to convince you of my innocence, respecting any charge you have advanced, or can alledge against me: Indeed in consideration of my professional character, with which you are inclined to be very pleasant,—I have made overtures, of a submissive nature to you, when an apology was rather due from you to me;—and all this you are pleased to attribute to mean and unmanly motives.—In answer to this your last letter, I have to tell you, that your design of standing forth the Countess of Strathmore's champion, is now evident, however you might wish to conceal it; but as I have never injured her Ladyship, nor you, I will not be compelled into any promises respecting either, though I would do both all the service in my power, if applied to in a manner but commonly civil. My determination is to make no appointment, nor to have any contest with you whatever, unless I am personally attacked; which, as I cannot have deserved, I am sure I shall not experience from you.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

H. BATE.

Adelphi, Sunday,

To A. Robinson Stoney, Esq;

St. James's-street.

To this almost immediately succeeded the Note beneath, left at Mr. Bate's house by Mr. Stoney himself.

LETTER III.

St. James's-street, Jan. 12, 1777.

Sir,

AS you seem determined (from what motives are best known to yourself) not to allow Mr. Matra, to settle the disagreeable affair between us, I desire to know where you are to be found this evening at eight o'clock, as I intend to give you every kind of provocation, till I can bring you to a proper sense of your conduct.

‘I am, Sir,

‘Your humble Servant,

‘A. ROBINSON STONEY.’

P. S. ‘As you appear to be timorously inclined, I give you my honour I shall go alone, and shall have no implements of war with me. I am engaged with a gentleman at the Cocoa-tree, and shall not have it in my power to get away before the hour I have fixed.’

‘To the Rev. Mr. Henry Bate, Adelphi.’

Mr. Bate’s servant soon after carried the following Answer :

‘Sir,

‘AS I make it a point never to conceal myself from any man,—notwithstanding what has passed between us, I will not be denied to you; and therefore inform you, in answer to your request, that I shall be met with at home at eight o’clock, alone, and without any implements of war, as you facetiously term it.—Was I inclined to court the provocation you threaten, (which I assure you I am not,) I should hardly be indecent enough on this evening to fall forth upon such a business.—I wish, sir, you would give me some occasion to forget the opprobrious, and ungentleman like language with which you have addressed me throughout; for I am once more anxious to see you, in order, if possible—though I have been unable by my letters—to convince you personally how unjust your idea is, of making me responsible for the contents of a daily paper, (supposing me the Editor thereof) the greater part of which the editor knows no more of than you yourself, before it appears publicly in print.

‘The observation in your postscript about my being timorously inclined, is, I own, in part true; for I should feel myself very unhappy indeed, to have my name again brought before the public, in a contest of this serious and extraordinary nature:—yet do me justice, Sir, at the same time, to put this construction on my apprehensions, and then you cannot misinterpret them.

‘I am, Sir,

‘Your obedient servant,

‘H. BATE.’

Adelphi, Sunday Evening,

Jan, 12, 1777.

To. A. R. Stoney, Esq;

Cocoa-Tree, Pall-mall.

In consequence of the above, Mr. Stoney came to the Adelphi; and though his personal address was less violent than the language of his letters, yet Mr. Bate was unfortunate enough not to be able to convince him of the impropriety, and injustice of his threats; for he departed, avowing his determined resolution of insulting Mr. B— whenever he saw him;—Not hearing from him the next morning, Mr. B— however flattered himself that he had thought better of it; but about one o’clock on Monday he received the following

LETTER IV.

St. James’s-street, Jan. 13, 1777.

‘Sir,

‘I AM ashamed of you, though you seem not to be so of yourself. I believed that you had one virtue—courage; but I am miserably mistaken.

‘If you comply not with the terms on which I insisted in my last letter but one, I shall be industrious to meet you in public; and I shall be properly prepared to meet you;—I insist that you be armed likewise. If you perform not one of these demands, I shall, immediately, publish the letter I sent you on Saturday morning. Remember for the future, Mr. Bate, that the propagation of scandal is far more unworthy of a Clergyman, than a personal display of courage upon any emergencies; but insolence and evasion are the characteristics of cowards; consistency and firmness, of the brave.

‘I am, Sir, yours, &c.

‘A. ROBINSON STONEY.’

Mr. Bate about three o’clock returned the under written ANSWER.

Adelphi, Monday, Jan. 13, 1777.

‘By your letter of this morning, I cannot any longer misunderstand your intentions.—All my endeavours to convince you of my innocence, and to adjust the present difference between us, which owes its origin to the impetuosity of your temper alone, are fruitless, very unjustly wrested from their sole intent, and attributed by you to the meanest of all motives.—Fear!—Had I ever wronged you, I might have been afraid of you; but till I can accuse myself of such conduct, I never shall.

‘You pressed me at our interview last night to inform you “which way I should walk this day?” I refused to satisfy you on that head, for fear it should be deemed an acceptance of your challenge.—I told you, however, then, which I here again repeat, that as I shall not designedly throw myself in your way, neither shall I put myself out of the course of my business to avoid you.

‘You insisted upon my doing, what, if you had asked me with politeness, I could not, upon my honour, have granted; viz. “giving you up the authors of the

the two articles you complain of:"—because, upon the word of a man, I knew them not, nor knew any thing of the insertion of their slander, though I lament the publication of it, on your account, more than my own.—

'You have cautioned me to be upon my guard against the attacks of an assassin:—self-preservation likewise tells me it is now absolutely necessary; and therefore, however inconsistent with the character of a Clergyman, I find myself compelled to go so far armed; in the evening at least, as to be able to defend myself: and since nothing can move you from your sanguinary purposes,—as you seem resolved, that either my life or my gown shall be the sacrifice of your groundless revenge,—in the name of God pursue it!

'I am, Sir,

'Your obedient servant,

'H. BATE.'

To A. Robinson Stoney, Esq.

St. James's-street.

As soon as Mr. B— had written, and sent the above answer, he immediately waited upon his friend Capt. Donnellan, to consult with him how he should act in so critical a situation, if attacked by Mr. S—? Capt. D—, after duly weighing all the circumstances, told him, he was glad to find that he had hitherto acted with so much prudence; but said, it behoved him now, from the intimation in Mr. S—'s last letter, to be upon his guard; and at the same time press'd him to call at his lodging in his way home for a few evenings, and take a sword of his that he might depend upon along with him, that if Mr. B— was attacked, as he knew something of the sword, he might defend himself; and if any thing happened that evening, begged he would fend for him, mentioning where he should dine. Mr. B— accepted his friendly offer of the sword, and proper directions were given to Capt. D—'s servant to deliver it whenever he might call for it. Mr. B. happening to dine out that day in Norfolk-street, from whence he returned about six, it struck him, that if any attack should be made upon him, it would most probably be that evening; he therefore went round by Covent Garden in his way home, and took Capt. D—'s sword, which he put under his great coat, and walked towards his own house; but no sooner had he passed the door of the Adelphi Tavern, than Mr. Stoney imperceptibly seized him by the shoulder, and addressing him by name, insisted upon his going in with him. Mr. B— refused to comply with his request, desiring him, at the same time, to take his hands off him, which he did—— Mr. S— then replied, 'Sir, if you do not chuse I should treat you unlike a gentleman you will follow me!' Mr. B. answered, 'Rather than raise a disturbance in the street, I will accompany you,' which he accordingly did, into the ground parlour, on the left-hand, beyond the coffee-room. As soon as Mr. S— had shut the door, he asked Mr. B— 'Whether he would give up the authors of the articles that reflected upon him, and the Countess of Stratmore, or make him an apology for the insults he had received in the publication thereof?'—To which Mr. B— replied, 'He had repeatedly assured him, which he now did again, that upon his honour, he was totally ignorant of them; and, with respect to the apology he required, he never should make any, till he was convinced he had offended him.'— Upon which Mr. S— rejoined — 'Then, Sir, you must give me immediate satisfaction.' About this time a servant brought in a case of pistols, whom Mr. S— sent off instantly, with his carriage, into Queen-street, Cavendish-square, for Mr. Matra, who, it seems, had informed him where he was to be found, if wanted on this business. Mr. B— finding the matter likely to prove very serious, instantly wrote the following note, which he sent immediately to his friend:

C O P Y.

My dear Donnellan,

'I have just this instant been forced into the Adelphi Tavern, by Mr. Stoney, who insisted upon my following him in here. Come to me this instant, as the man's impetuosity knows no bounds.— He has sent for his friend.

Your's, in great haste,

'H. BATE.'

To Capt. Donnellan, at Mr. Johnston's, Salisbury-street.

Unfortunately, perhaps, for both, neither of their friends were to be found.— Mr. Matra, it seems, was not at the place appointed, and Capt. Donnellan was at a Mr. Jackson's, and not a Mr. Johnston's, as written on the note.—Having been now in the room a considerable time, and neither of the Gentlemen coming, Mr. B— insisted upon going away, saying, 'he would not stay any longer.'—Upon which Mr. S— said, 'he must not,' and immediately locked the door, put a piece of paper in the key-hole, placed a large screen before the door, and then taking up the case of pistols, desired Mr. B— to take one, which he did. Mr. S— then asked him, 'whether he would have the first fire?' To which the other rejoined, 'certainly not!' Upon this Mr. S— instantly fired, and shot Mr. B—'s hat off. Mr. B— upon this asked him, if he was satisfied now?—To which he replied, 'No, Sir, you must fire your pistol,' which Mr. B— did accordingly, the ball passing through Mr. S—'s coat and waistcoat, who instantly on receiving the fire, called out 'Draw, Sir, and defend yourself!'—which Mr. B— immediately complied with. Mr. S— advanced, and attacking him, was run through on the right side, just under the breast,—received a scratch in the short ribs, and a wound in the sword arm.—Mr. B— received a wound in the muscular part of the right thigh, and a slight scratch on his side, the sword of his adversary passing at the same time through his coat, waistcoat and shirt.— Luckily for both, some Gentlemen belonging to a lodge of Free Masons then assembled overhead, at length heard the clashing of swords; who coming down, and breaking open the door, put an end to the contest.—It is but common justice to Mr. Stoney to observe, that on Mr. B—'s representing that his sword was bent nearly double, he dropt his point, and desired him to straighten it, which Mr. B— did under his foot.

Politeness* in its present situation being analysed, may be said to consist of ceremonies, and humanity, of the first of these a few only, are necessary among genteel assemblies; and still fewer in private companies, in the former, they are generally regulated by certain known rules, variable however, by times and circumstances; in the latter, they are best dictated by a delicate sense of propriety, and a conformity to the manners of others.—As to that part of politeness, which is said to consist of humanity, and which is the very ground work of all the rest, it is indispensably necessary to every one who would be regarded by society, nor can any peculiarity of circumstances whatever, excuse the general practice of it.—The legislator, the warrior, the student, and the commercial man, are alike expected to exercise it.—There is a species of it expected, from those who are devoted to agriculture, and in short from every man according to his station in life. It is generally, however seen in its greatest perfection and least mixed with the alloy of hypocrisy, among what we term the middle rank of mankind whose manners may be considered in this case as the best model we can propose.—Insincerity on the one hand, and raillery on the other, with a certain air of indifference, too frequently co-operating with ceremony, tend greatly to abridge the fundamental principle.—Whilst amongst the lower orders of men, self-love is apt to encroach upon it, and familiarity to generate a contempt inconsistent with that conduct, which religion and good manners, equally require us to practise towards our neighbours. Nobody ought ever to be above, any more than below good manners, which being compounded of ceremony, and humanity, form that urbanity, which gives a complacency to our behaviour, and while it makes us happy in ourselves, renders us agreeable to others. This is true politeness, all other matters are appendages to it, which every one should conform to, according to his own situation of life, and the relation which he bears to others.

Elements of Politeness.

Translated from the French.

ESSAY I.

BEFORE we endeavour to analyse the rules of decorum and good breeding, it will not be amiss to give some general precepts that may serve as a basis to the science.

Politeness is a science that teaches the proper and seasonable application of our words, and actions: it is necessary to add, that this science cannot be practised without a scrupulous attention to the four following circumstances.

First, Every one must behave according to his age, and condition of life.

Secondly, The rank of the person whom we address must be considered.

Thirdly, We must attend to the time and place.

Fourthly, We must be capable of distinguishing what is proper, and becoming, from that which is not so.

These four circumstances are so many rules which teach us the knowledge of ourselves, and others, and every other necessary distinction. The observation of which is of such importance, that if we deviate from any one of them, our actions will appear ridiculous and improper, though they should proceed from the most laudable intentions: we shall endeavour to examine each of these rules separately, in as concise a manner as possible.

I.

The first of these four rules is, perhaps, the

the most difficult to be reduced to practice, because it supposes the knowledge of ourselves, and this knowledge is generally what is lately required, owing to our self-love and vanity, continually suggesting a better opinion of ourselves than we deserve. But as it would be ridiculous for a young gentleman of fifteen to affect the manners of a Cato, or an old nobleman the behaviour of a petit-maitre; it would be no less censurable, if, in order to appear more knowing or polite, we attempted things beyond our sphere, and affected the airs of men of importance. We should never forget that truth alone is amiable. Let us be careful to keep within the bounds of modesty and humility, and at the same time studious to prevent that humility from degenerating into meanness or servility. A little prudence and attention will teach us to discover the due medium.

The second rule explains itself, as it is but a necessary consequence of the first.—A very slender portion of judgment will be sufficient to comprehend the obligation it enjoins. One thing we must however remember, with regard to politeness, that it is better to have too much than too little.

-3-

The observation of the third rule depends on prudence alone, and supposes the person to have the necessary discernment, and as this is connected with the fourth rule, we proceed to it without further ceremony.

This fourth rule requires us to distinguish between what is becoming and proper, from what is otherwise. In fact, the man who is so stupid and whimsical as not to have this discernment, is scarce fit for the society of decent people; he will confound time and place; he will be liable to commit blunders and mistakes, trifles will excite his admiration, while he will pay but little attention to matters of the greatest importance; his very civilities and compliments will be misapplied, and he will do every thing in an awkward manner.

But in order to make proper distinctions, three things are absolutely necessary.—First, We must have sense and judgment, in order to comprehend the different qualities of things. Those who want sense and judgment, which are two gifts bestowed on us by nature without any assistance from art, are to be pitied; for such we have no precepts. All that can be done for those who are totally incapable of improvement, is to supply in some degree their natural imperfection by the advantages of a good education, and to recommend study and application to them, and a continual attention to their own weakness and defects.

In the second place, we must be careful to observe what custom considers as proper and becoming, as well as what it condemns as improper and unbecoming. We must here distinguish the practice of nature from the practice of society. The practice of nature is that which nature herself has dictated with respect to many things; and indeed it is she that has taught us the first lessons of decorum; we should therefore consider her as a faithful and sure guide, and obey her suggestions with regard to what is decent and proper, and imitate her reserve in those things which she thinks indecent. She, for example, so far obliges us to conduct ourselves agreeable to the talent with which she has furnished us, that if we exceed her limits, by any affected voice or action, as many do, who affect a languid tone, or lisping enunciation, or certain airs and gestures that are not natural, the affectation and constraint are immediately perceived, and our love of simplicity discovers an impropriety that creates disgust. We should continually remember, that nature, all beautiful as she is, wants no ornament to set her off; and that our natural qualities can never make us appear so ridiculous as those which we affect.

With regard to the practice of society, it is nothing more than a certain custom established by the general consent of all polite people: it teaches us to regulate, according to the rules of decency and discretion, those of our actions for which nature has prescribed no certain rules; such as eating, drinking, coughing, spitting, sneezing, &c. which are actions necessary by nature, but as they are common to us with other animals, and that man, in order to support the dignity of his being, should distinguish himself from brutes, and aim at a greater degree of perfection in every thing, reason and established custom require that we should perform those actions as decently as possible, that is, in a manner quite different from other animals.

It is so with respect to other matters which do not depend upon nature, but which the same practice of society has established among men, such as uncovering the head, saluting, and returning a salute, giving precedence at a door, the upper-hand at a table, the wall in the street, &c. The knowledge of those various customs is very necessary, because they are so uniformly practised among most politions, that it is hardly worth while to take notice of the difference between one people and another, with regard to customs and manners; we are not however ignorant, that it sometimes happens, that what is decent and becoming in one country, may be offensive and shameful in another; in the same manner as what is proper at one time, is displeasing on a different occasion; but as this does not interfere with our plan, it is unnecessary to mention it in this preliminary discourse.

As to the third part, we must be careful not to confound familiarity with decency. This caution is the more necessary, as upon certain occasions familiarity may be proper and becoming, whereas on others, it would be very unpolite and improper.

Familiarity is a decent freedom in conversation, which, by a certain tacit and mutual agreement between the people who use it, obliges them to take in good part what would offend them if considered in a more rigorous light. Hence it is evident, that we cannot use it indiscriminately with all persons, we must therefore distinguish,

1st. Whether the person with whom we are in company, is our equal, our superior, or inferior.

2dly. Whether we have had a long acquaintance with that person, or, on the contrary, but little or none.

Between equals, where there is a long intimacy, familiarity is proper, and supposes friendship and confidence; where there is but little acquaintance, it is impoliteness; and where we have no knowledge of the person, it is imprudence and folly.

From an inferior to a superior, be the acquaintance short or long, familiarity is impertinent, without the particular commands of the superior, and even then great caution is necessary; but where there is no acquaintance with the superior, it would be the grossest insolence.

From a superior to an inferior, familiarity is always within the rules of good-breeding, and it is even a favour shewn to the inferior, because marks of kindness from a person far above us, are very flattering to self-love. We have here given what we consider as the most necessary and essential to be observed with respect to the rules of good breeding in general. The principles we have laid down, would be sufficient to a man who should know how to apply them properly; but that is hardly possible to young people who want experience: it is necessary therefore to explain them in a more particular manner; with this view, we shall divide this treatise into chapters, in order to facilitate the application of the rules laid down: We always suppose our pupil to be the inferior, who treats with a superior, and where the parties are not much acquainted with each other, but by a little attention to the general precepts we have given, it will be easy, with a small degree of judgment, to make the necessary distinctions, in order to comprehend and apply them on all occasions, and with persons of every degree.

The Gentleman's full Dress, for the Drawing-room, on the Queen's Birth-day, January 18th, 1777.

THE materials of the coat, a crimson figured satin, richly embroidered in imitation of Brandenburg's, or olives, and a narrow embroidered edge down the front, in gold spangles.

The waistcoat lined with fur—the waistcoat and breeches the same as the coat, or a different colour, being left to fancy. The make of the coat is the same as has been for some years, except that the waist is shorter—the skirts of course longer, and the coat upon the whole, of a moderate length. What is generally called a French frock, is the court-dress. The cuff is small, and close, with three buttons on the upper side.

More fur edgings and linings to coats and waistcoats were seen at court this time, than were ever known in England.

A great number of figured velvets, with a flowered edging of different colours wove into the velvet (we are sorry to say) of French manufacture appeared, on English bodies—these are smuggled into the country to the detriment of our English manufactures—though we now rival France in every rich and elegant ornament.

Many suits of velvet and cloth were trimmed with rich applique, applied, a term given to shapes of rich embroidery intermixed with gold and silver, and coloured spangles and foil, green, red and crimson; made fit to apply to any suit.—The plainer suits were Irish rateen lined with feather velvet, or satin, of different colours from the coat, with gold spangled buttons. The gayest summer colours worn in the silk suits were chiefly puce or flea colour, damson and chocolate, lined with white, blue, green, pink, or rose colour feather velvets, or satins.

The wigs were worn with a small peak, feathered top, and frized down the temples, short over the ear, three small curls, one parallel, and two obliquely pendant.

The swords, all steel hilts, some richly intermixed with blue steel, or inlaid with gold; and exquisitely polished, with the diamond cut; and white scabbards.

The hats of black silk, flat, worn barely for parade, under the left arm; but for the ball-room, those noblemen and gentlemen who danced, had fine beaver hats with white white feathers, the buttons and loops of the best woodstock, diamond cut steel, or gold and silver spangles.

N. B. Neither the enormous large buttons to the coats, nor the prepolterous buckles called Artois are adopted in the full dress; they are only the reigning mode in undresses.

Description of the undress for the Ladies.

The most fashionable morning dress, and home undress for all day, is a dehabille, which consists of a short jacket and petticoat: the coat is generally puckered round the bottom about a quarter of a yard deep, with gauze, or the same silk. But fur is more in vogue this month than any other trimming.—The jacket is short, not above a quarter of a yard on the hip, it is neatly shaped in the back with four quarters, the front resembling the polonese, fastens at the top with two frogs and tassels—the waistcoat is generally ornamented with frogs and tassels. In the late severe weather, an addition was made to this dress, of a calash hood, which is not only a great ornament, but preserves the wearer from catching cold in the head.

Description of an half Dress, being the next to the Court Dress, and proper for Young Ladies at any public Assembly.

This is an Italian robe, consisting of a robe and petticoat. The robe is generally one yard and three quarters from the waist, it is rounded off before, and comes with a gradual slope to the hind part, and is usually scooped all round. The petticoat is of a different colour, either puckered, or tambour work, with a broad silk fringe of the same colour round the bottom.—At each hip of the robe hangs a large tassel, by which they draw up the robe, to dance country dances, and tie it on the left side like a bow, and let the tassels hang down about half a yard below the waist.

The back of the robe is in four pieces, and there are two whalebones in every seam. The cut differs very little from what has been the fashion for some time, except that it is puckered in the shape of a melon, and intermixed with different coloured foil, or artificial flowers. It likewise raises to a point about four inches above the bend of the elbow, at the back part of the arm. The robe is close breast-ed, and quite plain in the front, only the peak of the stomacher is made two inches longer than for last month.

The trimmings, gauze with flowers, gold and silver net, at fancy. The queen's olive, nut colour, colour de puce, and damson plain silks, and sattins of all colours are worn, and petticoats white, blue and pink, or rose colour, suited to the contrasted colour of the robe.

The cap is a French undress, to be worn only with the dehabille. It has a full lappet across the head, but none descending behind,—both lappets and ribbons hanging down behind, being entirely left off by genteel people, in undress,—an alteration which has taken place this month. It is ornamented with rich padusay ribbon. mostly white, it is edged with a gimp chain, into which, spangles may be interspersed. The wing is full pleated before, the side curls of their hair are shewn descending under the wing.

Cloaks are worn about three quarters of a yard in length from the shoulder,—of equal depth all round; being cut in four quarters, with arm holes, and chiefly trimmed and lined: or only trimmed with sable or ermine. The two front ends or points, descend about three nails lower than round the waist. The hood very large. White and pink, figured sattins are the reigning mode for young people.

The hats are made much larger than for last month, and trimmed very full, the edges of the ribbons are trimmed with different coloured furs, and spangled.

Muffs are worn long and slender, of plain white sattin, tamboured and ornamented with furs, sewed on in serpentine forms round the muf, and intermixed with spangles, and large bows of ribbons at each end.

Essay on excessive Drinking.

If twice Man's age you wou'd fulfil,
Let Reason guide you, not your will.

THERE is not any folly which degrades mankind so much as excessive drinking; it debases those who are guilty of it beneath the brute creation: and a sober porter may look with a kind of conscious superiority on a drunken peer.

The wretch who, when driven to despair by misfortunes, or stimulated to phrenzy by some gust of passion, puts a period to his existence, is looked upon with universal horror. His name is branded with infamy, and his remains denied interment in consecrated ground, these are the stigma of this world, while dreadful is the idea of the punishment to come.

“Those who in heaven's offended face will fly,
“And snatch from fate the proper time to die,
“Give the immortal soul to endless pains,
“And dwell a sad eternity in chains.

Such is the light in which self-murder and its dreadful consequences are looked upon by the generality of mankind. But what must we think of the man who for some successive years is taking the utmost pains to accomplish the act of suicide, who labours to destroy that noble faculty, reason, which distinguishes him from the brute creation, who takes a pride in rendering himself ridiculous, qualifies himself at a considerable expence, to act with the utmost absurdity; and with great assiduity overthrows an excellent constitution, with which Providence had endued him? For what? The supreme satisfaction of making himself a beast; for such a man, is a drunkard.

When one who hath not resolution enough "to take arms against a sea of troubles" precipitately murders himself, he is execrated and condemned by a great number, who after having expressed their disapprobation of the horrid deed, immediately adjourn to a tavern, and very deliberately murder themselves by inches.—For excessive drinking is a slow, but sure poison. They are equally self-murderers. The only difference is, the first rashly and suddenly rushes into eternity, the latter takes more time and pains to accomplish the act, and consequently by proceeding with greater premeditation, are much more culpable. Drunkenness is a short madness.—But the real lunatic and the drunken madman, are to be viewed in a light essentially different; the one deserves the tear of pity, the other the lash of contempt.—The one is afflicted by the hand of God, the other brings his insanity upon himself.

Our immortal Shakespeare somewhere says, "It is astonishing that a man will willfully and knowingly put a thief into his mouth to steal away his brains."

That great philosopher Lord Bacon, in treating of the pernicious consequences of drunkenness, says, "Drunken men are taken with a plain defect, or destitution in involuntary motion; they reel, they tremble, they cannot stand nor speak strongly. The cause is, that the spirits of wine, or other liquors, oppress the animal spirits, and occupy part of the place where they are, which renders them weak. Drunken men are therefore apt to fall asleep; for spirituous liquors are opiates.

Drunken men imagine that every thing turneth round, they imagine likewise that things come rushing on them. They cannot well see things afar off. Things near them either appear distorted or seem double. The cause of the imagination, that things turn round, is, that the spirits themselves turn, being compressed by the vapours of the liquors drank. For any liquid body upon compression turneth as we see in water. And it is all one to the sight whether the visual spirits, the object, or the medium, moves.

The cause of the imagination that things rush upon them, is that the visual spirits themselves draw back, which occasions the object to seem to rush on. Besides, when they see things turn round and move, fear maketh them think they come upon them.

The cause why they cannot well see things afar off, is the weakness of the spirits.—For in every megrim or vertigo, there is obtenebation joined with a semblance of turning round.

The cause of seeing things distorted is owing to the refraction of the visual spirits. For the vapour is an unequal medium, the same as things seen in water which appear to be out of place.

The cause of seeing things double, arises from the swift motion of the spirits, they being pressed to and fro; for as was before mentioned, the motion of the visual spirits, and the motion of the object, make one appearance."

The same noble author, farther observes. "That men are sooner drunk with small draughts, than they are with great ones." This occasions a sot, who continually sips, to be intoxicated sooner than one who drinks in company.

Indeed, excessive drinking is injurious to all the faculties of the soul, and functions of the body. It hurts the reason by clouding it, debilitates the genius by stupifying and chaining it down as it were to earthly and gross matters, which prevents it from soaring, and exalting itself to ethereal things and sublime objects. It weakens the judgment by confusing it, and in time totally annihilates the memory.

"For memory is by heat annoy'd,

"And by hard drinking quite destroy'd:

"Thus from the brain that's hot and dry,

"The slight impressions quickly fly;

"But in the moist and phlegmy brain,

"The stamps are deep, and long remain."

Doctor Barnard's Poem on Health.

It blunts the invention, overturns the penetration, dulls the sagacity, dims the sight, weakens the spirits, inflames the blood, unstrings the nerves, brings on a thousand dreadful disorders, emaciates the whole body, is productive of a premature old age, anticipates the final period of our existence, and concludes in a dreadful self-invited death, or rather premeditated suicide.

There

There is a saying, that if a man could see himself when drunk, he would never be guilty of that folly again. But as it is impossible for a person in a state of intoxication to judge of things, it is a great pity that we will not look into those mirrors with which others daily present us. And when we see our neighbours change themselves into beasts, we ought, while we despise them for the absurdities they run into, to refrain from being guilty of the same folly, and improve our own conduct by their errors.

Some are so weak as to imagine that even the most felonious or atrocious transgression committed in a state of intoxication, is excusable or at least palliated in the eye of reason, though not in the eye of the law. But this is a most senseless and absurd maxim, replete with immorality, and teeming with the most dreadful consequences.—For law, which is founded on reason, will not, nor cannot allow that the commission of a great folly, previous to a great crime, can in any wise palliate the latter. Or that a man, by changing himself into a brute, can be excused for acting with brutal ferocity. If so pernicious an opinion was adopted, farewell to all law and society.—For every villain would, by intoxication, prepare for, and encrease his avidity to commit the most atrocious enormities.

The following story will evince the dreadful consequences of inebriation, among even the most worthy characters when they are overcome by it.

Mr. Williams possessed an excellent natural understanding, and a sublimity of genius which exalted him above the least fordid idea. His education was learned and refined, his manners polished and courtly, yet elegantly sincere. To an engaging person he added a most graceful address, while the happy turn of his wit, and his brilliant satire, which gave more pleasure than pain, and captivated while it reformed, rendered his company sedulously sought for. To these natural and acquired endowments of mind and body, he was blessed with that benignity of soul which makes the possessor 'tremblingly alive all o'er' to the distresses of his fellow creatures. His good-nature kept pace with his humanity, for his manner of relieving misery, was such as gave a double merit to the benevolence of the action itself. In fine, he seemed a being filled with universal philanthropy, and formed to be beloved by all.

Mr. Williams had a most unbounded affection for Miss Lucy Minors, an amiable young lady, whose beauty could be equalled only by her goodness, and whose goodness seemed an emanation of heavenly perfection. They were on the best terms with each other, and the friends of each who saw their attachment mutual, concluded that the nuptial day, which was to give two such accomplished persons to the embraces of each other, could not be far distant.

Mr. Williams entertained a like fervent friendship for Sir Francis Rawley, a gentleman every way worthy of his most cordial regard; their esteem was reciprocal, as their sentiments appeared to be congenial; they were in fact the Orestes and the Pyldades of the politest circles in town.

Thus happy in the endearing ties of love and friendship, blessed with all mental and corporal endowments, exalted by birth, easy in fortune, and beloved by all who knew him, nothing seemed wanting to complete Mr. Williams's jubiliary felicity, but tying the connubial knot between him and Miss Minors, and giving a sacred confirmation to the union of their hearts.

A few days previous to that which was appointed for the celebration of their nuptials, Mr. Williams happened to spend the evening at a tavern. Sir Francis Rawley was accidentally there with several other gentlemen.

Mr. Williams, elated with his prospect of happiness, gave way too much to the natural hilarity of his disposition, and drank more freely than prudence would admit. At first he was all life, jocularly, and repartee: at length, growing intoxicated, the fumes of the liquor he had drank overwhelmed his reason;—his imagination overcame his judgment, and he gave a too unbounded licence to his tongue. The topic started was politics; he differed in opinion from his friend Sir Francis: heated by the argument, he grew too warm, and used such language as none who knew him could suppose would ever have escaped his tongue, and indeed such as no man of honour could receive with impunity. The consequence was an immediate encounter, in which Sir Francis fell to the ground, having received a wound through the body.

Mr. Williams walked away during the confusion, without any seeming purpose or design; his steps involuntarily led towards Miss Minors—he knocked at the door—it was about eleven o'clock at night; but having always free access in the family, he was admitted.

Miss Minors was just on the point of retiring to her bed-chamber. She was in at elegant undress, the simplicity of which gave an additional lustre to her natural charms.

On the sight of this amiable lady, Mr. Williams forgot the duel; forgot the situation of his friend, and beheld her with uncommon ardour.—His imagination was heated; his blood inflamed; the person; the dishabille; the time; all conspired to raise his passions.—In short, he unfortunately made an attempt which would make a woman of virtue scorn him, a man of honour despise himself, and which compelled the lady to order her servants to turn him out of doors.

His next resource was to a brothel, where he passed the night with a strumpet. In the morning ten thousand reflections crowded upon his mind, and gave his soul the most excruciating pangs; he took a post chaise for Dover; but his agitation at the same time was so great that he scarcely knew what he did—he reached Paris, where he still remains a melancholy example of the fatal consequences of excessive drinking.—Being perpetually perplexed with the corroding thoughts of having put his dearest friend's life in the most imminent danger, as his recovery is still doubtful; of having irreconcilably offended the woman he loved; and of having contracted a disorder by his imprudence which threatened the most fatal depredations on his constitution. Such are the dreadful effects of excessive drinking.

Brief Account of the Suit of Elizabeth, late Duchess of Kingston, and the Right Hon. Augustus John, Earl of Bristol, in the Consistory Court at Doctor's Commons, on Friday Jan. 24, respecting a Sentence of the said Court, pronounced in the Year 1768, in a Suit of Jactitation.

IT is already well known, that a private marriage took place in the year 1743, between his lordship (then the hon. Augustus John Hervey) and the lady in question; that after the marriage, the parties had very little intercourse; and that after the year 1748 or 49, they never cohabited, at least, lived together, either publicly or privately. It is equally notorious, that a connexion of a tender nature having for some years existed between the lady and the late Evelyn Duke of Kingston, his grace having resolved to marry her, to wipe away or remove the suspicions created by the above-mentioned connexion, which was not then known to have any real foundation, she thought, or was advised to institute a Suit of Jactitation against her imputed husband, in the Ecclesiastical Court by way of complaint, alledging that he pretended to be married to the complainant; denying any such marriage, and calling on him to prove the matter so alledged. The effect of this suit was, that the then Mr. Hervey, failing in the proof of the supposed marriage, the court proceeded to judgment, and gave sentence, that the parties, as far as appeared to the court, were not married; but that the said Elizabeth Chudleigh was, and is a spinster, and is free to marry again, especially in respect to the said Augustus John Hervey. The consequence of this sentence was, that the lady looking upon herself at least legally entitled to marry, was in the following March 1769, married to the late Evelyn Duke of Kingston. So matters rested till after his Grace's decease, when his near relations, controverting the legality of the marriage, the lady, on a criminal process, was tried by her peers, when the marriage between her and Mr. Hervey being proved to their lordships satisfaction, the second marriage became of course null and void, her first husband being still alive.

Lord Bristol thus circumstanced, in a few weeks after the late decision of the house of peers in full parliament, gave directions to his proctor, to give notice to his wife, Elizabeth Countess of Bristol, to appear in the Consistory Court of London, to shew cause why the sentence of the said court, passed in 1768, enjoining him perpetual silence as to the premises, should not be revoked, or set aside. The lady being out of the kingdom, the affidavits stated that she was served with a citation, or notice, at her house in Calais, on the 26th of June, 1776; that in consequence of her non-appearance, either in person or by attorney, a decree, or edict, was issued by the court, which was afterwards, according to usage, posted on one of the pillars of the royal exchange, informing her, that the court would proceed, in case of non-appearance, or cause shewn to the contrary, to receive proofs why the said sentence of the court, passed in 1768, declaring the said Elizabeth Chudleigh a spinster, should be set aside or revoked. Besides this, there was a short account given of the substance of the several allegations, answers, replies, and rejoinders, made by council, since the commencement of the citation now mentioned. On the part of the lady, the only material affidavit was that of one Williams, her servant at Knightbridge, who deposed, that Kingston house is still in the lady's possession; that she keeps servants there, and among others keeps him; that she continues to pay parish taxes and all other parish dues, within the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster; and that all letters, messages, &c. are received at that house, and are from thence transmitted to her in the usual manner.

Doctor Calvert arose on behalf of the lady, to shew cause why the sentence in 1768 should not be set aside, and that her protest, protest, then delivered into court, and read, containing the general reason of his client against revoking said sentence, should be deemed a bar to all further proceedings in their present form. The doctor maintained the validity of the original sentence on several grounds. Besides this, he impeached the legality of the whole proceedings of lord Bristol on the ground of informality. He contended, though the sentence were final in no other respect, it was final in point of proceeding; no new suit could be instituted on a matter already determined; if the determination of the house of peers was to lead that court, the matter must be taken up de novo; it was res adjudicata in every sense, but particularly in the latter—it was impossible; therefore to bring the matter before the court in this form, there should have been an original citation: The parties were out of the court as much as if they had never before been in; and it is an indispensable requisite in all proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, that the matter itself, and the means of bringing it under the cognizance of the court, be both original. He quoted a great number of Spanish and Italian Canonists and Civilians in support of this doctrine, and affirmed with great confidence, though the merits were clearly with the noble lord who was one of the parties in this cause, which he contended strongly were not, yet this information vitiated all the proceedings, and could not be cured otherwise than beginning de novo.

The other argument chiefly insisted on by the doctor was, although the proceedings had hitherto been perfectly regular, yet no precedent in practice, no rule of law, nor professional doctrine whatever could be adduced, which would be sufficient to authorize the decree against the lady. It was never known that a sentence of that court had been set aside without appeal. The time for appealing, three years, was long since elapsed; eight years had intervened; consequently it was now impossible for the court to grant a review, or rehearing, howsoever well inclined. The doctor spoke upwards of an hour and an half, and delivered himself well, but his argument turned on the two points of informality in the mode of proceeding, and want of precedent, in revoking a sentence once given, and acquiesced in after a certain stated period.

He was followed on the same side by Dr. Wynne. He went over a great deal of the same ground with his learned leader, and illustrated several of his brother's arguments with remarkable ingenuity and ability.—As to the point of informality, he called to the aid of the Spanish and Italian Cano-nists and Civilians, several German ones; and as to the conclusiveness of the sentence, he resorted to many weighty and plausible arguments. To the conclusiveness he dwelt particularly on two cases reported by Theeble and Moore, the 28th and 4th of Elizabeth, one of a man, and the other of a woman, who had been divorced a vinculo, for their native inability, but who afterwards marrying, had children. Here the question came to be, Shall the second marriage be deemed good, though the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court should be founded in error? It was decided in both cases that it should, because the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court should be held sacred, final, and conclusive. In answer to the general doctrines laid down by the antient Canonists, which he foresaw would be quoted against him, he observed, that among the Romanists, or Papists, marriage was deemed a sacrament; the privileges derived to the clergy on this account were numerous and lucrative; they claimed every thing of this kind as not cognizable by the civil magistrate; it was therefore no wonder that they laid down the rules that were most likely to answer their own ends, and advance their own importance. Protestantism was of another complexion; it looked for other support, and was founded in other principles; he therefore maintained his great principle, that a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court was conclusive on this ground. Innocent the IXth, Pope of Rome, whose opinion is cited in the 4th Decretal, in his Pontifical character decided, that a person divorced for inability, who might afterwards prove a father or a mother on a second marriage, the latter marriage would be null and void; whereas by the two decisions in the reign of Elizabeth alluded to, it was determined that the issue of such a second marriage was deemed legitimate; whence he drew this deduction; that the opinions of Canonists in Popish times and Popish countries, however respectable, ought not to weigh against the established modes of decision adopted in our courts of law.

Dr. Marriot replied on the other side very ably and fully; but as he chiefly rested his arguments on the authority of the decision in the house of peers, respecting the validity of the lady's marriage, and to general assertions that the matter between the parties was still sub judice, we shall pass over them.

Dr. Harris, on the same side, to shew cause why the decree should be complied with, answered the arguments of his antagonists in a very clear and distinct manner. He argued the main point in issue very ably. He insisted that it was an indisputable blem maxim in the Canon law, that a suit or cause relative to marriage was never finally decided or determined, because, in matters of conscience and religion, no true or real satisfaction could be obtained, till both were clearly satisfied and obeyed. As to the matter of informality, he insisted the people could not be otherwise. The great stress of the argument on the other side, he observed, was, that the lady had a house at Knightsbridge, and that, according to the customary mode of process the notice was not left at her house there, but at Calais, where she had only a temporary residence. This, in his opinion, was the most puerile subterfuge imaginable. He said, if service meant any thing, it meant a notice the lady had; it was therefore absurd to raise an objection on that head.

On the whole, the council having finished, Dr. Bettefworth, in a clear, candid manner, took a review of the arguments on both sides. He observed, in the first place, that he looked upon the suit of jactitation to be still substantially before the court. The case, he said, was shortly this: Mr. Hervey, in the year 1768, was supposed to brag, or declare, that Elizabeth Chudleigh was his wife. This offending the lady, she brought him to the proof. He would not, nor could not prove it. The court declared, as far as appeared to them, the allegation to be false; on which Mr. Hervey, one of the present parties, was enjoined silence, and there the matter rested. Since then, the first judicature in the kingdom, (perhaps upon earth) having declared the validity of such marriage, it would not, he said, be now decent to controvert it. What then was to be done? the first judicature in the kingdom had decided, that the marriage was legal; in consequence of that decision the present lord Bristol was bound in several respects. It did not appear whether it was in his lordship's power to give the information at the time of the passing of the sentence, that has since come out; whether or no, in his opinion, it was proper that the whole proceedings should be enquired into, and the matter fully revived; and, on the whole, he took it to be a clear incontrovertible principle in the Canon law, that marriages, however decided, are always open to revision and future enquiry. To strengthen what he offered on this point, he alluded to a passage in Burnet's History of the Reformation, where the Pope, after declaring the marriage of Henry VIII. with the Queen Catharine of Arragon, to be valid, the Pope adds, as a general proposition, that matters of this kind are always open to future examination and enquiry; and accordingly discharged, the rule; by which decision the lady will be obliged to shew cause why the sentence shall not be revoked, and lord Bristol let in to prove the marriage.

Political Character of Lord John Cavendish.

THIS noble lord is one of the most distinguished leaders of the opposition in the House of Commons. He usually frames the motions of re-commitment, adjournment, or amendment, according to the nature of the questions, or measures introduced, proposed, or supported by administration. His lordship, besides being in some measure the representative of the noble and illustrious house of Cavendish in that house, fills another station no less honourable and conspicuous, that of leading the Whig party: he fills, in short, a station in one house, exactly similar to that occupied by a noble marquis in the other; and as we have given our thoughts in a cursory manner, more than once, on the censurable conduct of the modern Whigs, it is proper that we should set that matter in a true light, lest it might be taken either as a virtual approbation of those who supplanted them in office, and pre-engaged the confidence and affection of their young sovereign, or lest we should be understood that the Rockingham or Whig party avow and maintain in all its parts the same system of government administered by their predecessors. This would indeed be a kind of Jewish political dispensation; it would be visiting the sins of the fathers on the children to the third and fourth generation on one hand, while it would be rank predestination on the other, to impute the mere professions of the Tories as righteousness.

To ascertain the value of those two parties, it will be necessary to take a short retrospective view of them, in their leading stages, and in their respective states of perfection and degeneracy.

The Whigs were in their greatest state of perfection during the three or four first years of the reign of King William; they degenerated gradually, from their first junction with the Tories, about that period, who twice incorporated with them, and twice betrayed them, till at length having been contaminated by this intercourse, and on the accession of the Hanover family having gained the entire ascendancy in the closet, the cabinet, and parliament, they deserted and belied all their former professions, and ruled the nation with an heavy, though unsteady hand, for nearly forty years.—They then called in their ancient and inveterate enemies, the Tories, *, to defend the the court against the attack of an ambitious demagogue †, as he was styled. The unnatural union took place, and the Whigs were for the third time ousted of their places, and stripped of their power *.

We shall not rehearse the speculative principles of the Whigs, because those will be gathered from the avowed doctrines of the Tories.

The Tories condemned the riot-act, the septennial parliament act, standing armies, places, pensions, and sinecure posts—because the Whigs avowed, established, or supported the necessity or propriety of them: yet they have been in possession of power, for nearly fifteen years, and they have not taken a single step to carry into execution those measures, the necessity of which they had rung the changes on for upwards of forty years; but, on the contrary, have uniformly opposed, smothered, or derided every attempt of the kind, as strenuously as they urged them, when out of power.

From this faithful sketch we are, we presume, authorised to draw this fair and manifest deduction, from the revolution to the present year, being a period of eighty-seven years, of which the Whigs have had the ascendancy for fifty-seven, and the Tories for about thirty; that they were both equally liberal of promises when out, and equally forgetful, and averse to perform them, when in; that a debt of one hundred and fifty millions has been contracted; and that, till the commencement of the present reign, it is difficult for the impartial man, or the lover of truth, to determine which of these parties did more mischief, unless in reference to their respective abilities, which chiefly depended on the growing wealth of the people, and the taxes which had been drawn from them. Thus, when only two millions per annum were raised on the nation, so much bribery, corruption, and the concomitants of high establishments could not be carried on, as when five times that sum amount to no more than the ordinary and current supplies. It is merely on this account that we look upon the influence of the crown, and all the pernicious destructive arts of ministers, as likely to be much more fatal and extensive, than before, because the means of giving them full force and operation, is proportionably increased.

We have considered the conduct of those two parties since the revolution, without flattery, prejudice, or partiality, on either hand. Let us then take a more particular inspection of them, since they have changed their names; perhaps they may have likewise changed their principles.—Are the king's friends the legitimate offspring of the Tories? Is the Rockingham party lineally descended from the Whigs of the two last reigns? Both these questions must certainly be answered in the affirmative. But though this be strictly true, it does not follow that the active principles of the one, or the speculative principles of the other, continue the same with the original stock. The Rockingham party disclaim corruption: they have done more, they have proved it in the course of their short administration. The King's friends have reprobated the principles of the great oracle * of the party, from whence they sprung, that the king is no more than the first magistrate in this country; on the contrary, they would render the king the maker, as well as the prime executor of the law; they consider his office as sacred, his opinions infallible.

The Rockingham party consider the king as one of the three estates, invested with a negative on the other two, on pressing and important occasions, and intrusted with the executive power; but in both cases, in the dernier resort, under the controul of the people. In fine, as the king's friends, through the influence before mentioned, have prevailed upon the people to assert rights, in order to transfer them to the great object of their idolatrous superstition, so the Rockingham party deny the claim to be well founded, and think, though it were, that it would be better to suspend, or even relinquish it entirely, than assert it at so great a risque; much more, when the event of success would, in their opinions, enable their adversaries to establish the most heterodox and desperate doctrines in both church and state; a religion repugnant to the genuine spirit of the gospel, a constitution contrary to law, justice, and civil freedom.

Lord John Cavendish, independent of his general conduct in parliament, and his uniform opposition to the court, has peculiarly distinguished himself as an individual, against the measures planned and carried into execution, relative to America.

His lordship's penetration and quick-sighted attention to the conduct of the minister and his employers, were never more conspicuous than in the month of December 1774. The Boston Port, Massachusetts Bay charter bill, and that for the trial of offenders, had been passed the preceding session.

session. General Gage, with a considerable body of troops, had been sent out in order to carry those laws into effectual execution; but both the laws and the force sent out on that occasion answered to no purpose. The former served only to throw the whole province of Massachusetts Bay into the most violent ferment; and the latter as a warning to the Americans, to prepare themselves for the worst.

The new parliament met the 29th of November, and it was the 13th of December, after the navy and army estimates, and land-tax had been voted and granted, that his lordship made the following shrewd and pointed observations. He first described the state of America from general report; that the commander in chief of his Majesty's troops was at that instant sustaining a kind of siege; that a general congress had assembled the preceding summer, and that every province, town, and district from Halifax to Georgia, were either deliberating on measures of resistance, or had made actual preparations for it. Such being the state of affairs in America, he owned he could not avoid expressing his most hearty astonishment that the navy peace establishment should be lowered a fifth, instead of being increased at least a third; that the military establishment should be kept up on its usual footing; and that the land-tax should be continued at three shillings in the pound. This he insisted was a mere ministerial trick, calculated to delude and mislead. It gave the lie direct to the speech, and to the measures recommended in the speech, which were wished from the throne to be spirited and decisive. He contended, that the nominal estimates already voted signified no more than so much waste paper: that the black book, containing the real estimates of an American war, long since in secret agreed upon, was not yet opened; that the minister, and those who set him his task, thus amused the nation with reduced establishments, at the eve of a bloody, unnatural, and expensive civil war; that he sent a message to the minister, apprizing him that he intended to move something which might extort from his lordship what he seemed so desirous to conceal; for in his opinion, to talk of enforcing acts of parliament through such an extent of country as the British empire in America, by a reduced peace establishment, was a language only fit to be held to children.

His lordship's suspicions proved true, and his predictions were fully verified; for as soon as lord North felt the pulse of the new parliament, and perceived his strength in both houses, both the navy and army were considerably augmented.

His lordship occupied the same ground throughout that session, and opened his opposition on it the next. He foretold the foreign levies a considerable time before Christmas; and remarked frequently, that the nation, under various pretences, founded in specious falsehoods, had been led blindfolded, step by step, into the American war, without seeing an inch of the way before them. The bills of coercion in 1774 would never, he said, have received the sanction of parliament, if the grants and events of 1775 had been foreseen; much less would the fifteen millions campaign of 1776, with the chance of a foreign war, be ever consented to, when it was the current opinion of that house that five regiments of infantry, with a small field train of artillery, might march peaceably from Hudson's Bay to Pensacola, without hindrance or molestation.

We shall close an account of his lordship's parliamentary conduct, with his sentiments on the 7th of November, 1775, in the debate on the army estimates, when he boldly told the minister, that he trusted that Englishmen, in any part of the empire, would never submit to slavery, much less to the unnatural tyranny of their own brethren and fellow subjects; that it was the peculiar interest of every man in Britain, who valued his own liberty, to protect and defend that of his fellow-subjects, no matter which side of the Atlantic; for he had not a single doubt that whatever mode of government should be established in America, would soon make its way hither; and the liberties of both countries flourish or perish together; they would survive for many ages; or, falling under the iron hands of despotism, would perish by the same blow, and be buried in one grave.

Lord John Cavendish hath high personal integrity. His lordship speaks with facility, pointed, and correct. He is bold without passion, and spirited without ill-nature. The strength of his expressions, are nevertheless happily blended with candour and modesty; and he has the knack, even in the midst of his most pointed severities, of persuading his hearers that his strictures arise from a compliance with his duty, as contradistinguished to any thing which might bear the most distant semblance to personal spleen or personal gratification. On the other hand, his lordship's abilities as an orator, are far from being striking, forcible, or extensive. His speeches are deficient in point of elocution, even when most animated and unembarrassed. His manner appears finical; his articulation is thick; his voice is weak, though not low; his delivery delivery is crowded and rapid ; and he is destitute of those exterior arts which are wont to give discourses, infinitely short both in matter and arrangement, to his lordship's, a much more pleasing and plausible outside.

An Estimate of the Theatrical Merit of the late Spranger Barry, Esq;

FEW men, in his walk of life, ever enjoyed longer, or possessed in a more eminent degree, the favour of the public, than Mr. Barry ; and none ever deserved it better. To an ambition to excel, and a disposition to please, he added all the natural and acquired endowments necessary to form the perfect player. His person was tall, and well made ; his features regular and expressive ; his eye keen and piercing ; his voice clear and strong, and capable of all that variety of tones which the diversity of character and passions requires. His heart was susceptible of the softest impressions, his mind of the most exalted sentiments : his air corresponded to both, or to whatever part he was pleased to assume ; to the dignity of the hero, the insinuation of the lover, and the graceful ease of the accomplished gentleman. His taste was delicate, and his judgment exact, in all that regards elocution or gesture ; in every character he was just, marking, and natural ; no man was ever more, or ever less, an actor.

Those who have only seen Mr. Barry in his latter years, may perhaps be inclined to dispute the justice of this character ; particularly in regard to his voice and person, which were in a great measure gone : but all, who ever saw him in the prime of life, will allow, that the figure and deportment of no actor, on the English stage, ever so fully justified those warm expressions of love and personal admiration, which Shakespeare has put into the mouth of Juliet :

Gallop apace, ye fiery-footed steeds,
To Phaëbus' mansion !—Such a charioteer
As Phaëton would whip you to the west,
And bring in cloudy night immediately.

Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night !

To hoodwink jealous eyes ; and Romeo,
Leap to these arms, untalk'd of, and unseen.

Give me my Romeo ! — and when he shall die,

Take him, and cut him out in little stars,
And we will make the face of heaven so fine,

That all the world shall be in love with light,

And pay no worship to the gaudy sun."

Nor did any player ever equal him in that delicacy of accent, which, accompanied by love-speaking eyes, convey to the audience all the magic of the soft passion. Who ever heard him repeat, to use the expression of an elegant writer, " with voice sweet as an angel's song," the following pathetic lines, in the character of Romeo, and was not melted into tenderness?

" The saints that heard our vows, and know our loves,
Seeing thy faith and thy unspotted truth,
Will sure take care, and let no wrongs annoy thee.

Upon my knees I'll ask them every day,
How my kind Juliet does ; and every night,
In the severe distresses of my fate,
As I perhaps shall wander through the desert,

And want a place to rest my weary head on,

I'll count the stars, and bless 'em as they shine,

And court them all for my dear Juliet's safety."

Or was the finest love-speech in the world, ever so finely delivered as by Barry?

———" What light through yonder window breaks ?

It is the east, and Juliet is the sun.

See how she hangs upon the cheek of night!

Fairer than snow upon a raven's back ;

Brighter than brilliants in an Ethiop's ears.

Were she in yonder sphere, she'd shine so bright,

That birds would sing, and think the day were breaking.

See how she leans her cheek upon her hand !

O that I were a glove upon that hand,

That I might touch that cheek !

"The unrivalled applause which Mr. Barry received in this character, and also in that of Castalio, even when Mr. Garrick was in his meridian, are incontestible proofs of the delicacy of his voice, as well as of his action, and likewise of the elegance of his person. A better illustration of this matter cannot be produced, than in the defects of two celebrated actors now on the stage. How absurd would it appear in Monimia, to say to Mr. Smith,

———" Come, my Castalio, And charm me with the music of thy tongue !"

Or in Juliet to talk of cutting Mr. Reddish out in stars, in order to adorn the heavens?

But Mr. Barry's merit was not confined to soft and tender characters. No player was ever more the hero; though it must be owned, that his merit shone out more conspicuously in those parts, where the tender passions are concerned, than in those of fury or revenge. Hence his wonderful merit in Othello; a character in which he was not only unrivalled, but where no man ever came within the line of comparison with him. He possessed indeed every requisite for this great and complicated character. The dignity of his person and manner were perfectly suited to our ideas of such a man; and a heart capable of the warmest love, alone can feel the keenest pangs of jealousy. His speech to the senate, in which he discovered all the elevation of a noble mind, labouring under accusation, but conscious of its innocence, has been universally admired, as the finest piece of theatrical oratory ever exhibited upon any stage; but it was in the struggles between love and jealousy, in which the great player was chiefly, though less obviously distinguished.
was

A few quotations will be necessary to illustrate this matter. What severity of feature, and what acrimony of expression, did he discover in pronouncing the following soliloquy, in which Othello's jealousy first discloses itself!

————— “Haply, for I’m black,
And have not those soft parts of conversation
That chamb’rers have; or, for I am declined
Into the vale of years;—yet that’s not much—
She’s gone—I am abus’d; and my relief
Must be to loath her.—Oh the curse of marriage!
That we can call these delicate creatures ours,
And not their appetites!—I had rather be a toad,
And live upon the vapour of a dungeon,
Than keep a corner in the thing I love
For others use.”

But no sooner does Desdemona enter, than the Moor changes his tone; and Barry was truly what Shakespeare could have wished him:

“If she be false, oh, then heaven mocks itself:
I’ll not believ’t.”

How different his voice in pronouncing these words from what it was in the former! and how relaxed his features!

His jealousy again returns with the presence of Iago.

“Ha! false to me!
I swear ’tis better to be much abused,

Than but to know a little.

What sense had I of her stolen hours of lust?

I found not Cassio's kisses on her lips.

He that is robbed, not wanting what is stol’n,

Let him not know’t, and he’s not robbed at all.

I had been happy, if the general camp
(Pioniers and all) had tasted her sweet body,
So I had nothing known. Oh now, for ever

Farewel the tranquil mind! Farewel content!

Farewel the plumed troops, and the big war,

That make ambition virtue!—O farewel!
Farewel the neighing steed, and the shrill trumpet,

The spirit-stirring drum, th’ ear-piercing fife,

The royal banner, and all quality,
Pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war!

Farewel! Othello's occupation’s gone.”

Those who have seen Mr. Barry unwind this maze of passion, only can have an adequate idea of his merit; for it “beggar’d all description.” As Shakespeare only could have written such a scene, Barry perhaps only could act it. The struggles of a generous mind, under the greatest of human calamities, the supposed dishonour and depravity of the object of a tender affection, was surely never painted with more force than by both the poet and the player.

Few men, either poets or players, have been found to excel equally in tragedy and in comedy. Mr. Barry cannot be said to have done so. He had nothing of the humourist about him: his feelings were too fine to admit laughter among the number of his pleasures, or drollery among his amusements. He performed, however, with much elegance, several parts in genteel comedy; and he gave in particular, an interest to the character of young Bevil in the Conscious Lovers, and to that of Lord Townley in the Provoked Husband, which was formerly unknown, and which no other player has ever been able to communicate; not excepting even the late Mr. Powell, who though equally tender, wanted the gracefulness of Barry.

The only actor now living, or within the memory of the author of these remarks, who can be compared with Mr. Barry, is Mr. Garrick. Without injustice to the reputation of either of them, it may be said, that Mr. Garrick was a more general, more energetic, and (if he may be allowed the expression) perhaps a more sublime player ; but that Mr. Barry, naturally more majestic in person, and nearer to the characters he assumed, was a more natural, more easy, and, by reason of superior sensibility, a more pathetic player.

THE following elegant epistle, addressed to the king of Prussia during the late war, was written by our sovereign's amiable consort, queen Charlotte. The energy of the thoughts, and sublimity of the sentiments have rendered it justly admired. We republish it, not only as a compliment to her majesty, but because the horrors of war, of which it is pathetically descriptive, at present rage in a considerable part of the British empire. All wars are replete with horrors, but civil wars peculiarly so. We have therefore given a paraphrase, in verse, of this beautiful prosaic composition ; and hope it will not be found inapplicable to the times, or inefficacious in allaying the fury of party, while the unhappy divisions continue to subsist between the mother country and her colonies.

A Letter from her most Sacred Majesty, Charlotte, Queen of Great-Britain, to his Prussian Majesty.

May it please your Majesty,

I AM at a loss, whether I should congratulate, or condole with you, on your late victory ; since the same success which hath covered you with laurels, has overspread the country of Mecklenburgh with desolation. I know, Sire, that it seems unbecoming my sex, in this age of vicious refinement, to feel for one's country, to lament the horrors of war, or wish for the return of peace. I know you may think it more properly my province to study the arts of pleasing, or to inspect subjects of a more domestic nature. But however unbecoming it may be in me, I cannot resist the desire of interceding for this unhappy people.

It was but a few years ago, that this territory wore the most pleasing appearance ; the country was cultivated, the peasant looked cheerful, and the towns abounded with riches and festivity. What an alteration, at present, from so charming a scene ! I am not expert at description, nor can my fancy add any horrors to the picture ; but surely even conquerors themselves would weep at the hideous prospects now before me !

The whole country (my dear country !) lies one frightful waste, presenting only objects to excite terror, pity, and despair. The business of the husbandman and the shepherd are quite discontinued. The husbandman and the shepherd become soldiers themselves, and help to ravage the soil they formerly cultivated. The towns are inhabited only by old men, women and children—perhaps here and there a warrior, by wounds or loss of limbs rendered unfit for service, left at his door ; his little children hang around, ask an history of every wound, and grow themselves soldiers before they find strength for the field. But this were nothing, did we not feel the alternate insolence of either army, as it happens to advance or retreat in pursuing the operations of the campaigns. It is impossible to express the confusion which even those who call themselves our friends create. Even those from whom we might expect redress, oppress with new calamities. From your justice, therefore, it is that we expect relief. To you, even women and children may complain, whose humanity stoops to the meanest petition, and whose power is capable of repressing the greatest injustice.

A Poetical Paraphrase on the above Epistle.

WHILE conquest seats you on the throne of fame,

And martial deeds immortalize your name,
On burnish'd arms, while glory brightly beams,

And fields victorious fill the soldier's dreams ;
Trembling I view, from whence the glory springs,

Of king-like-heroes, or of hero-kings ;
Shock'd I behold the source, whence dart those rays, [qu'rors blaze.

Which shine on victors, and round con-Hence I'm in doubt, while prompted to express

My weak ideas on your late success,
Whether congratulations to bestow,
Or melt to tears, and swell the stream of woe :

For all those laurels which your brows entwine, [shine,

Crown your success, and bid your conquests
Meant as immortal trophies to adorn,
Were from my country's bleeding bowels torn ;

While, in what's truly brave, and greatly bold,

You outstrip heroes dignify'd of old ;
My native Mecklenburgh, a prey to arms,
Is desolated of her fertile charms :

No more her plains their plenteous verdure yield,

No longer Ceres decks the happy field ;
Nothing is seen, or heard, where'er ye go,
But scenes of horror, and the sighs of woe.

I know, great Sire, a patriotic seem,
In my weak sex may unbecoming seem ;
That, in an age so viciously refin'd,
By folly led, and to caprice resign'd ;

In which absurdity, in gay parade,
Perverts the taste, and is the fashion made ;
Enough in such an age, I'm sure to find
To blame the weakness of a female mind,
Who cou'd one thought detach'd from dress bestow, [woe,

Mourn for her country, and bewail its Sigh with compassion, for the peasant feel,
And with the pow'r his streaming wounds to heal :

Lament the horrors of unsocial war,
Who wades thro' blood, while death attends his car ;

Stern to the feeling, fatal to the brave,
And friendly only to the yawning grave ;
Pray that the heav'n's her country wou'd release,

Or wish to court the soft return of peace.
Perhaps you deem the very name of arms,
The thoughts of rapine, and of wars alarms,
Of slaughter by contending armies made,
Or burnish'd swords for mortal ends display'd :

Of mourning widows, and of bleeding
swains,

Of burning towns, and desolated plains ;
Perhaps you deem such thoughts unfit for those, [compose ;

Who shou'd their minds to softer themes
Who ought to study only how to please,
And court the prospect of domestic ease ;
T' inspect with care the finer art to charm,
And point the light'ning when their eyes
they arm ;

Enhance the simple beauties nature gave,
And learn t' enslave in time to be a slave :
To practise smiles, by art to look serene ;
Catch the free air, and dignity of mein ;
To lose themselves in all that's idly vain,
The approbation of the world to gain :
If these, my liege, are arts for females fit,
Who should no other sentiments admit,
I must for once transgress, and unconfin'd,
Obey the dictates of a feeling mind ;
I must, by soft humanity inspir'd,
Express the thoughts from shocking scenes
acquir'd ;

With truth, great Sire, permit me to unfold
What I've beheld—ah !—what I yet behold ;

And while the natives of my country bleed,
For the unhappy let me intercede.

A few years since in Mecklenburgh's domain,

Fair plenty smil'd on ev'ry fertile plain :
The placid years serenely fled away,
The fields were fruitful, and the groves were gay :

In fancy's eye, the pleasing scene I view ;
That scene I'll sketch, and wish it once more true.

See stately cities raise their golden spires,
While towns are fill'd with all that life requires ;

The sylvan Gods their welcome blessings
yield, [field :

And the glad ploughshare furrows ev'ry
Unprofitable weeds are seldom found,
No thorns, no brambles overstock the ground,

But hills and smiling vallies plenty show,
Where the sheep bleat, and where the oxen
low :

Thus the earth's fertile bowels ample stores,
A full provision for her children pours ;
For nature's bosom is, tho' seeming rude,
An inexhaustless fund of gratitude ;
Tho' like the stars in heav'n her offspring be,

Her gifts are guided by her progeny,
And yields them food, tho' they o'erspread
the land, [land :

Clust'ring like bees, and countless as the
Thus cultivated Mecklenburgh is found,
A matchless land by smiling plenty crown'd ;
Plenty, which whispers in the gentle breeze, Waves in the corn, and blossoms in the trees ;

Strides o'er the country in a varied shape,
Springs in the shrub, or blushes in the grape ;

Curls in the waters, where the finny fry Glide thro' the stream, and twinkle on the eye ;

Smiles in the sun, distils in kindly rain,
Or spreads her mantle o'er the verdant
plain :

The rich in soft benevolence abound,
The poor in plenty have their labour crown'd.

The charms I image, I no more can find,
The pleasing prospect saddens on my mind ;
Imagination sickens at the sight,
And scenes of horror intercept the light ;
I must, unskill'd in the descriptive art,
Speak to the feelings, and address the heart,
For conquerors themselves, if they but saw
The hideous prospects which their strictures draw,

Might pay the tender tribute of a sigh,
While soft compassion trembled in the eye.

Now, my dear country, here the tear will flow,

Now, my dear country is a waste of woe,
Depopulation makes a frightful void,
The peasant flies, or staying is destroy'd ;
Turn to what part I will my aching eyes,
And all the horrors of the war arise ;
The devastations of the martial train,
While streaming gore empurples ev'ry
plain :

Here rapine stalks terrific thro' the land,
And wild revenge leads murder by the
hand ;

There spiry flames from burning cities rise,
And curling smoak from towns obscure the skies ;

Here

Here villages are chang'd to desert plains,
 While the fierce troops march o'er demo-lish'd fanes ;
 Who, void of zeal, make altars stream with gore,
 Where mild devotion sacrific'd before ;
 Unburied bodies cover nature's bed,
 And verdant green is ting'd by crimson red ;
 The victors now in horrid arts refin'd,
 Not to one mode of cruelty confin'd ;
 The privilege to cause a famine claim,
 And burning corn-fields wave terrific flame ;
 Now starv'd, each miserable wretch def-pairs, [cares ;
 And courts stern death to ease him of his Sinks down beneath the ling'ring load of grief,
 Sighs for the sword, and deems it a relief.
 When death can only ease the anguish'd breast,
 The shortest method must appear the best ;
 With native blood the silent rivers flow,
 And on their bosoms streaming purple show ;
 While into camps the fertile fields are made,
 And gloomy woods can scarce from danger
 shade ;
 Woods where sequester'd families abide,
 And die each moment while from death
 they hide ;
 Who watch thro' fear, or thro' reflection
 weep,
 And from exhausted spirits borrow sleep ;
 Whose sweetest rest is but a troubled doze,
 Who thank fatigue for ev'ry finall repose ;
 A famish'd babe perhaps lifts up its eyes,
 And for assistance to the mother cries ;
 The fasting mother ready to expire,
 Replies with tears and supplicates the fire :
 The fire unable to relieve their woe,
 Can only answer with a briny flow ;
 And while his silent sorrows grief expresses,
 Increase his own by sharing their distress ;
 Thus wing'd by fear no husbandman remains,
 By cultivation to restore the plains ;
 No gentle shepherd tends his fleecy care,
 Both join the war, and in the horrors share :
 And soldiers grown, a strange reverse of fate,
 Destroy those fields they us'd to cultivate ;
 Or unconcern'd behold their neighbours bleed, [feed.
 In the sad plains where flocks were wont to
 The towns, so great is war's remorseless rage,
 Are only now inhabited by age ;
 Decrepid age, secur'd on woeful lands,
 By want of health, from joining martial bands ;
 Th' enroll'd battalions that on hostile
 plains,
 Ingulph the youth wherever vigor reigns ;

With anguish'd age, the women sit and wail,
 As fears for husbands, or for sons prevail :
 Perhaps a warrior here and there is found,
 Debarr'd the field by many a rankling wound ;
 Or by the loss of limbs, not want of will,
 Deny'd the use of sanguinary skill ;
 Round him the curious prattling children
 swarm, [warm :
 Hang on his tongue, and as he speaks grow
 Demand the hist'ry of each aching wound,
 Devour each word and catch the martial
 sound ;
 And while the soldier eagerly recites,
 The rage of battle, and the blood of fights ;
 The steeds loud neighing, and the clank of arms, [alarms ;
 The rumbling drum, that beats to war's
 The clang'ring trumpet and the cannon's roar, [gore ;
 The dying groans and fields of streaming
 The little auditors erect their crests,
 While a new ardor fires their youthful breasts ;
 And ere their strength admits a sword to wield,
 Pant for the dangers of a bloody field ;
 Anticipate a hero's fame in mind,
 Nor see the horror that's with war combin'd.
 But more than this, to fill the dreadful round,
 Both sides we fear a double hazard's found ;
 Both with alternate insolence assail,
 As friend, or foe, by turns of war prevail ;
 Now those advance while these with fear retreat,
 By turns are victors, and by turns are beat,
 Yet in the doubtful conflict of each host,
 The unoffending peasants suffer most,
 And are, such horrors swell the dread campaign,
 Tho' neutral ruin'd, tho' defenceless slain ;
 Horrors that render all description faint,
 And foil expression to attempt to paint :
 Can pen delineate or can tongue relate,
 The great confusion which ev'n friends create ;
 Ev'n those from whom we might expect redress,
 Ev'n those with new calamities oppress ;
 To you, great fire, we therefore make appeal,
 Whose justice only can our sufferings heal ;
 From you alone, great fire, we hope relief,
 'Tis your compassion must assuage our
 grief,
 To you ev'n helpless females may complain,
 Nor shed their tears nor plead their cause
 in vain ;
 And trembling babes with tender looks implore,
 The royal hand to open mercy's door ;

To you whose kind humanity stoops down
To shield the peasant underneath the crown;
To guard the meanest who for justice preys,
And give the humble suppliant redress;
To you affliction speeds with tearful eye,
Whose power relieves, and bids injustice fly.

The Test of Virtue, a Moral Tale. By the late Dr. Goldsmith. [Not yet printed in his Works.]

IN a fair, rich flourishing country, whose cliffs are washed by the German ocean, lived Sabinus, a youth formed by nature to make a conquest wherever he thought proper; but the constancy of his disposition fixed him only with Olinda.

He was indeed superior to her in fortune, but that defect on her side was so amply supplied by her merit, that none was thought more worthy of his regards than she. He loved her, he was beloved by her; and, in a short time, by joining hands publicly, they avowed the union of their hearts. But alas! none, however fortunate, however great, are exempt from the shafts of envy and the malignant effects of ungoverned appetite. How unsafe, how detestable are they who have this fury for their guide! How certainly will it lead them from themselves, and plunge them in errors they would have shuddered at, even in apprehension! Ariana, a lady of many amiable qualities, very nearly allied to Sabinus, and highly esteemed by him, imagined herself slighted, and injuriously treated, since his marriage with Olinda. By incautiously suffering this jealousy to corrode in her breast, she began to give a loose to passion: she forgot those many virtues, for which she had been so long and so justly applauded. Causeless suspicion, and mistaken resentment, betrayed her into all the gloom of discontent: she sighed without ceasing; the happiness of others gave her intolerable pain: she thought of nothing but revenge. How unlike what she was, the cheerful, the prudent, the compassionate Ariana!

She continually laboured to disturb an union so firmly, so affectionately founded, and planned every scheme which she thought most likely to disturb it. Fortune seemed willing to promote her unjust intentions; the circumstances of Sabinus had been long embarrassed by a tedious law-suit, and the court determined the cause unexpectedly, in favour of his opponent; it sunk his fortune to the lowest pitch of penury from the highest affluence.

From the nearness of relationship, Sabinus expected from Ariana those assistances his present situation required, but she was insensible to all his entreaties, and the justice of every remonstrance, unless he first separated from Olinda, whom she regarded with detestation. Upon a compliance with her desires in this respect, she promised her fortune, her interest, and her all, should be at his command. Sabinus was shocked at the proposal; he loved his wife with inexpressible tenderness, and refused those offers with indignation which were to be purchased at so high a price: Ariana was no less displeased to find her offers rejected, and gave a loose to all that warmth which she had long endeavoured to suppress.

Reproach generally produces recrimination; the quarrel rose to such a height, that Sabinus was marked for destruction; and the very next day, upon the strength of an old family debt, he was sent to jail with none but Olinda to comfort him in his miseries. In this mansion of distress they lived together with resignation, and even with comfort. She provided the frugal meal, and he read for her while employed in the little offices of domestic concern. Their fellow-prisoners admired their contentment, and, whenever they had a desire of relaxing into mirth, enjoyed those little comforts that a prison affords. Sabinus and Olinda were sure to be of the party. Instead of reproaching each other for their mutual wretchedness, they both lightened it, by bearing each a share of the load imposed by providence. Whenever Sabinus shewed the least concern on his dear partner's account, she conjured him by the love he bore her, by those tender ties which now united them for ever, not to discompose himself: That, so long as his affection lasted, she defied all the ills of fortune, and every loss of fame or friendship; that nothing could make her miserable, but his seeming to want happiness; nothing pleased but his sympathizing with her pleasure.

A continuance in prison soon robbed them of the little they had left, and famine began to make its horrid appearance; yet still was neither found to murmur: they both looked upon their little boy, who, insensible of their or his own distress, was playing about the room, with inexpressible, yet silent anguish, when a messenger came to inform them that Ariana was dead, and that her will, in favour of a very distant relation, and who was now in another country, might be easily procured and burnt, in which case, all her large fortune would revert to him, as being the next heir at law.

A proposal of so base a nature filled our unhappy couple with horror; they ordered the messenger immediately out of the room, room, and, falling upon each others neck, indulged an agony of sorrow; for now even all hopes of relief were banished. The messenger who made the proposal, however, was only a spy sent by Ariana to found the dispositions of a man she loved at once and persecuted.

This lady, though warped by wrong passions, was naturally kind, judicious, and friendly. She found that all her attempts to shake the constancy or the integrity of Sabinus were ineffectual: she had, therefore, begun to reflect and to wonder, how she could, so long and so unprovoked, injure such uncommon fortitude and affection.

She had, from the next room, herself heard the reception given to the messenger, and could not avoid feeling all the force of superior virtue; she, therefore, re-assumed her former goodness of heart; she came into the room with tears in her eyes, and acknowledged the severity of her former treatment. She bestowed her first care in providing them all the necessary supplies, and acknowledged them as the most deserving heirs of her fortune. From this moment Sabinus enjoyed an uninterrupted happiness with Olinda, and both were happy in the friendship and assistance of Ariana, who, dying soon after, left them in possession of a large estate; and in her last moments confessed, that virtue was the only path to true glory; and that, however innocence may for a time be depressed, a steady perseverance will in time lead it to a certain victory.

Some Particulars of the Person and Family of his Excellency the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

JOHAN HOBART, Earl of Buckinghamshire, was the second son of the late John Hobart, first Earl of Buckinghamshire, by his first wife, Judith, daughter to Robert Brittiffe, of Bacons-Thorpe, in the county of Norfolk, Esq; and was born in the year 1724. His lordship had two brothers and five sisters, by the same mother, viz. Henry, his eldest brother, who died an infant; Robert, who died May 22, 1733, in the eighth year of his age; five girls, who died infants; and Dorothy, who was married Oct. 2, 1752, to Charles Hotham, Esq; Colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, eldest son of Beauchamp Hotham, Esq; Commissioner of the Customs: And two brothers, by his father's second lady, Elizabeth, sister to Robert Bristow, Esq; member for Winchelsea, and one of the Comptrollers of his Majesty's Household, viz. George and Henry.

George Hobart, the eldest surviving brother, is member for Beeralston, in Devonshire, was secretary to his excellency on his embassy to Russia, and on the 22d of May, 1757, married Albinia, daughter of Lord Vere Bertie, son of Robert first Duke of Ancaster, by whom he had issue,

1. George, born March 1758, died July 1759.
2. Robert, born May 4, 1759.
3. George-Vere, born Sept. 12, 1764.
4. Charles, born Feb. 1766.
5. Albinia, born April 19, 1759.
6. Ann Maria, born Sept. 17, 1761, died young.
7. Maria, } twins, born 1762.
8. Harriot, }
9. Another daughter, born 1770.

Henry Hobart, the other surviving brother, was married July 22, 1761, to Ann Margaret, daughter of John Bristow, of Quiddenham, in Norfolk, Esq; and sub-governor of the South-Sea Company, by whom he had two daughters: Ann Catharine, born 1762, and Maria Ann, born 1763.

His Excellency the present Earl of Buckinghamshire was in the year 1747, chosen member for the city of Norwich, and also for the borough of St. Ives, in the county of Cornwall, and took his seat for the former. At the general election in 1754, he was returned knight of the shire for Norfolk; and on the 22d of September, 1756, succeeded his father in his honours and estate. On the 15th of the preceding January, he had been appointed Comptroller of the King's Household, on the 27th of the same month was sworn of the Privy Council, and soon after appointed a Lord of the Bedchamber in which post he was continued by his present Majesty, on his accession to the throne.

On the 15th of July, 1761, he was married to Mary-Ann, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Drury, of Overstone, in the county of Northampton, Bart. by whom he has two daughters; Lady Henrietta, born April 7, 1762, and Lady Caroline Hans, born Feb. 24, 1767.

This lady dying in the year 1770, his Excellency was married to a daughter of the right hon. Wm. Connolly, of Castleton, in the county of Kildare, who was for many years speaker of the house of commons, and was ten several times one of the Lords Justices of Ireland.

On the 17th of July, 1762, his Excellency was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiary to the Empress of Russia, and continued on that embassy till the 1st of January, 1765.

Were we enter into a particular detail of the honours and actions of his Excellency's cy's family, it would exceed not only the limits assigned to this article, but even the extent of the whole Magazine; we must therefore content ourselves with a brief account of some of the most remarkable events.

His Excellency's ancestors, having frequently received the honour of knighthood, had the dignity of baronet conferred on May 22, 1611, the ninth year of King James the First. In the first year of King George the Second, the first patent of Baron Hobart, of Blickling, in Norfolk, was dated May 28, 1728, and the same Prince further ennobled the family, by creating the father of his Excellency, Earl of Buckinghamshire, Sept. 5, 1746.

The family of Hobart was in repute very early after the conquest; John Hobart possessed lands to a considerable amount, at De la Tye, in the county of Norfolk, in the thirteenth century. Thomas Hobart, the fifth in descent from John, settled at Leynham, in Norfolk, and his son James Hobart, who was bred to the law, was in the year 1479 Lent Reader of Lincoln's-Inn, Privy Counsellor and Attorney-General to Henry VII. and on the 18th of Feb. 1504, was made Knight of the Sword, on the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, afterwards Henry VIII.

Sir Henry Hobart, (grandson to the above Sir James) also studied the law, was member in parliament for Yarmouth in 1596, (39th of Queen Elizabeth) Attorney General, and Attorney General of the Court of Wards, in 1605, (the 4th of James I.) and on the first creation of Baronets, was the ninth in the list. On the 26th of November, 1613, he was constituted Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and left behind him REPORTS of law cases, still in great esteem; he was also Chancellor to both their Highnesses Henry and Charles, Prince of Wales.

His son Sir Miles Hobart, was member of parliament when the troubles first broke out between King Charles and his subjects; he strongly distinguished himself in opposing the arbitrary measures of that prince, and on the 2d of March, 1628 was one of those members, who, foreseeing the dissolution of the parliament, forcibly held the speaker in the chair till the house had passed three resolutions, viz.

“1. Whoever shall bring in innovation of religion, or by favour or countenance seek to extend or introduce popery or arminianism, or other opinion disagreeing from the truth, and orthodox church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom, and commonwealth.

“2. Whoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of tonnage and poundage, not granted by parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the government, and capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

“3. If any merchant or person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield, or pay the subsidies of tonnage or poundage, not being granted by parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the same.”

On this the parliament was immediately dissolved, and Sir Miles Hobart, for locking the door of the house, whilst the above protestations were published, was imprisoned for near three years, and then released only on giving large sureties for his good behaviour. This shortened his days, and the next parliament had such a just sense of his sufferings, that in the year 1646 they voted 500*l.* to his children “in recompence for his sufferings, and for opposing the illegalities of that time.”

Sir Henry Hobart, one of the successors of Sir Miles, was member for the shire of Norfolk, and one of the foremost engagers in the revolution; in the convention he voted the throne vacant, by the abdication of James II. He was made gentleman of the horse to king William III. and attended in that office at the battle of the Boyne, July 1, 1690. Nine years after, he was killed in a duel by Oliver Le Neve, Esq; leaving only one son, (father to his Excellency) and two daughters, viz. Henrietta, first married to the Earl of Suffolk, and afterwards to the fourth son of the Earl of Berkeley; and Catharine, married to Lieutenant General Churchill.

This son was born 1692, was member first for St. Ives, then for Beeralston, and afterwards for the county of Norfolk. On September 22, 1721, was made one of the Lords of Trade. June 17, 1725, a Knight of the Bath. In 1727, Treasurer of the King's Chamber. On May 28, 1728, Baron Hobart. On January 31, 1740, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Norfolk. On December 24, 1744, Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners. On the 3d of January, 1745, one of the Privy Council, and, on the 5th of September, 1746, was made Earl of Buckinghamshire.

His Lordship died in London, September 22, 1756, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

State of Europe, for January, 1777.

IN the course of last year some uncommon events took place. — The success of our arms in North America made many converts of the nominal patriots who had before espoused their cause; and numbers who had declared themselves the warm warm advocates of the colonists, pretended no longer to defend them, after they had avowedly thrown off their dependency upon Great Britain.—Nevertheless, the papers occasionally announced the arrival of Silas Deane and Dr. Franklin at Paris, in the capacity of agents or negociators for the Congress: but we have not been able to learn they have made the least progress in their negotiations; and, indeed, from the manner in which lord Stormont is there treated, and the reiterated declarations of the French court, with respect to their peaceable dispositions towards Great Britain, there is little reason to judge that they will (at least openly) assist the rebellious Americans. Their military and naval preparations are, indeed, alarming, and our ministry have prudently taken such measures as will enable us early in the spring to oppose any design the house of Bourbon may have.—The emperor of Germany's journey to Versailles naturally induces us to think that an alliance of a very important nature is upon the tapis between the courts of France and Vienna; and the military dispositions of the king of Prussia and the other princes of Germany, incline us to judge that they view with a jealous eye this visit. Indeed, a war in Germany appears very probable; but it is to be hoped we shall not once more endeavour to conquer America there. Our alliance with Portugal (that ungrateful country) may, perhaps, involve us in a naval war with Spain, and eventually with France.—This certainly is a very alarming crisis, when all the powers of Europe seem jealous of each other. The Czarina does not view these transactions without having her apprehensions, and her ministers at every court have received instructions to discover (let the expence be what it may) the real intentions of the different potentates. The remittances for this purpose from Russia are very extraordinary, and the most able politicians at Petersburg are consulted upon the occasion. Neither is Sweden or Denmark inattentive to these manoeuvres; and the states of Italy are greatly distressed to determine how they shall act. It is generally believed that the life of the pope is in imminent danger, he having given umbrage to some powers, who think a successor will be more convenient in forwarding their views. In a word, this seems to be the æra of the deepest political intrigue known within the memory of man. Jealousies, suspicions, and apprehensions, prevail at every court; and even here we have reason to think, that there are some political emissaries who aim at a coup de main to defeat the equipment of our fleets, and prevent our being in such a formidable state early this year, as nothing but the treachery of incendiaries can prevent. The late fire at Portsmouth is a striking proof of it; and the discoveries that have been since made, clearly evince that the conflagration was not accidental, but premeditated. Many have their doubts from what quarter these emissaries are employed. Some imagine they were excited by the rebellious Americans, whilst others suggest they have European pay-masters.

The meeting of parliament, after its late recess, promises much matter of debate and information. The opening of the budget will afford the members in opposition an opportunity to display their oratory and their railing at the treasury bench.—Many new taxes are talked of, but these reports seem rather the effect of fancy and imagination, than the result of real information. — Lord North does not communicate his secrets to news writers, and we shall, therefore, not anticipate his plans by ideal schemes and Grub-street projects. His knowledge and judgment as a financier are undeniable, and can only be equalled by his temper and fortitude.

No changes in administration are talked of, tho' a coalition between the Shelburne and Rockingham parties is hinted at. The papers tell us of great discoveries made by Mr. Charles Fox during his late excursion in France, and that he is to open his foreign budget the same day that lord North does his domestic one. Other politicians consider this matter as fabulous, and are inclined to think that he will on that day be found on the treasury bench, being peaceably disposed to let lord North state the situation of affairs. Patriotism (or rather opposition to ministerial measures) is at a very low ebb. The city is now quite freed from it. Sir Watkin Lewes seldom displays his great powers of oratory, and we have had but one instance lately of his astonishing rhetoric, which was upon the hustings in Covent Garden. How far he proposes carrying his pursuit, cannot, from his uncommon eccentricity in political disputation, be determined; but we think if he has any sensible friend, he will dissuade the knight from transferring the contest from St. Paul's to St. Stephen's.

We presume that a certain great stickler for liberty having now no civil employment deserving his notice, Mr. Hopkins having saved him much trouble in that division, is deeply busied in penning his elaborate speeches for the opening of the house, when he will, doubtless, again come forward, and let his constituents know, that there is yet no vacancy in parliament for the county of Middlesex.

Such is the present state of affairs at home and abroad, from whence our readers may collect the probable events of the current year, which may prove one of the most important eras in the annals of this country.

An Essay on Card-playing.

To the Editors of the Hibernian Magazine.

Gentlemen,

HAVING been present at many card parties during the Christmas festivities, I cannot forbear sending you my thoughts upon that amusement: don't imagine I am going to condemn cards, I assure you I am not, for I think them not only innocent, but often useful. Of the numbers of both sexes who meet together how few, how very few, are qualified for conversation! The weather, the fashion, the tale of the day, exhausts their whole fund; no one dares attempt to introduce a serious subject. The appellation of methodist would certainly ensue. I am speaking of the ladies' conversation you may be sure; tho' to speak the truth, when I have been in a mixed company, and many of the wiser sex, among us, I have observed with surprise that it very little conduced to the improvement of our discourse; whether the gentlemen think our levity incorrigible, or that they despise us too much to attempt our improvement; or, as I sometimes am charitably led to think, they are now and then glad of an excuse to talk nonsense themselves. From whichever of these causes it proceeds is of little consequence, the ladies, imbibing no new ideas, go on in the same routine. But this is a digression, I was going to say, when the usual topics are exhausted, the actions and characters of our acquaintance come in as a fresh supply.

Till now we have been innocent, though trifling: one step farther—and we approach to guilt; how usefully then is the card-table introduced? a vole, or four by honours engrosses our whole attention; characters, and families, remain undisturbed. Behold us then set down to amuse ourselves: amusement is professedly our end; but how strangely pursued!

The peevish fretfulness of some, the passion or fullness of others, too often frustrate that design; while all affect a total indifference, as to their loss or gain; the majority behave as if gain was their sole pursuit.

If they have a bad run of cards, they can hardly be civil to any part of the company; but should you unfortunately play a wrong card, or in a manner different from what they think right, the storm bursts forth; and if (which is not always the case) their language keeps within the bounds of decency, their looks, unawed by any restraint, express the strongest emotions.

I never could see what right any one has to call another to account for not playing well. We are content to excel in music, dancing, every polite accomplishment, and look with complacent pity on those poor mortals whose inferior abilities prevent their arriving at such excellence: why must indifferent play be the only fault without excuse?

As it is every one's interest to play the best he can, so there is no doubt but every one does so. How is it then that people allow themselves on these occasions to make use of such expressions; as they would think the highest breach of common good manners in any other case?

If the supposed bad play should proceed from ignorance or inattention in the player, warmth and pettishness will but make it worse: to inform him better, with good nature and politeness, is the only possible method of improving him.

For my own part, who really play for amusement, I am all astonishment, when I see so many pleasing countenances set down to cards, and, in an hour's time, so many of them wear so different an appearance; and wonder how reasonable creatures can conjure up all the troublesome passions they possess, at a time when they profess a design of amusing themselves.

The likeliest way to avoid a share in these foolish altercations, is to sit down with a married pair; the husband's good manners generally keeps his ill-humours confined to his wife, who having taken him for better and for worse, must be content to bear the whole force of it.

I am particularly acquainted in a family where that is the case; the lady is not fond of cards, but plays sometimes to oblige her husband: and he, good man, out of all patience, that his rib should not be a second Hoyle, by cross looks, and sharp speeches, totally banishes every idea she ever had; the rest of the company feel themselves unhappy, and yet this is called amusement!

Indeed I would advise every single lady, if possible, to attend her inamoretto pretty frequently at the card table; and however genteel and agreeable his behaviour should be to herself, if he is haughty or pettish with any one else in company, she may depend on the same fate when once the knot is tied.

I advise the gentlemen to pursue the same method, method, for I do not pretend to say that the ladies play with more good-humour than themselves. They may both, on these occasions, make sad discoveries; and she who can rage, fret, or pout at the trifling disappointments which happen at cards, gives small proof of that patience, fortitude, and resignation which, joined to sweetness of temper, make the chief ornaments of a female character, and are indispensably necessary in our passage thro' life.

My design, gentlemen, is not to censure, indiscriminately, all who play: I am so happy as to be intimately acquainted with several families, whose cheerfulness, good humour, and evenness of temper, make cards really a relaxation: but as I think, in our most trivial actions, we should aim at the pleasure or profit of each other, and even in trifles do as we would be done by, so I cannot help wishing every one to sit down with a determined resolution of being pleased himself, or at least to appear so, and contributing all in his power towards the pleasure of others.

I must confess I never could see the possibility of any person being happy when he found he had made another uneasy. I believe if we would govern our tempers in the lesser instances, we should find our account in it, and more easily behave with propriety in things of greater consequence, and then our very amusements would improve us. I have ever thought the inattention of most people to the foibles of their tempers, a very dangerous neglect, and often productive of the most fatal consequences. The regulation can never be begun too early. The disposition of children should be carefully watched, and whatever we find unamiable there, we should endeavour to correct, if we cannot totally eradicate it by our authority, till they are capable of reason, and when that period is arrived, by argument, convincing them, if possible, of the necessity of it, in a religious light, as well as in every other: but nothing will ever be so convincing as our example.

An Account of the Town of Lurgan.

LURGAN is situated on the confines of the county of Armagh, 14 miles N. E. of Armagh, 17 S. W. of Belfast, and 66 N. W. of Dublin. It consists of one wide street, about half an Irish mile long, besides several lanes; and contains about four or five hundred stone houses, the greatest number of which are covered with shingles or thatched, very few being slated. At the northern extremity of the street, stands the parish church, a handsome large building, with a good clock and spire, and a front of hewn stone. From the church to the place where the market-house stood (which was burned down a few months ago) is a walk in the middle of the street, with trees at each side: In this walk is held a very large weekly market on Friday, of linen cloth, particularly that kind called diapers. There are also in Lurgan, a Quakers and Presbyterian meeting-house, both handsome buildings. The trade of this town in the manufacture of linen cloth and shop-keeping is considerable. Near the town is a fine seat, and a most beautiful demesne, belonging to the right hon. William Brownlow, Esq; landlord of the town.

Memoirs of Henry II. of France, and his Mistress, Mademoiselle Diana de Poitiers. By Nathaniel Wrasvall, Jun. Esq.

HENRY II. of the race of Valois, was the handsomest monarch of his age, and the most accomplished cavalier in his dominions. He surpassed in all the martial exercises, where vigour and address are necessary, and bore away the prize in tournaments with distinguished grace. His heart was beneficent and humane; his temper courteous, open, and liberal. His intentions were ever honourable, and directed to the public good; but he neither possessed the capacity or discernment which Francis eminently discovered; and naturally tractable and yielding to others, was formed to be under the guidance of favourites. His father's dying exhortations had made no impression on his heart, produced no effect on his conduct. Scarce were his funeral rites performed, when he violated them in every point. Montmorenci, who had been, during several years, in disgrace, was recalled, and loaded with honours. The admiral D'Annebaut was dismissed, and the Cardinal of Tournon, only retained a shadow of authority. In their place, Francis, duke of Guise, so celebrated in the subsequent reigns, and the Marechal de St. André, were substituted.—That pernicious profusion, which had characterised the commencement of the late king's government, was carried to a more unjustifiable length, and the treasures amassed during his concluding years, were dissipated with a wanton extravagance.

Diana de Poitiers, who may be said to have divided the crown with her lover, and who carried her influence, personal and political, to a pitch which Madame D'Estampes never could attain, was the directing principle of Henry's councils, the object of his tenderest attachment and unlimited homage. This extraordinary woman, unparalleled in the annals of history, history, retained her beauty undiminished even in the autumn of life, and preserved her powers of enslaving, of fascinating, in defiance of time and natural decay.—She was already forty-eight, while Henry had scarcely attained his twenty-ninth year.—Her father, John de Poitiers, Seigneur de St. Vallier, had been condemned to die as an accomplice in the revolt of the Constable Charles of Bourbon, and though he escaped with life, yet he was degraded from the nobility, and all his fortunes confiscated. She was married, in the last year of Louis the Twelfth's reign, to Louis de Breze, Count de Maulevrier, and Grand Seneschal of Normandy, by whom she had two daughters, still alive.

It is not certain when her connections with the Dauphin first commenced; but it appears, that before he had completed his eighteenth year, her ascendancy over him was well established.—All the cotemporary authors agree in their assurances, that her charms were of the most captivating kind, and worthy a monarch's love. To these corporal endowments she united a cultivated and just understanding, wit, and an animated conversation. Warmly devoted to her friends and partizans, she was a dangerous and implacable enemy, of high and unsubmitting spirit: she transfused those sentiments into the royal bosom, and impelled him to actions of vigour and firmness.—Fond of power she was yet more so of flattery and submission. The nobles crowded to express their dutiful attention to this idol, and even the Constable, rude, haughty, and more accustomed to insult than flatter, bent beneath her, and condescended to ingratiate himself by the meanest adulation.

The ties which chiefly bound Henry to her, were, probably, first those of pleasure and voluptuous enjoyment, and afterwards habit, taste, and prescription.—In vain did the Duchesse D'Estampes exert every art of female rivalry and hatred to separate and disunite them; in vain did she publish that Diana was married in the same year which gave herself birth. These efforts only increased the passion they were designed to extinguish.—The king carried it to an incredible and romantic length; he gave her every public, as well as private, proof of her empire over him. The furniture of his palaces, his armour, the public edifices, were all distinguished with her device and emblems—a moon, bow, and arrows. Every favour or preferment was obtained through her interest, and Brissac, the most aimable and gallant nobleman of the court, said to be peculiarly acceptable to her, was created grand master of the artillery, at her particular request.—The Count de Bossu, who had been intimately connected with the late king's mistress, and was accused of treasonable practices with the emperor, could only shelter himself from punishment, by a resignation of his palace at Marchez to the Cardinal of Lorraine.—The Duchesse D'Estampes, unsupported by the croud of flatterers who attended on her in Francis's reign, was necessitated to quit the court; but Diana, whether from motives of prudence or magnanimity, did not attempt to despoil her of the possessions she had acquired from the late king's generosity. Disgraced and forsaken, she retired to one of her country-houses, where she lived many years in total obscurity.

British Theatre.

Drury-Lane.

ON Tuesday January 1, was revived Congreve's Comedy, called The Way of the World; and on the succeeding night was revived, the Pantomime of Harlequin's Invasion.

Though we profess to greatly disapprove of the rage for the revival of old plays, at an expence which might much more usefully be employed in encouraging genius, and rewarding a liberal industry; yet we must allow, that The Way of the World has been brought on with care, and performed with almost the whole strength of the company; and that Harlequin is as funny and showy a piece of foolery as we have ever seen.

On Saturday January 4, Shakespeare's Tempest was revived at this theatre.

We are glad our new managers turn their attention to the plays of Shakespeare. The principal talents at Drury Lane appear to be those of Mr. de Louthburgh, and of Mr. Linley, whose intention seems to be to throw an enchantment suited to the childish taste of the present times over the entertainments of the Theatre. They began with absurdity and nonsense, by accident we suppose, and now they turn their thoughts to Shakespeare. As their operations for the present season are to consist of expedients and shifts, we congratulate them on having thought of Shakespeare. But we did not know his works wanted reviving from the thrilling touch of the sentimental Sheridan, the surprising talents of the musical Linley, or even the pencil of Louthburgh. However, Shakespeare's works may serve our managers as a school, and when they have revived a few of his plays, they may possibly acquire taste and knowledge enough for the most important part of their business. The music and dancing in the Tempest were rendered too consequential, sequential, they took up too much time, and made the whole tedious. The lady who appeared for the first time in Miranda, (a Mrs. Schuyler, a native of Ireland) does not promise to be any thing very capital in any of the walks of the drama.—Mr. Linley's scholar in Ariel, (a Miss Field) had more of the appearance of a fairy than Mrs. Farrell of Covent Garden, but not her powers, execution, and taste. Indeed she seems to have been injudiciously placed with Linley, whose talents are correct and severe, and not fit to raise into freedom and excellence a modest and diffident mind.—Bensley is not so good a Prospero as Hull at the other house; but Bannister is a better Caliban than Dunstall. Moody and Baddeley were excellent as they usually have been in their parts; the rest of the performers but indifferent.

Opera - House.

ON Tuesday the 21st instant, a new serious Opera, called Germonda, was performed at this theatre; the poetry by Signor Goldoni; the music entirely new by Signor Tomaso Trajetta. The fable is as follows. After Alaric, king of the Goths, had killed in battle Stilicon, king of the Vandals, he took possession of the kingdom, and led Rosmonda, the dead monarch's daughter, prisoner into Arrauna. About the same time Sedene, Alaric's first consort, being dead, and leaving an only son called Germondus, who was strongly inclined to arms, and seemed averse to love, resolved to marry Alvida, daughter of the king of Norway. She was conducted to Alaric, and while preparations were making for the nuptials the king of Norway died, and left his kingdom to his daughter. Three neighbouring princes laid claim to Norway; Alaric flew to save it, and left Alvida to the care of his son. She conceives a passion for Germondus, which is heightened by the rumour of Alaric's death; but she conceals it. Craterus discovers her passion, and being in love with Rosmonda, whom Germondus also loved, he endeavours to bring about an union between him and Alvida. Alaric returns, imprisons his son; Alvida poisons herself, exculpates Germondus, and dies.

The dialogue is animated, the airs well written, and the music excellent. Signora Davies made her first appearance this winter in Rosmonda, and performed her part with that taste and judgment for which she has been so justly admired. She was received with uncommon applause by one of the fullest and most brilliant houses we have ever seen.

Maſquerade Intelligence.

ON Monday evening the 20th instant, the Pantheon opened with a very magnificent ball, at which there were, as usual, numbers of fruit and flower girls, shepherds and shepherdesses, milk-maids, hay-makers, with several old men and women, some of whom supported their characters exceedingly well; sailors and their doxies; a Mother Shipton, a most excellent mask; a French hair dresser, very characteristic; an Irish chairman; some Oxonians; a courier de France, &c.

Some were lively, some grave, some witty, and some stupid. One mask, who was alternately clever and ridiculous, was told by another, that his brain was a mere lottery wheel of sense and nonsense "True (replied the former) and there are six blanks to a prize."

A mask with a glass of claret in his hand, sung as follows:

Let us dance, and let's sing,

Whilst life's in the spring,

Giving all to the great God of Love:

Let us revel and play,

Let's rejoice while we may,

Since old Time those delights will remove.

There were but few characters. The best mask was a puritanical preacher, who having in vain exhorted the company to forsake their wicked ways, and given the impertinence of several wits who attacked him a proper rebuff, at four in the morning transformed himself into a black-guard fiddler, and walked about, accompanied by his friend Tom Bowling, an admirable character, and well supported. These two masks addressed every body in the true St. Giles's flash lingo, of which they seemed to be perfect masters. They sung the following song, with a proper accompaniment of vulgar action and emphasis.

Ye flats, sharps, and queer ones, who make up this pother, [each other.

Who gape and stare just like stuck pigs at
As mirrors wherein's to be seen very clear,
Reflected at full length your folly appear,

Masquerading was ever, as still 'tis in fashion;

Some masque for mere pleasure, but many

Oft to lick in the rhino, a false face will

Twig the methodist's phiz, with a mask
sanctimonious, [erroneous;

Whose ribs prove, to judge from the phiz is

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed: A new Novel.

WHILE many publications are spreading the direful infection of indecency, lewdness, and vice, it is the duty of every friend of the nation, and indeed, of human nature, but particularly, the friends of the fair sex, to strive to counteract the venom, and prevent its malignant consequences.

The characters I shall bring to view, will be drawn from real life; and instead of teaching immorality, and recording guilt, I propose to exhibit,

To the Fair Sex of all Ages, Stations, and Rank,

Female Virtue in principle and refined improvements—wherein, more especially, humility, candour, benevolence, and gratitude, in their agreeable charms, with self-denial and moderation in prosperity, will be seen to spring from true greatness of mind, and religious motives.

LETTER I.

Lady Trenchard to Mrs. Butler.

Madam,

I HAVE been thinking of the young girl you recommended to me, agreeable to the description I gave you of, a companion and sort of attendant. As I am now more infirm, often confined to my parlour, or bedchamber, I find it very lonesome, and the more so since I last saw you; as my dear Billy is gone to Holland, and I do not expect to see him these three or four years, if then: Sir William intending he shall make the grand tour when he leaves Leyden. Jackey is to go also when he is fit for the university, which Dr. Brice faith he expects will be next year. Sir William is abroad a great deal, and when at home has more company than my health will permit me to see, so that I greatly need an agreeable female to read to me, sit by me, and take take the care of my books and works; and it ought to be one who has a lively turn, and who has modesty and sense to bear a degree of familiarity without taking undue advantages; and is too discreet to make friendships with the lower servants. If you judge the person you mentioned will answer my ends, and you know me and my connections fall well, then I desire you to treat with her parents, and let me know the result. As to terms; if she stays with me I will find her in clothes, and if she wants teaching in any branches of common learning, such as writing, arithmetic, and needle work, be at the expence of that; and allow her what is reasonable for expences until she is at the age of eighteen; and then she shall make her own terms if she stay with me. But nevertheless if she behaves ill, I will be at liberty to dismiss her at any time. Whatever else may be judged needful, I leave wholly to your prudence to engage for me, and such is my value for your judgment my kind friend, that I rest with confidence thereon, as you may, that

I am ever yours

FRANCES TRENCHARD.

LETTER II.

Mrs. Butler to Lady Trenchard.

Madam,

I Have written to Mrs. Pelham, and have just now her answer on the subject you condescendingly entrusted me with. I should have waited on you, did not my physician and nurse think it too hazardous to attempt taking the air this inclement weather.

Mr. and Mrs. Pelham having heard so great a character of you, madam, and so good a one of all your family, think it a kind favour of Providence that their daughter has the offer of your patronage and direction. All they fear is, that she is too young, being but 14 years old, to be of that service, and to behave with that discretion, you require. They are fully content, yea, thankful with the terms; and desire to add but one, namely, that you will allow her to attend divine service at our church, and they beg it of Lady Trenchard to keep a strict eye over her, and not allow her to form any connections but what she would approve, not to spare her admonitions when she deserves them, or ever to fear offending them by the most watchful inspection of her morals. They are not against her attending public worship sometimes in your way, from any other reason than that now she is so young they fear she may be inclined to rove about on Sundays, and get into a loose unsteady habit. They are persons of very good sense, and truly catholic in their sentiments. While under the eye of so pious a lady they have confidence she will be a constant attendant on family prayers, and therefore do not desire she should always attend on prayer days at church, as they suppose you will want her at home. If, madam, you chuse she should come, and will acquaint me what time, I will let them know, and they will send or bring her. I am,

With high esteem,

Your very respectful, &c.

W—n B—h. ISABELLA BUTLER.

LETTER III.

Nancy Pelham to her Mother.

Trenchard Manor.

I HOPE, madam, you will not be angry with me that I have not written before, though I have been here two months.—The reason was I thought my lady would ask for my letter if I wrote, and if she did I should not dare to refuse shewing it to her, and she is so nice I should be ashamed to let her see my writing; and beside I am not capable to express my thoughts so as to be fit for her to see—But she is so good to me in putting me in mind of all my duties that I can't easily neglect any. She asked me yesterday when I wrote to you; I owned the truth; she chid me, and charged me not to delay another post. O, madam, I wish you and my father could know all she says to me, and what a good lady she is, I love her next to my father and mother and sisters. She won't let me stay at home from church on Sunday if she is ill, though I think she wants me, unless in my turn, which is but once in six Sundays, and not then if any body else is going to be at home, so that I have said only one forenoon since I came, and then it rained so hard, she thought I could not so well go as the rest could. She was so good as to tell me she would never desire me to shew her your letters to me, nor mine to you; I might write what I had a mind to, she was not of a suspicious temper, and beside said, if I should be a little indifferent, I had a good mother that would inform me if I wrote any thing amiss. O, madam, she is so kind to me that I never need ask for any thing. She has ordered Mr. Billings, the steward, who writes as well as a master, to teach me twice a day; in the morning before she is up, and an hour before dark, and to teach me arithmetic. She says I shall learn better than if I go to a common school where are a great many scholars, as they will divert me from my learning. Mrs. Wilson, the housekeeper is a charming clever woman, and treats me as if she was my mother, and to learn me, by my lady's order, to make pastry, jellies, preserves, pickles, and all such things.

They keep a cook, who is always employed in preparing or dressing meats, and my lady says, she would have me see how she does things, that I may know how to do every thing, and then I can learn your maid when I go home, and I desire to learn all I can for your sake, mama, for you told me to learn every thing that I can, for I shall never have such an opportunity again. Here are six women of us beside the laundress and the cook, for these two live in the other house, and here are six men servants besides Mr. Billings, and there are three men, and a boy in the other house. So that here are eighteen folks to do the work, tho' I should not reckon myself neither, because I do not do much; my work is to keep my lady's drawers in order, to take care of her clothes, and her toilette things, and to set her books to rights, and to fetch and carry her things, and help to dress her when she sees company, and to read to her when she chuses, and she says, I shall have better employment soon if I behave well, such as will do me more good than all the fine things she has. She is very rich, and has a great many fine clothes and jewels, and all sorts of knock-knacks; one watch cost one hundred and eighty guineas, and a picture that hangs to it all set round with diamond sparks, cost as much more. I wish I knew what she is going to set me about that is so much better than all these, I wonder what it is! — But I am afraid I shall tire you, and try your patience more than my not writing; and my lady I am afraid is alone and will want something. But I must tell you that I go to Dr. Butler's every week; my lady bids me not omit it if I stay but an hour, because she says they are friends. My duty to papa, and love to my sisters Dolly and Peggy. I beg your blessing, and remain,

Your dutiful daughter,

ANN PELHAM.

LETTER IV.

Mrs. Butler to Mrs. Pelham.

I WRITE, my dear Mrs. Pelham, to ease your heart, anxious for your Nancy's welfare. You need not have any apprehensions about her at present. She behaves well. I have made several visits at Trenchard Manor, and have the pleasure to find Nancy gives satisfaction to her lady, and the family. The house-keeper tells me all like her. She sits in Lady Trenchard's room when she receives visits from her friends, and chiefly, Nancy tells me, when she has no company, and as the child is a good reader, my lady often employs her to read to her, and praises her reading much. "She reads, said she, in such a way as indicates judgment, and that she enters into the spirit of an author, which is no common qualification in young girls." My lady was pleased to say she was also very frugal of her time, she never need call on her on that account: for when she did not employ her, Nancy would have a book, or some needle work always at her hand ready to fill up every moment of time. I observed her behaviour while there, and it was very modest, silent, and pretty; she sits up in a corner window by her lady's chair, and never speaks but when asked a question. The ladies who were there all took notice how modest she behaved, how diligent, and how attentive to her lady, who hardly need speak to her before us, for Nancy has learnt the language of her eye. They asked Lady T. where she got that pretty girl, who answered, a kind providence she must think it, and under that must thank her friend, looking and bowing to me. Nancy is constant at church, sits with me, and behaves with becoming seriousness. She generally comes here once a week, and stays an hour or longer as she can be spared. When her lady is abroad, or has company in form, she brings her work and sits with me an afternoon now and then. I cannot find she has formed any acquaintance in town, except with Mr. Collet's daughter a near neighbour of our's, who took a great liking to her; as she is a discreet worthy young lady, I encouraged it. For I think she ought to have some young friends, or she will be apt to grow too pensive. I shall take the liberty to speak to her lady the first time I see her alone, on this article. I need not add that you may depend on my friendly assistance and advice to her on all occasions that occur to need them, and that I shall be impartial in my accounts to you of her, for methinks you are as satisfied of this, as that I am,

Your constant friend,

J. BUTLER.

P. S. My dear doctor is much pleased with Nancy, says, she has a pretty genius, and will make a fine woman if she continues under Lady T's tuition.

LETTER V.

From the Same to the Same.

DON'T, my worthy friend, be afraid of your daughter's getting into company;

pany; there is no danger of it. Lady T. is too fond of her being with her to allow of her going out much, and she is now perfecting herself at penmanship; an hour in the day is given her for this, and you can see how charmingly she improves. She is learning the apparatus of the desert, and all the parts of pastry as they come in their seasons, and she is a sort of memorandum to her lady, who now she grows more infirm, instead of writing down her intentions, gives them in charge to Nancy, and is frequently calling on her to remind her. She was pleased to say to me when I asked her the other day to let Nancy have a few young acquaintance, that it was quite right, the request was reasonable; but she did not know how to spare her until she was able to go abroad herself; but Miss Polly Collet should be welcome to come and see Nancy, who has a little chamber to herself, and then she could call for Nancy as she had occasion, and the latter might go now and then to see Polly when she herself rode out. Nancy has some pieces of embroidery in hand to do for her lady, who amuses herself with those kind of works: if you was to see what is laid in for this end, you would not think she had much time to run out—no less than to work a suit of curtains with gimp, on fine white dimity; to stitch and run with cotton a fine white Holland counterpane, and to work six bottoms for common, and the backs and bottoms of two elbow-chairs in cross and tent stitch—the slowest of all works, and if Nancy has not a world of patience, the sight of so much, all drawn already, will tire her. But she seems quite easy; any thing her lady desires, she appears willing to comply with—this I fancy is a scheme to keep her with her lady, for I am sure she don't want them: every room and chamber is stocked with good furniture, and she has no daughter to give them to.—Unless she means to lay up for sons wives, I cannot conceive what she does this for. Madam Masham laughs and says, I wonder at you, sister, to trouble your head for you know not who. But my lady replied in her usual sedate way, “they will do somebody good; by that time they are done I shall find an owner I doubt not.” I should not write these trifles were it not that I know by my own feelings that parents are glad to hear the smallest incidents that relate to absent children; I often wish some kind hand would be as minute in what relates to my little Bobby though but a mere baby. Nancy writes to you by this conveyance, and that will be better than any further intelligence from,

Yours sincerely,
J. BUTLER.

Many letters passed between Nancy and her parents, and between Mrs. Butler and her mama; in which it appeared what improvements she made in the various works assigned her, and how prudent her carriage, modest and ingenious in her conversation; serious and well disposed in her mind; how tender and respectful to her lady, obliging to her acquaintance, kind to the domestics, and how beloved by the family, which was witnessed by the testimony of her lady, when she spoke of her to her particular friends, as also from the observations of lady Trenchard's visitors, and the several families where Nancy was acquainted.—Mrs. Butler was too much interested not to feel the warmest pleasure, that her friend's daughter had obtained such a character, especially as she had introduced her into the family and town.

Letter of a Roman Catholic from Quebec, dated Oct. 24, 1775.

“SIR,

“I Presume that before this reaches you, you will have received from other hands an account of the dismal situation of our unhappy province. But I can assure you with the greatest certainty, that the news of the revival of the French laws in this province, together with the appointment of the members of the legislative council and the new judges for the said province, have spread such a general discontent throughout the province, and thrown it into so great a consternation, that the most violent storm of thunder and lightning could not have produced a greater effect upon a people.

“The ill effects of this new establishment have been felt almost as soon as it took place. For at that very instant the frontiers of the province were invaded by the king's enemies, and the governor endeavoured to excite the inhabitants of it to take arms in its defence. But they were far from complying with his exhortations. For many of the parishes joined the rebels; and throughout the rest of the country the inhabitants have, in general, refused to take arms for the government, and to defend, as they express it, a pack of rascally pensioners of the crown, and their damned French laws. For those, Sir, are the very words that they make use of. Add to this, that no persons have been employed to endeavour to raise them on this occasion but such as they hold in utter detestation.

“You will no doubt have heard that Mr. Walker of Montreal has been lately arrested, upon a suspicion of treason and rebellion, and is kept a prisoner on that account. I should have given you an exact account account of every material occurrence that has happened in this province since the month of May last, if it had not been for the martial law in it. But as under that arbitrary law our lives and fortunes are not in safety, I was afraid that my letters might have been opened, and that I might have been brought into trouble on that account, that is, for speaking and writing the truth."

A very extraordinary Character of a Female in very high Life.

Extract of a Letter from a Gentleman who was detained some Months last Summer at Calais, by an Illness in his Family.

"OF all the melancholy pictures which human nature has ever brought under my observation, this town has exhibited to me the most woeful; and a greater object of pity in some respects, and contempt in others, than can be well imagined. Nothing surely can shew us, poor mortals, how little and contemptible we are, from the most high, even down to myself, than the following sketch I am going to give you of high life, whether above stairs or below.

I have seen here, my friend, a woman, at whom I remember to have looked up with admiration, and would with love too, if I had dared; but who was then the constant companion of kings, princes, and the first rank of mortal men, as well as the envy of all frail women; yet this person, I have seen fallen, even lower than her first parent Eve. This woman, whose smile would once have gladdened (and have gladdened they say) the hearts of princes, deigns now, even to court and solicit the conversation and company of the very dregs of the people, to whom she relates all her sufferings, and opens all her designs. I have seen her, on one night give a supper which cost her an hundred pounds, to be laughed at by all the company present; and by which she offended an hundred persons, who had much better pretensions to partake of it, than those who did. I have seen her refuse half a crown, which would have rejoiced the heart of a poor wretch, and the next day, bestow costly presents on men who despised and derided her. I have seen her turned out of a public inn, for not allowing her servants more than one meal a day, and that meal provided by themselves, and the dressing of it surreptitiously obtained at the aubergin's fire. I have seen her lay down a thousand pounds for a house she can neither occupy in her life-time, nor dispose of at her death. I have seen her place herself in the open air in extreme cold weather on the quay, and in the midst of two hundred wretched half starved fish-women and children, to read her dispatches and news-papers, and afterwards pass through this crowd of wretchedness, and give them nothing but a sight of her person, and the parade of her attending coach! I heard a stranger ask one of her upper domestics where his lady was gone; whose reply was—"to hell: that is the fittest place for her!"—In short, Sir, in this single woman, I have seen all the effects of extreme folly, weakness, vanity, pride, ignorance, meanness, parts, incapacity, ostentation, profusion, and avarice, pursue and follow each other as closely as the sails of a windmill.

I write not this sad letter from resentment, but for a moral, and to induce those people who think that riches alone, is the only means of happiness to look towards themselves, and to know that the gifts of fortune, to sordid and base minds, are curses instead of blessings, and that the only privilege of an enlarged fortune, is, to inspire gladness into the hearts of others who are oppressed with misfortunes.

Constantia Philips was carried to the grave by four slaves, without a single follower. Queen Elizabeth was left in her last hours almost without a friend to close her eyes.

Cuzzoni, the celebrated singer, about whom all England were pulling caps, or drawing swords, and who had three thousand pounds a year, is now making buttons for her daily bread. How happy, therefore, would it be for mankind, if emperors, kings, queens, generals, nobles, &c. would but look forward towards the last sad scene of human life, and then they would say with the great and unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh, "Eloquent, just, and mighty death, whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded: what no one dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawn together all the far stretched greatness; all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it over with these two narrow words—hic jacet."

It was these reflections or such as these which passed in my mind when I saw this outward shew of envy pass through the gazing ranks of half naked fish-women; and which induced me to wish, had it been possible, to have convinced the most unfortunate of the whole groupe, that the woman she looked up at, was, in every respect, a more wretched being than herself."

The Life of Bede.

BEDA, or BEDE, surnamed the Venerable, an eminent English writer, was born in the bishopric of Durham, in the year 672 or 673. In 679, he was sent to the monastery of St. Peter, and committed to the care of abbot Benedict, under whom, and his successor Ceolfrid, he was educated for twelve years. At the age of nineteen, he was ordained deacon, and priest at thirty. He applied to his studies with so much diligence and success, that he soon became eminent for his learning; his fame spread even into foreign countries, so that pope Sergius wrote to abbot Ceolfrid in very pressing terms, to send Bede to Rome, in order to give his opinion upon some important points. But, notwithstanding this honourable invitation, Bede remained in his cell, and being contented with the pleasures of a monastic life, he had hereby time and opportunity to make himself master of almost every branch of literature. He spent several years in making collections for his Ecclesiastical History, which he published in 731, under the title of Ecclesiasticæ Historiæ Gentis Anglorum Libri Quinque. This performance, with others which he had written before, established his reputation so effectually, that he was consulted by the greatest prelates of that age. His works have been collected and printed in eight volumes in folio. A monk, who gives a particular account of his death, says that it happened on the 26th of May, 735. The writings of Venerable Bede were so well received, that we find great encomiums bestowed upon him. It must however be acknowledged, that some late writers of our own and foreign nations, have spoke of him as a man of superficial learning and indigested reading. He is also charged with being extremely credulous, and giving too easily into the belief of the fabulous miracles in his time. Mr. Du Pin says, that his style is clear and easy, but without any purity, elegance, or sublimity; that he wrote with a surprising facility, but without art or reflection; and that he was a greater master of learning than of judgment, or a true critical taste.

The famous Camden thus speaks of Bede: "In this monastery of St. Peter, Bede, the singular light of our island, who by his piety and learning justly obtained the surname of Venerable, spent his days, as himself tells us, in meditating on the scriptures, and, in the midst of a barbarous age, wrote many learned works." Bale says, that there is scarce any thing in all antiquity worthy to be read, which is not found in Bede, though he never travelled out of his own country; and that if he had flourished in the times of St. Augustin, Jerome, or Chrysostom, he would undoubtedly have equalled them, since even in the midst of a superstitious age, he wrote so many excellent treatises. Pitts tells us, that he was so well versed in the seven-ral branches of learning, that Europe scarce ever produced a greater scholar in all respects. To these might be added many other testimonies in his favour, particularly of the learned Selden, Sir Henry Spelman, the great antiquarian, and Dr. Stillingfleet.

The Life of Bishop Bedell.

Bedell (William) bishop of Kilmore in Ireland, and one of the most famous prelates in that kingdom during the last century, was born at Black-Notley in Essex, in the year 1570. After he had passed through the usual course of a grammar-school education, he was sent to Emanuel college in Cambridge, where he acquired a very eminent character both for learning and piety. He was chosen fellow of his college in 1593, and took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1599. Having entered into holy orders, he was removed from the university to the town of St. Edmundsbury, in Suffolk, where he preached with great diligence and success. In 1604, he was appointed chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton, ambassador to the republic of Venice. He continued eight years at Venice, during which time he contracted a friendship with the famous father Paul, who assisted him in learning the Italian tongue, of which Bedell became so great a master, that he spoke it as one born in Italy. And in return for the instructions which he had received from father Paul in Italian, he drew up a grammar of the English tongue for the use of that learned man, and for some others who desired to learn it, that they might be able to understand our books of divinity; and he also translated the English Common Prayer book into Italian.

Whilst he resided at Venice, he greatly improved himself in the Hebrew language, by the assistance of the famous rabbi Leo, who taught him the Jewish pronunciation, and other parts of rabbinical learning. Here also he became acquainted with the celebrated Antonio de Dominis, archbishop of Spalato, whom he assisted considerably in correcting and finishing his treatise De Republica Ecclesiastica. Father Paul was much concerned when Bedell left Venice; and at his departure he made him a present of his picture, together with a Hebrew bible without points, and a small psalter. He gave him also the manuscript of his history of the council of Trent, with the histories of the interdict and inquisition, and a large collection of letters which he had received from Rome, during the dispute between the Jesuits and Dominicans, concerning the efficacy of Grace. Mr. Bedell, on his return to England, retired to his charge at St. Edmundsbury, and there went on with his ministerial labours. In 1615, he was presented to the living of Horingheath, in the diocese of Norwich; and in 1627, he was unanimously elected provost of Trinity College, in Dublin. When he had been about two years in this employment, a patent was sent him to be bishop of Kilmore, and Ardagh, two contiguous Sees in the province of Ulster. He was consecrated on the 13th of September, 1629, in St. Peter's Church in Drogheda, by archbishop Usher and three other prelates. He was now in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and he discharged the duties of his new station in a very upright and conscientious manner. He found his two dioceses in great disorder, and applied himself with vigour to reform the abuses therein. He began with that of plurality of benefices. To this end he convened his clergy, and, in a sermon which he preached on the occasion, laid before them the institution, nature, and duties of the ministerial employment; and after the sermon he discoursed to them upon the same subject in Latin, and exhorted them to reform that abuse. To prevail on them the better, he told them he resolved to shew them an example in parting with one of his bishoprics; and accordingly he resigned Agha, though it is said the revenues of both Sees did not exceed a competency.

Bishop Bedell laboured much to convert the Irish papists, and particularly their clergy, and in this he had great success. He procured a translation of the common prayer-book into Irish, and caused it to be read in his cathedral every Sunday. The new testament had also been translated by William Daniel, archbishop of Tuam, and, at the bishop's desire, the old testament was first translated into the same language by one King; but as he was ignorant of the original tongue, and did it from the English, Bedell revised and compared it with the Hebrew, and the best translations. He took care likewise to have some of Chrysostom's and Leo's homilies, in commendation of the scriptures, to be rendered both into English and Irish, that the common people might see, that in the opinion of the ancient fathers, that they had not only a right to read the scriptures as well as the clergy, but that it was their duty to do so. When he found the work was finished, he resolved to be at the expence of printing it; but his design was interrupted by a cruel and iniquitous prosecution carried on against the translator, who not only lost his living, but was also unjustly attacked in his character. The bishop supported Mr. King as much as he could; and the translation being finished, he would have printed it in his own house, if the troubles of Ireland had not prevented him. It happened, however, that the translation escaped the hands of the rebels, and was afterwards printed at the expence of Mr. Robert Boye.

When the rebellion broke out in Ireland, in October, 1641, bishop Bedell did not at first feel the violence of its effects; for the very rebels had conceived a great veneration for him; and they declared he should be the last Englishman they would drive out of Ireland. His was the only house in the county of Cavan that was unviolated, and it was filled with the people who fled to him for shelter. About the middle of December, however, the rebels, pursuant to orders received from their council of state of Kilkenny, required him to dismiss the people who were with him, which he refused to do, declaring he would share the same fate with the rest. Upon this they seized him, and his two sons, and Mr. Clogy, who had married his daughter-in-law, and carried them prisoners to the castle of Lochwater, surrounded by a deep water, where they put them all, except the bishop, in bonds; after some time, however, this part of their severity was abated. When they had been confined for about three weeks, the bishop and his two sons, and Mr. Clogy, were exchanged for two of the O'Roukes; but though it was agreed that they should be safely conducted to Dublin, yet the rebels would never suffer them to be carried out of the county, but sent them to the house of Dennis Sheridan, an Irish minister, and convert to the protestant religion. Our prelate died soon after he came here, on the 7th of February, 1642. The Irish did him unusual honours at his burial; for the chief of the rebels gathered their forces together, and with them accompanied his body from Mr. Sheridan's house to the church-yard of Kilmore, where he was interred.

Bishop Bedell was in his person tall and graceful, and had something in his looks and carriage which created a veneration for him. He had an unaffected gravity in his deportment, and in his apparel there was a decent simplicity. A few years before his death, he had some severe fits of the stone, occasioned by his sedentary life. The remedy he used for it was to dig in the garden till he heated himself, and that mitigated the pain. His judgment and memory, which were extraordinary, remained with him to the last. His behaviour in his public character did honour to his high office in the church, and his private life was perfectly consistent with the doctrine he taught.

The Life of Mrs. Aphra Behn.

Behn (Aphra) a celebrated English poetess, was descended from a good family in the city of Canterbury. She was born in the reign of Charles I. but in what year is uncertain. Her father's name was Johnson; who being related to the lord Willoughby, and by his interest being appointed lieutenant-general of Surinam, and six and thirty islands, embarked with his family on board a ship for the West-Indies; at which time Aphra was very young. Mr. Johnson died in his passage, but his family arrived at Surinam, where our poetess became acquainted with the American prince Oroonoko, whose adventures she has so pathetically described in her celebrated novel of that name. She tells us, "she had often seen and conversed with that great man, and been a witness to many of his mighty actions, and that at one time he and Climene, (or Imoinda his wife) were scarce an hour in a day from her lodgings; and that she obliged them in all things she was capable, entertaining them with the lives of the Romans, and great men, which charmed him to her company; and her, with teaching her all the pretty works she was mistress of, and telling her stories of nuns, and endeavouring to bring her to the knowledge of the true God." She tells us likewise, that Oroonoko used to call her his great mistress, and that her word would go a great way with him. This intimacy between him and our poetess, occasioned some reflections on her conduct, from which a lady of her acquaintance, who has written memoirs of her life, justifies her in the following manner: "Here (says she) I can add nothing to what she has given the world already but a vindication of her from some unjust aspersions appearances which I find are insinuated about this town, in relation to that prince. I knew her intimately well, and I believe she would not have concealed any love affairs from me, being one of her own sex, whose friendship and secrecy she had experienced, which makes me assure the world, there was no affair betwixt that prince and Astræa, but what the whole plantation were witnesses of; a generous value for his uncommon virtues, which every one that but hears them, finds in himself, and his presence gave her no more. Besides, his heart was too violently set on the everlasting charms of his Imoinda, to be shook with those more faint (in his eye) of a white beauty; and Astræa's relations there present, had too watchful an eye over her, to permit the frailty of her youth, if that had been powerful enough."

After her return to England, she was married to Mr. Behn, an eminent merchant of London, and of Dutch extraction. She so highly pleased king Charles II. by the entertaining and accurate account she gave him of the colony of Surinam, that he fixed on her as a proper person to transact some affairs of importance abroad during the Dutch war. For this purpose she went to Antwerp, where, by her intrigues and gallantries, she so far crept into the secrets of state, as to answer the ends proposed by sending her over. Nay, in the latter end of the year 1666, by means of the influence she had over one Vander Albert, a Dutchman of eminence, whose heart was warmly attached to her, she wormed out of him the designed formed by De Ruyter, in conjunction with the family of the De Wits, of sailing up the Thames, and burning the English ships, which they afterwards put in execution at Rochester. This she immediately communicated to the English court; but her intelligence (though well grounded, as appears by the event) being disregarded and ridiculed, she renounced all further thoughts of political affairs, and, during her stay at Antwerp, gave herself up entirely to the gaiety and gallantries of the place. After some time she embarked at Dunkirk for England, and in her passage was near being lost, for the ship was driven on the coast by a storm, but happening to founder within sight of land, the passengers were, by the timely assistance of boats from the shore, all fortunately preserved. Mrs. Behn arrived safely in London, where she devoted the rest of her life to pleasure and the muses. Her works are extremely numerous, and all of them have a lively and amorous turn: they consist of plays, novels, poems, letters, &c. Her plays abound with obscenity; * and her novels are little better. She died after a long indisposition, on the 16th of April, 1689, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster-abbey.

The ingenious Charles Cotton, Esq; author of Virgil Traveltie, compliments Mrs. Behn in the following lines:

"Some hands write some things well, are elsewhere lame,

"But on all themes your power is the same.

"Of buskin and of sock you know the pace,

"And tread in both with equal skill and grace;
N O T E.

* "The stage how loosely does Astræa tread,
"Who fairly puts all characters to bed!"

Pope.

"But when you write of love, Astræa, then

"Love dips his arrows where you wet your pen.

"Such charming lines did never paper grace,

"So soft as your sex, and smooth as beauty's face."

The Life of Admiral John Benbow.

Benbow (John) vice-admiral of the Blue, was descended from a reputable family in Shropshire, and was born about the year 1650. But his father, Colonel John Benbow, and most of his relations, were brought very low by their attachment to the royal cause: and the colonel dying when his son John was very young, left him with very little provision for his support. He was, however, bred a seaman, a profession to which he had naturally a strong propensity. Before he was thirty years of age, he was owner and commander of a ship, called the Benbow Frigate, and made then a considerable figure as any man concerned in the Mediterranean trade. He was always considered by the merchants as a bold, brave, and active commander; as one who always took care of his seamen, and was therefore cheerfully obeyed by them, though he always maintained a strict discipline. This behaviour raised his reputation greatly; so that no man in the same capacity was more known or respected by the merchants upon the Exchange than captain Benbow.

It is probable he would have continued in this situation, had it not been for the following very singular transaction. In 1686, he was attacked in his passage to Cadiz by a Saltee Rover, against whom he defended himself, notwithstanding the inferiority of his number, with the utmost bravery, till at last the Moors boarded him; but they were quickly beat out of the ship again, with the loss of thirteen men, whose heads captain Benbow ordered to be cut off, and thrown into a tub of pork-pickle. When he arrived at Cadiz, he went ashore, and ordered a negro servant to follow him, with the Moor's head in a sack. As soon as he had landed, the officers of the revenue enquired of his servant, what he had in his sack? The captain answered, salt provisions for his own use. "That may be," replied the officers; "but we must insist upon seeing them." Captain Benbow alleged, that he was no stranger there: that he was not accustomed to run goods; and pretended to take it ill that he was suspected. The officers told him, that the magistrates were sitting not far off, and that if they were satisfied with his word, his servant might carry the provisions where he pleased; but that otherwise, it was not in their power to grant any such dispensation. The captain consented to the proposal; and away they marched to the customhouse, Mr. Benbow in the front, his man in the center, and the officers in the rear. When captain Benbow came before the magistrates, they treated him with great civility, and told him they were sorry to make a point of such a trifle, but that, since he had refused to shew the contents of the sack to their officers, the nature of their employment obliged them to demand a sight of it; and that, as they doubted not their being salt provisions, the shewing of them could be of no great consequence either way or the other. "I told you," says Benbow, sternly, "they were salt provisions."

provisions for my own use. Cæsar, throw them down upon the table; and, gentlemen, if you like them, they are at your service." The Spaniards were exceedingly struck at the sight of the Moor's heads, and equally astonished at the captain's adventure, who, with so small a force, had been able to defeat such a number of barbarians. They sent an account of the whole affair to the court of Madrid, and Charles II. then king of Spain, was so much pleased with it, that he requested to see the English captain. Accordingly Benbow made a journey to court, where he was received with great testimonies of respect, and not only dismissed with a handsome present, but his Catholic Majesty was also pleased to write a letter in his behalf to king James II. who, upon the captain's return, gave him a ship, which was his introduction to the Royal Navy.

After the revolution, captain Benbow was at first employed in protecting our trade in the channel, and bombarding the French ports, in which he shewed the most intrepid bravery, by going in person in his boat to encourage and protect the engineers; and his vigour and activity so effectually recommended him to king William, that he was early promoted to a flag. After the peace, he was sent with a squadron to the West-Indies, when he obliged the governor of Carthage to restore two English ships that had been seized by the Spaniards; and afterwards, sailed to Porto Bello, forced the governor, by his threats, to send him several vessels which had been taken under pretence that the settlement of the Scots at Darien was a breach of the peace.

Soon after his return to England, Mr. Benbow was appointed Vice-Admiral of the Blue. He was also about the same time employed in cruising off Dunkirk, it being then apprehended that the French had formed a design of invading England. There was, indeed, no war yet declared between the two crowns; but this was held to be no security against France; and it was no sooner known that a strong squadron was sitting out at Dunkirk, than it was firmly believed to be intended to cover a descent. Admiral Benbow, however, made such observations, as convinced him that France had not at this time any such schemes in agitation: and having satisfied the ministry of this, it was resolved to prosecute without delay some projects which had formerly been concerted, in order to disappoint the French in their views upon the Spanish succession; and to facilitate this, it was thought necessary to send immediately a strong squadron to the West-Indies. The squadron was to consist of two third rates, and eight fourths; and it was thought requisite, that it should be under the command of an officer, whose conduct and courage might be relied on. Mr. Benbow therefore was proposed by the ministry, as soon as the expedition was determined; but king William said, that Benbow was in a manner just returned from the West-Indies, and that, therefore, it was but reasonable that some other officer should now take his turn. One or two were named and consulted; but either their health or their affairs were in such disorder, that they most earnestly desired to be excused. Upon which the king said facetiously to some of his ministers, alluding to the dress and appearance of these gentlemen; "Well then, I find we must spare our Beaus, and send honest Benbow." His majesty accordingly sent for him upon this occasion, and asked him, whether he was willing to go to the West-Indies, assuring him, that if he was not, he would not take it amiss if he desired to be excused. Mr. Benbow answered bluntly, that he did not understand such compliments; that he thought he had no right to chuse his station, and that, if his majesty thought fit to send him to the East or West Indies, or any where else, he would cheerfully execute his orders, as became him. Thus was the matter settled, in a very few words, and the command of the West India Squadron conferred on Vice-Admiral Benbow.

To conceal the destination of this squadron, but especially to prevent the French from having any just notions of its force, sir George Rooke, then admiral of the fleet, had orders to convoy it as far as Scilly, and to send a strong squadron with it thence, to see it well into the sea: all which he performed; so that admiral Benbow departed in the month of September, 1701. The world in general believed, that he was gone with sir John Munden, who commanded the squadron that accompanied him into the Mediterranean; and to render this more credible, our minister at Madrid was ordered to demand the free use of the Spanish ports; which was accordingly allowed. However, the French knew too well the importance of the Spanish West Indies not to think of providing for their security, as soon as ever they resolved to accept the will of the late king of Spain. They had therefore sent, in April, 1701, to the Spanish West Indies, five ships of the line, and several large vessels laden with arms and ammunition, under the command of the Marquis de Coetlogon; and on the 20th of October, the same year, the Count de Chateau Renaud sailed thither with fourteen ships of the line, and sixteen frigates, to meet the galleons, which were supposed to be already departed from the Havannah, under the escort of the Marquis de Coetlogon; and besides these, Monsieur Du Casse sailed thither likewise with another squadron.

When Benbow first arrived at Jamaica, which was at the close of the year 1701, he made such prudent dispositions for securing our own trade, and annoying that of the enemy, that the French saw with great amazement all their schemes defeated, which they had been enabled to form, by their having much earlier intelligence than we of the intended war; and their own writers acknowledge, that even after the arrival of the Marquis de Coetlogon's squadron, they were constrained to act only on the defensive; and found all their grand projects they had formed for attacking Jamaica and the Leeward Islands, entirely frustrated. And it was observed at that time by the Dutch writers, that notwithstanding all the blustering of the French, Vice-Admiral Benbow, with a small English squadron, remained master of those seas; nor did he fail to make use of this advantage, by taking many prizes, and countenancing and protecting the trade carried on by the English on the Spanish coasts. But in a few weeks time the scene began to change; for admiral Benbow then received the news of the Count de Chateau Renaud's arrival at Martinico, with a squadron much stronger than his own; and soon after had information, that this squadron had been joined by the Marquis de Coetlogon from the Havannah, which exceedingly alarmed the inhabitants of Barbadoes and Jamaica, because we had no force capable of resisting this French fleet, in case their commanders were determined to act offensively.

Affairs continued in this uncertain situation 'till the end of April, 1702, when Benbow resolved, though there was great want of men on board his squadron, to put to sea, in order to cruise between Jamaica and Hispaniola. and he accordingly sailed on the 8th of May; but he had not proceeded far before he met with Rear-Admiral Whetstone, with whom he returned to communicate to the governor of Jamaica some orders received from England; having first sent the Ruby, Falmouth, and Experiment, to cruise off Petit Guavas. Some time after, the master of a Spanish sloop from Cuba acquainted him, that Chateau-Renaud was at the Havannah, with twenty-six ships of war, waiting for the Flota from La Vera Cruz; and this was confirmed by the ships he had sent out, which in the course of their cruise had taken four prizes. Not long after this, Admiral Benbow received information, that Mons. Du Casse was in the neighbourhood of Hispaniola, with a squadron of French ships, with an intent to settle the Assiento in favour of the French, and to destroy the English and Dutch trade for negroes. Upon this he detached Rear-Admiral Whetstone in pursuit of him; and on the 11th of July, 1702, Benbow sailed himself from Jamaica, in order to have joined the Rear-Admiral: but having intelligence that Du Casse was expected at Leogane, on the north side of Hispaniola, he plied for that port, before which he arrived on the 27th. Not far from the town, he perceived several ships at anchor, and one under sail, the boat belonging to which was sent out to discover his strength, but coming too near was taken; from the crew of which he learnt, that there were six merchant-ships in the port, and that the ship they belonged to was a man of war of fifty guns, which Benbow pressed so hard, that the captain, seeing no probability of escaping, ran the ship ashore, and blew her up. On the 28th, the admiral came before the town, where he found a ship of about eighteen guns hauled under their foundations, which however did not prevent his burning her. The rest of the ships had sailed before day, in order to get into a better harbour; but some of our ships, between them and the port they wanted to gain, took three of them, and sunk a fourth.

Admiral Benbow, after alarming Petit Guavas, which he found it impossible to attack, sailed for Donna Maria bay, where he continued till the 10th day of August; when having received advice that Du Casse had sailed for Carthagena, and from thence was to proceed to Porto Bello, he resolved to follow him, and accordingly sailed that day for the Spanish coast of Santa Martha. On the 19th of August, in the evening, he discovered, near that place, ten sail of tall ships to the westward; and standing towards them, he found the best part of them to be French men of war: upon this he made the usual signal for a line of battle, going away with an easy sail, that his sternmost ships might come up and join them, the French steering along shore under their top-sails. Their squadron consisted of four ships, from sixteen to twenty guns, with one great Dutch-built ship of about thirty or forty; and there was another full of soldiers, the rest small ones, and a sloop. Benbow came up with them about four o'clock in the morning, on the 20th, when the engagement began. He had disposed his line of battle in the following order: the Defiance, Pendennis, Windsor, Breda, Greenwich, Ruby, and Falmouth. But two of his ships, the Defiance and the Windsor, did not stand above two or three broadsides before they got out of gunshot. So that the two sternmost ships of the enemy lay upon the admiral, and galled him very much; nor did the ships in the rear come up to his assistance with that diligence which they ought to have done. The engagement lasted, however, till the evening; and though the firing then ceased, Benbow kept them company all night. The admiral saw that the French would avoid fighting if they could; and being still in hopes that he might prevail on his captains to do their duty, he ordered a new line of battle. The next morning, at break of day, he was near the French ships, but none of his squadron, except the Ruby, were with him. At two in the afternoon, the French drew into a line; but at the same time they made all the sail they could to avoid fighting. However, the Vice-admiral in the Breda, and the Ruby, commanded by captain Walton, plied the enemy all night, with the chase-guns. Thus did Benbow continue pursuing, and maintaining the fight with the enemy, for four days more; but was never properly seconded by several of the ships of his squadron.

On the 23d, about noon, the admiral took from the French a small English ship, called the Anne Galley, which they had taken off Lisbon: and the Ruby being disabled, he ordered her for Port-Royal. About eight at night, the whole squadron was up with the admiral, and the enemy not two miles off. Benbow now thought there was a prospect of doing something, and therefore made the best of his way after the enemy: but the whole squadron, except the Falmouth, fell astern again. At two in the morning, the 24th, the admiral came up with the enemy's sternmost ship, and prised into her a broadside, which was returned by the French ship very briskly; and about three the gallant Benbow's right leg was broken in pieces by a chain-shot. He was carried down; but soon after ordered his cradle on the quarter-deck, and continued the engagement till day-light. One of the lieutenants, soon after the accident, expressed his sorrow for Benbow's loss of his leg: I am sorry for it too; (said the brave admiral) but I had rather have lost them both than have seen this dishonour brought upon the English nation. But, do you hear? If another shot should take me off, behave like brave men, and fight it out."

About this time one of the enemy's ships, of seventy guns, was discerned to be very much disabled;

disabled; her main-yard being down, and shot to pieces, her fore-top sail yard shot away, her mizen-mast shot by the board, all her rigging gone, and her sides bored to pieces with our double-headed shot. The admiral soon after discovered the enemy's squadron standing towards him with a strong gale of wind. The Windfor, Pendennis, and Greenwich, a-head of the enemy, came to the leeward of the disabled ship, fired their broadsides, passed her, and stood to the southward: then came the Defiance, and fired part of her larboard side, when the disabled ship returning about twenty guns, the Defiance put her helm a-weather, and ran away right before the wind, lowered both her top-sails, and ran to the leeward of the Falmouth, without any regard to the signal of battle. The enemy seeing the other two ships stand to the southward, they expected they would have tacked and stood towards them, and therefore they brought their heads to the northward. But when they saw those ships did not tack, they immediately bore down upon Admiral Benbow, and running between their disabled ship and him, poured in all their shot, by which they brought down his main-top-sail-yard, and shattered his rigging very much; none of the other ships being near him, or taking the least notice of his signals; though Captain Fogg ordered two guns to be fired at the ship's head, in order to put them in mind of their duty. The French, seeing things in this confusion, brought to, and lay by their own disabled ship, and then re-manned and took her into tow. The Breda's rigging being much damaged, she was forced to lie by until ten o'clock, and being then re-fitted, the admiral ordered his captain to pursue the enemy, then about three miles to the leeward, his signal of battle being out all the while; and captain Fogg, by the admiral's orders, sent to the other captains, to order them to keep the line, and behave like men. Upon this captain Kirby, of the Defiance, came on board the admiral's ship, and told him, "That he had better desist; that the French were very strong; and that from what was past, he might guess he could make nothing of it." The brave admiral Benbow, who was more surprised at this language, than he would have been at the sight of another French squadron, sent for the rest of the captains on board, in order to ask their opinion. They came, but were most of them in Kirby's way of thinking; which satisfied the admiral that they were not inclined to fight. Benbow, upon this, thought it necessary to return to Jamaica, where he arrived with his squadron, very weak with a fever occasioned by his wounds, and was soon after joined by rear-admiral Whetstone, with the ships under his command.

After the English and French fleets had separated, the latter proceeded to Carthagena, from whence Mons. du Casse, the French Admiral, sent the following laconic epistle to Admiral Benbow.

"SIR,

"I had little hope on Monday last, but to have supped in your cabin: but it pleased God to order it otherwise, I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains who deserted you, hang them up; for by God, they deserve it.

"Your's, &c.

"DU CASSE."

Soon after his return to Jamaica, Vice-Admiral Benbow issued a commission to Rear-Admiral Whetstone, and to several Captains, to hold a court-martial for the trial of those officers who had so basely betrayed their trust in the late engagement. And a court-martial being held, some of the most guilty were condemned, and suffered according to their deserts.

The operation of cutting off Admiral Benbow's leg after it was shattered in the late action, had brought on him a fever, which, together with his reflections on the base conduct of his captains, at length put an end to his life. He lived near a month after the court-martial was held; and during his illness, he supported his character as an English Admiral, with the same firmness he had shewn during the engagement, giving all the necessary orders for promoting the trade, that could have been expected from him, if he had been in perfect health; and in the letters he wrote home to his lady, he discovered much greater anxiety for the interest of the nation, than for his private fortune, or the concerns of his family. He died on the 4th of November, 1702. He was a very intrepid and able sea-commander, and always remarkable for the strictness of his discipline, and his diligent attention to the duties of his station. He lived much honoured and respected, especially by the sailors, who were the best judges of his merit, and died universally lamented. He left behind him a numerous posterity of both sexes.

The Life of Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington.

Bennet (Henry) Earl of Arlington, an eminent statesman, was the second son of Sir John Bennet, knt. and was born in 1618. He was educated at Christ-church college in Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts, and distinguished himself by his turn for English poetry. Upon the king's coming to Oxford, after the breaking out of the civil war, he entered himself a volunteer; and was afterwards made choice of by the Lord Digby, secretary of state, to be his under-secretary. When it was no longer in his power to serve the royal cause, he retired to France, and from thence went to Italy.— On his return to France in 1649, he became secretary to the duke of York; and in 1658 was knighted at Bruges by king Charles II. who sent him, in quality of his minister, to the court of Madrid.— After the restoration, the king recalled him from the court of Madrid, and appointed him privy purse. On the 2d of October, 1662, he was nominated secretary of state; September the 28th, 1663, the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws; and on the 14th of March following, he was created baron of Arlington in Middlesex. At this time he had, as secretary, almost the sole management of foreign affairs, and his capacity was equal to his posts. He had a great hand in the first Dutch war, but he likewise appears to have had no small share in the negotiations for peace. He was one of the cabinet council distinguished by the name of The Cabal. On the 22d of April, 1672, he was raised to the dignities of earl of Arlington and viscount Thetford; and on the 15th of June following, he was installed knight of the garter. Soon after he was sent to Utrecht with the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Halifax, to treat of a peace between the allies and the states-general; but this negotiation had no effect.

The House of Commons, disliking the war against Holland, determined to call the advisers and promoters of it to an account. They first attacked the Duke of Lauderdale, and next the Duke of Buckingham, who being admitted to be heard, endeavoured to throw all the odium upon the Earl of Arlington; and this lord's answer not satisfying the Commons, articles of impeachment were drawn up, charging him with having been a constant and vehement promoter of popery and popish councils; with having been guilty of many undue practices, to promote his own greatness; with having embezzled the treasure of the nation, and falsely and treacherously betrayed the important trust reposed in him, as a counsellor, and principal secretary of state. He appeared before the House of Commons, and spoke much better than was expected. He excused himself, but without blaming the king. And this had no good an effect, that though he, as secretary of state, was more exposed than any other man, by the many warrants and orders he had signed, yet he was acquitted, though by a small majority. In the mean time he continued to press the king to a separate peace with the Dutch, in which he happily succeeded. Having resigned his post of secretary he was appointed lord chamberlain on the 11th of September, 1674, with this public reason given, that it was in consideration of his long and faithful service, particularly in the execution of his office of principal secretary of state, for the space of twelve years. At length, however, his credit was so extremely low with the king, that several persons at court took the liberty to mimic his person and behaviour; and it became a common jest for some courtier to put a black patch upon his nose, and strut about with a white staff in his hand, in order to make the king merry. His majesty's coldness, or perhaps displeasure, is supposed to have proceeded from Arlington's late turning towards the popular stream, and especially his outward proceedings against the papists, when the court believed him to be one inwardly hisself.

The earl of Arlington died on the 28th of July, 1685, at the age of sixty-seven. "He was," says bishop Burnet, a proud man: his parts were solid but not quick; he had the art of observing the king's temper, and managing it, beyond all the men of that time. He was believed a papist, he had once professed it, and, when he died, he again reconciled himself to that church; yet in the whole course of his ministry he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the king ought to shew no aversion to popery, but that those affairs would be settled, if ever he turned that way, which made the papists become his mortal enemies, and become hurt as an apostate and the betrayer of their interests."

The Life of William Bentinck, Earl of Portland.

Bentinck, or Bentinck, (William) Earl of Portland, one of the greatest statesmen of his time, and the first who advanced his family to the dignity of the English peerage, was descended from an ancient and noble family of that name, in the province of Guelderland. He was first page of honour to the prince of Orange, from which he was advanced to the post of gentleman of the bed-chamber, and made colonel and captain of the Dutch regiment of guards. In 1675, the prince falling ill of the small-pox, Mr. Bentinck gave the most extraordinary proof of his love and affection for him; for the small-pox not rising kindly, his physicians judged it necessary that some young person should lie in the same bed with him, imagining that the natural heat of another would drive out the disease, and expel it from the nobler parts: no body could be found in all the court to try this experiment, when Mr. Bentinck, though he had never had the disease, generously resolved to run the risk, and accordingly attended the prince, during the whole course of his illness, both day and night, and on the prince's recovery, was immediately seized with the same disorder, from which, however, he recovered. He was afterward employed in several negotiations, and upon that prince's accession to the crown of Great-Britain, was made groom of the stole, privy-purse, first gentleman of the bed-chamber, and was the first commoner upon the list of privy-councillors; he was soon after naturalized by act of parliament, and two days before the king and queen's coronation, was created baron of Cirencester, viscount Woodstock, and earl of Portland. He distinguished himself on many occasions, particularly in the following instance, which does immortal honour to his memory: The parliament having taken into consideration the affairs of the East-India company, who, through mismanagement and corrupt dealings, were in danger of losing their charter, strong interest was made with the members of both houses, and large sums distributed to procure a new establishment of the company by act of parliament; a particular value was set on lord Portland's interest, and on this account he was offered no less than fifty thousand pounds for his vote, and to use his endeavours to engage the king to favour the design: but his lordship, possessed of a greatness of soul that placed him above corruption, treated this injurious offer with all the contempt and indignation it deserved, telling the person employed in it, that if ever he mentioned such a thing to him again, he would forever be the company's enemy, and give them all the opposition in his power.

In 1696, his lordship was created knight of the garter, at which time he was lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces. He had the chief management of the peace of Ryswick, was present at the battle of the Boyne, at that of Landen, where he was wounded, and at the siege of Limbrick, Namur, &c. but at length observing, with some concern, the progress his countryman, the cardinal of Albani, made in the king's favour, he resigned his employments, though the king used all his endeavours to divert him from that resolution. As lord Portland was a foreigner, he was very naturally an object of the national jealousy; he was therefore with other lords dispatched in the year 1700, for advising and executing the partition treaty; but the impeachments ments were dismissed for want of prosecution.— His lordship spent the latter part of his life in retirement, at Bullstode, in the county of Bucks, and died on the 23d of November, 1709, in the sixty-first year of his age: his corpse being removed to London, was buried in Westminster abbey.

The Life of Dr. Richard Bentley.

Bentley (Richard) a celebrated critic and divine, was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire, in the year 1662. Being removed from his native place to St. John's college in Cambridge, he pursued his studies with indefatigable industry; and his inclination leading him strongly to critical learning, his skill and knowledge therein was taken notice of by Dr. Stillingfleet, who was bred at the same college, and, in 1685, appointed him private tutor to his son. Mr. Bentley had not been above a year in the doctor's family, when he had compiled, in a thick quarto volume, a kind of Hexapla, in the first column of which was every word of the Hebrew bible alphabetically disposed; the various interpretations whereof from the Chaldee, Syriac, vulgate Latin, Septuagint, and the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodosian, had their proper place in the other five columns; besides another volume, in quarto, of the various lections and emendations of the Hebrew text, drawn out of these ancient versions. As he proceeded, his views became more enlarged, and he had an opportunity of satisfying them in the Bodleian library in 1689, when he attended his pupil to Wadham college in Oxford, where he was incorporated master of arts on the 4th of July that year, having taken that degree some time before in the university of Cambridge. He was then also in holy orders; and his patron, to whom he had been very serviceable, being advanced to the see of Worcester in 1692, collated him to a prebend in that church, and likewise made him his domestic chaplain, in which last station he continued till the bishop's death. This learned prelate, as well as Doctor William Lloyd, then bishop of Litchfield, had seen many proofs of our author's extraordinary merit, when they concurred in recommending him as a fit person to open the lectures upon Mr. Boyle's foundation, in defence of natural and revealed religion.

This gave him a fine opportunity of establishing his fame: he saw it well, and resolved to push it to the utmost. Sir Isaac Newton's Principia had been published but a few years, and the book was little known, and less understood; Mr. Bentley, therefore, determined to spare no pains in displaying, to the best advantage, the profound demonstrations which that excellent work furnished in proof of a Deity; and that nothing might be wanting which lay in his power to complete the design, he applied to the author, and received from him the solution of some difficulties which had not fallen within the plan of his treatise. Our author also did not forget to heighten the novelty of his plan, by introducing and asserting Mr. Locke's lately advanced notion concerning the innate ideas of a God in his first sermon. With the help of such advantages, Mr. Bentley's sermons at Boyle's lectures became the wonder and admiration of the world, and raised the highest opinion of the preacher's abilities.— Accordingly he soon reaped the fruits of his reputation, being appointed keeper of the royal library at St. James's in 1693. He was scarcely well settled in this office, when he fell under the displeasure of the hon. Mr. Charles Boyle, son to the earl of Orrery, a young nobleman of the greatest hopes, who being then in the course of his education at Christ-church college, Oxford, resolved to publish a new edition of the Greek epistles of Phalaris, for which purpose having obtained the use of a manuscript of the book out of St. James's library, our librarian demanded it back sooner than was expected, and before the design of consulting it was finished. This being resented by Mr. Boyle, gave rise to the well-known controversy between Boyle and Bentley, which was carried on with admirable spirit, wit, and learning, in several writings on both sides, till the year 1699, and gave our author another opportunity of surprising the world with his genius and knowledge in critical learning; and Dr. Montague dying the next year, he was presented by the crown to the mastership of Trinity-college in Cambridge. Upon this promotion he resigned his prebend of Worcester, and, on the 12th of June, 1707, was collated to the archdeaconry of Ely; besides this, he was presented to a good benefice in that island.

Being thus placed in a state of ease and affluence, he took the degree of doctor of divinity, entered into matrimony, and indulged his inclination in critical pursuits; and as he occasionally published the fruits of his labours, they were observed severally to abound with so much profound erudition and ingenious sagacity, that by degrees he obtained the character of being the greatest critic of the age. In the mean time he carried matters with so high a hand in the government of his college, that, in 1709, a complaint was brought before the bishop of Ely, as visitor, against him, by several of the fellows, who, in order to procure his removal from the mastership, charged him with embezzling the college money, and other misdemeanours. In answer to this, he presented his defence to the bishop, which was published in 1710, under the title of The present State of Trinity College; and thus began a lasting quarrel, which was carried on with the most virulent animosity on each side, till, after above twenty years continuance, it ended at last in the doctor's favour. Nor was this the only trial that exercised his spirit, and wherein he triumphed over his adversaries. During the course of the former dispute, he had been promoted to the regius professorship of divinity; and his majesty king George I. on a visit to the university in October, 1717, having, as usual on such occasions, nominated by mandate several persons for a doctor's degree in that faculty, our professor, to whose office it belonged to perform the ceremony called creation, demanded four guineas from each person, besides a broad piece of gold, and absolutely refused to create any doctor without these fees: hence arose a warm and long dispute, during which the doctor was first suspended from his degrees by the university, and then degraded: but on a petition to his majesty for relief from that sentence, the affair was referred to the King's Bench, where the proceedings proceedings against him being reversed, a mandamus was issued, charging the university to restore him.

Dr. Bentley was happily endued with a natural hardiness of temper, which enabled him to ride out both these storms without any extraordinary disturbance, or interruption to his literary pursuits. In his private character, though he is generally allowed to have been too fond of money, he was hearty, sincere, and warm in his friendship, an affectionate husband, and a most indulgent father. He loved hospitality and respect, maintained the dignity and munificence of the ancient abbots in housekeeping at his lodge; and, in conversation, tempered the severity of the critic with a peculiar strain of vivacity and pleasantry. He died at his lodge in Trinity college, on the 14th of July, 1742, at eighty years of age. The doctor's principal works, besides those already mentioned, were 1. Animadversions and Remarks on the poet Callimachus. 2. Remarks on Collins's Discourse of Free-Thinking. 3. Beautiful and correct editions of Horace, Terence, Phædrus, and Milton, with notes; but, as the doctor had not a poetic genius, many of his notes on our British poet, in which he has endeavoured to make emendations of the original, have been greatly and justly censured.

The Life of Bishop Berkeley.

Berkeley (George) the learned and ingenious bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, was a native of that kingdom, and the son of William Berkeley of Thomastown, in the county of Kilkenny. He was born on the 12th of March, 1684, at Kilkenny near Thomastown, received the first part of his education at Kilkenny school, and was admitted a pensioner of Trinity college, Dublin, at the age of fifteen. * He was chosen fellow of that college June 9, 1707. The first proof he gave of his literary abilities was Arithmetica abique algebra aut Euclide demonstrata; which, from the preface, he appears to have written before he was twenty years old, though he did not publish it till 1707. His Theory of Vision was published in 1709, and the Principles of Human Knowledge appeared in the year following.

In February 1713, he published in London a defence of his system of immaterialism, in three dialogues between Hylas and Philonous. Acuteness of parts and a beautiful imagination were so conspicuous in his writings, that his reputation was now established, and his company was courted, even where his opinions did not find admission. He was soon introduced to the acquaintance of Sir Richard Steele, and Dr. Swift. He wrote several papers in the Guardian for the former, and at his house became acquainted with Mr. Pope, with whom he continued to live in strict friendship during his life. Dean Swift recommended him to the celebrated earl of Peterborough, who being appointed ambassador to the king of Sicily and other Italian princes, took Mr. Berkeley with him in quality of chaplain and secretary, in November 1713. He returned to England with the earl in August 1714, and some time after embraced an advantageous offer made him by Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, of accompanying his son in a tour through Europe. On the 18th of May, 1724, Dr. Berkeley resigned his fellowship, being promoted by his patron the duke of Grafton to the deanery of Derry, worth 1100l. per annum. In the interval between this removal and his return from abroad, his mind had been employed in conceiving that benevolent project, which alone entitles him to as much honour as all his learned labours have procured him, viz. The scheme for converting the savage Americans to Christianity, by a college to be erected in the Summer Islands, otherwise called the isles of Bermuda. He published a proposal for this purpose in 1725, and offered to resign his own opulent preferment, and dedicate the remainder of his life to the instructing the youth in America, on the moderate subsistence of 100l. yearly.

He was not, however, so ill acquainted with the world, as to rest the success of his application to the ministry entirely on the hope his scheme afforded of promoting national honour and the cause of Christianity; his arguments were drawn from the more alluring topic of present advantage to the government. Having with much industry acquired an accurate knowledge of the value of certain lands in the island of Saint Christopher's, which were then to be sold for public use, he undertook to raise from them a much greater sum than was expected, and proposed that a part of the purchase money should be applied to the erecting of his college. In the mean time the dean entered into a marriage, August 1, 1728, with Anne, daughter of the right honourable John Forster, Esq; speaker of the Irish house of commons. This engagement however was so far from being any obstruction to his grand undertaking, that he actually set sail in the execution of it for Rhode Island in the middle of September following. He carried with him his lady, one Miss Handcock, two gentlemen of fortune, Messrs. James and Dalton, a pretty large sum of money of his own property, and a collection of books for his intended library. He directed his course to Rhode Island, which lay nearest to Bermuda, with a view of purchasing lands on the adjoining continent as estates for the support of his college; having had a positive promise from those in power, that the parliamentary grant should be paid him as soon as ever such lands should be pitched upon and agreed for. But this scheme being rendered abortive, he returned to Europe.

In 1732 he published the "Minute Philosopher," a masterly performance, wherein he pursues the freethinker through the various characters of atheist, libertine, enthusiast, scorner, critic, metaphysician, fatalist, and sceptic; and very happily employs against him several new weapons, drawn from the store-house of his own ingenious system of philosophy. It is written in a series of dialogues on the model of Plato.

After dean Berkeley's return from Rhode Island, queen Caroline often commanded his attendance to discourse with him on what he had observed worthy of notice in America. His agreeable and instructive conversation engaged that discerning princess so much in his favour, that the rich deanery of Down in Ireland becoming vacant, he was at her desire named to it, and the king's letter actually came over for his appointment. But his friend lord Burlington having neglected to notify the royal intentions in proper time to the duke of Dorset, then lord lieutenant of Ireland, his excellency was so offended at this disposal of the richest deanery in Ireland without his concurrence, that it was thought proper not to press the matter any further. Her majesty upon this declared, that since they would not suffer Dr. Berkeley to be a dean in Ireland, he should be a bishop; and accordingly, in 1733, the bishopric of Cloyne becoming vacant, he was, by letters patent, dated March 17, promoted to that see, and was consecrated at St. Patrick's church in Dublin on the 19th of May following.

In 1749, his lordship addressed a letter to the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland, under the title of A Word to the Wife, written with so much candour and moderation, as well as good sense, that those gentlemen, highly to their own honour, in the Dublin Journal of November 18, 1749, thought fit to return "their sincere and hearty thanks to the worthy author, assuring him that they are determined to comply with every particular recommended in his address to the utmost of their power." They add, that "in every page it contains a proof of the author's extensive charity; his views are only towards the public good; the means he prescribeth are easily complied with; and his manner of treating persons in their circumstances so very singular, that they plainly shew the good man, the polite gentleman, and the true patriot." A character this, which was so entirely his lordship's due, that in the year 1745 that excellent judge of merit, the late earl of Chesterfield, as soon as he was advanced to the government of Ireland, of his own motion wrote to inform him, that the see of Clogher then vacant, the value of which was double that of Cloyne, was at his service. This offer our bishop, with many expressions of thankfulness, declined.

The close of a life thus devoted to the good of mankind was answerable to the beginning of it; the bishop's last years being employed in inquiring into the virtues of a medicine, whereof he had himself experienced the good effects in the relief of a nervous cholick. This medicine was no other than the celebrated tar-water; his thoughts upon which subject he first communicated to the world in 1744, in a treatise entitled "Sir, a Chain of Philosophical Reflections and Inquiries concerning the virtues of Tar-Water." In July 1752 he removed, though in a bad state of health, with his lady and family to Oxford, in order to superintend the education of one of his sons, then newly admitted a student at Christ-church.—But as nobody could be more sensible than his lordship of the impropriety of a bishop's non-residence, he previously endeavoured to exchange his high preferment for some canonry or headship at Oxford. Failing of success in this, he actually wrote over to the secretary of state, to request that he might have permission to resign his bishopric, worth at that time at least 1400*l.* per annum. So uncommon a petition excited his majesty's curiosity to enquire who was the extraordinary man that preferred it; being told that it was his old acquaintance Dr. Berkeley, he declared he should die a bishop in spite of himself, but gave him full liberty to reside where he pleased.

At Oxford he lived highly respected by the learned members of that university, till the hand of Providence unexpectedly deprived them of the pleasure and advantage derived from his residence among them. On Sunday evening, January 14, 1753, as he was sitting in the midst of his family, listening to a sermon of Dr. Sherlock's which his lady was reading to him, he was seized, with what the physicians termed a palsy in the heart, and instantly expired. The accident was so sudden, that his body was quite cold, and his joints stiff, before it was discovered; as the bishop lay on a couch, and seemed to be asleep, till his daughter, on presenting him with a dish of tea, first perceived his insensibility. His remains were interred in Christ-church, Oxford, where there is an elegant monument erected to his memory.

Mr. Pope sums up his character in one line: after having mentioned some particular virtues that characterize other prelates, he ascribes

"To Berkeley every virtue under heav'n."

The Life of Sir John Berry.

Berry (Sir John) a brave naval commander, was the son of the Rev. Mr. Daniel Berry, vicar of Knevalton and Maland, in Devonshire, and was put apprentice to Mr. Robert Mering, who had a share in several ships at Plymouth. He was twice taken by the Spaniards, and his master being reduced by losses at sea, gave him up his indentures; on which, coming to London, he was appointed boatwain of the Swallow ketch, which was bound to the West Indies, in quest of a pirate who infested those seas. The vessel being overtaken by a storm in the gulph of Florida, they were obliged to cut away all her masts, and two frigates which accompanied her were lost. With much difficulty they reached Jamaica, where she was refitted, and Mr. Berry appointed lieutenant. Three weeks after their leaving Jamaica, they discovered the pirate riding at anchor, in a bay of the island of St. Domingo. She had twenty guns and sixty men, and the Swallow had only eight small guns and forty men. Captain Insam, who commanded the Swallow, seeing the pirate's superior strength, thought proper to consult his men before he engaged; and calling all the hands upon deck, observed, that those whom they were going to attack were men at arms, old buccaneers, and superior to them in number and the force of their ships, and therefore he desired to have their opinion. Lieutenant Berry interrupting him, said, that they were also men at arms, and, what was more, honest men, and fought under the king's commission, but that if he had no stomach for fighting, he desired that he would be pleased to walk down into his cabin. The crew applauded his motion, and immediately prepared to engage; but the pirate being to windward, the Swallow was obliged to make two tacks under her lee, and received two broadsides before she could get into her proper station. Captain Berry, far from being intimidated, laid the pirate on board, on his larboard bow, pouring in his whole whole broadside, by which twenty two of the pirate's hands were killed, and soon after the rest submitted.

This gallant action was performed in the year 1670, and greatly recommended him to the notice of the government: he was soon after appointed commander of the Cornation, of sixty-six guns, with orders to sail to the West Indies, and protect the trade. At his rival at Barbadoes, he found that the French at St. Kitt's were fitting out twenty-two men of war and frigates, six large transports of their own, and four hired from the Dutch, in order to take the island of Nevis. To prevent this, the governor of Barbadoes fitted out eight large merchant-ships, and converted them into men of war, which having joined Mr. Berry, he sailed for Nevis. But just as he turned the point of that island, one of his best ships accidentally blew up; and this happening just at the appearance of the French fleet, damped the spirits of his men, which he perceiving, cried, "You have seen an English ship blow up, let us try if we cannot blow up one of the French. There they are, boys, and if we do not beat them, they will beat us." By this time the French fleet being come up, Berry immediately attacked them, and was so bravely seconded by the rest of his squadron, that after an engagement of thirteen hours, he forced their great fleet to take shelter under the cannon of St. Christopher's, whither he pursued them, sent in a fire ship, and burnt the admiral's ship. As soon as he saw the French ship on fire, he said to the seamen, "I told you in the morning we should burn a Frenchman before night: to-morrow we will try what we can do with the rest." Put the enemy prevented his design by stealing away while he was refitting his ships.

On his return he was greatly caressed by the ministry, and in 1672 distinguished himself at the famous battle of Southwold bay, where he commanded a seventy-gun ship, for which he received the honour of knighthood. In 1682 he commanded the Gloucester frigate, on board of which the duke of York embarked for Scotland; but by the carelessness of the pilot, the vessel was lost at the mouth of the Humber. In the midst of this confusion, sir John retained that presence of mind for which he was always remarkable, and by that means preserved the duke, and as many of his retinue as the long-boat would carry. Soon after he was promoted to a flag, and commanded as vice-admiral under lord Dartmouth, at the demolition of Tangier, and on his return was made a commissioner of the navy, which post he enjoyed till his death. He was in great favour with king James II. who made choice of him to command under lord Dartmouth, when the prince of Orange landed in England; and when his lordship left the fleet, the whole command devolved on sir John Berry, who held it till the ships were laid up. After the revolution sir John continued in his posts, and was frequently consulted by king William, who entertained a high opinion of his abilities in military affairs; but he was poisoned in the beginning of February, 1691, on board one of his majesty's ships at Portsmouth, where he was paying her off, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. His body was brought to London, and interred in the chancel of Stepney church, where a monument was erected to his memory.

The Life of Mr. Thomas Betterton.

Betterton (Thomas) a celebrated tragedian, was born in Tothill-street, Westminster, in 1635. His father, who was under-cook to King Charles I. bound him apprentice to Mr. Rhode, a bookseller. But having a strong inclination to the stage, he endeavoured to qualify himself for it; and having the proper requisites from nature to enable him to shine in that profession, he obtained great applause as an actor when he was only twenty-two years of age. He afterwards acted at the duke of York's theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-fields, under the direction of Sir William Davenant. He went over to Paris, by the king's command, to take a view of the French scenery and machinery, and at his return very much improved the English stage in this particular, though he had before given specimens of his great talents that way. In 1670, he married Mrs. Sanderson, a woman of unblemished morals, who likewise made a considerable figure on the stage as a tragedian. They acted for some years at the duke's theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields; but this house being somewhat inconvenient, and the king's company having the vogue of the town, the players under the duke built another theatre in Dorset-gardens, which not proving so successful as had been expected, an union was formed of the two companies in 1682, which continued till 1695. There were several other stage-revolutions after this, during which time Mr. Betterton amassed a handsome fortune, but lost the greatest part of it by an East-India scheme, in which he engaged Dr. Radcliffe to join with him. He never recovered this loss, but persons of all ranks and conditions paid the highest compliment to his merit, by crowding to the benefit which was made for him, some years after he had left the stage, and by which he is said to have cleared five hundred pounds. He died the 28th of April, 1710, and was buried in the cloister of Westminster-abbey.

Mr. Betterton in his own time was styled the English Roscius; and Booth, who is well known to have been an actor of great eminence, used to declare, that "he thought him the greatest tragedian that ever lived." Booth also said, that upon his first representing the Ghost at the rehearsal of Hamlet, he was so struck with the horror represented in the countenance, speech, and action of Betterton, who played Hamlet, that he was unable to proceed in his own part for some moments. He was agreeable in his person, and of a graceful stature; and with regard to his voice, it was of a fine tone and compass, and he always spoke full, and so intelligibly, that he never lost a word; and his action was extremely beautiful, just, and pathetic. He was a man of probity, sober, modest, and friendly, and extremely industrious in his profession. He kept the best company, and was remarkable, off the stage, for the decent simplicity of his dress. He chiefly excelled in tragedy, but he also made a considerable figure in comedy, and played Sir John Falstaff admirably well the first time. He very much improved our taste in English Operas, in which he engaged the famous musical performer Henry Purcell; and each being eminent in their respective art, they contracted the greatest intimacy, but always engaged in separate interests.

Mr. Cibber relates the particular circumstances that brought on the death of Mr. Betterton. "The last night, says he, this great master of his profession acted, was Melantius in the Maid's Tragedy, for his own benefit; when being suddenly seized by the gout, he submitted, by external application, to have his foot to be relieved, that he might be able to walk on the stage, in a slipper rather than wholly disappoint his auditors. He was observed that day to exert a more than ordinary spirit, and met with suitable applause; but the unhappy consequence of tampering with his distemper was, that it flew into his head, and killed him in three days, (I think) in the seventy-fourth year of his age."

The same writer, who was well acquainted with Mr. Betterton, and must be supposed to have been a good judge of theatrical merit, speaks in very high terms of his abilities as an actor. "Betterton, says he, was an actor as Shakespeare was an author, both without competitors! joined for the mutual assistance and illustration of each other's genius! How Shakespeare wrote, all men who have a taste for nature, may read, and know; but with what higher rapture would he still be read, could they conceive how Betterton played him! Then might they know, the one was born alone to speak, what the other only knew to write! Pity it is, that the momentary beauties flowing from an harmonious elocution, cannot, like those of poetry, be their own record! That the animated graces of the player can live no longer than the instant breath and motion that presents them; or at best can but faintly glimmer thro' the memory, or imperfect attention of a few surviving spectators. Could how Betterton spoke, be as easily known as what he spoke, then might you see the muse of Shakespeare in her triumph, with all her beauties in their best array, rising into real life, and charming her beholders.

"Betterton had to just a sense of what was true, or false applause, that I have heard him say, he never thought any kind of it equal to an attentive silence; that there were many ways of deceiving an audience into a loud one; but to keep them hushed and quiet, was an applause which only truth and merit could arrive at: of which art, there never was an equal master to himself. From these various excellencies, he had so full a possession of the esteem and regard of his auditors, that upon his entrance into every scene, he seemed to seize upon the eyes and ears of the body and inaudient! To have talked, or looked in the way, would then have been thought insensibility, or ignorance. In all his dissimulations of moment, the strong interest of his attitude and affect, drew you into such an impatient gaze, and eager expectation, that you almost inhaled the sentiment with your eye, before the ear could reach it. I never heard a line in tragedy come from Betterton, wherein my judgement, my ear, and my imagination, were not fully satisfied; which, since his time, I cannot equally say of any one actor whatsoever."*

Lord North said, the honourable gentleman looked for impossibilities, he could not divine what the expense of a campaign would amount to. It was impossible to tell till the expense was incurred; and, in some instances, not till long after. Such accounts as were brought into the respective offices, were regularly laid before the House, and that was all that could be done. He was against the motion, because it could not be complied with; the sums might be right, but the House had no documents before them to come to such a vote.

Hon. James Luttrell supported Mr. Hartley's motion; but many of his arguments led to prove that the information required by Mr. Hartley would be very insufficient, if Parliament were to be imposed on by such mutilated and garbled estimates as were then laid upon the table, tending to mislead rather than inform the House; that though they were so very artfully and intricately drawn up, that it would be found difficult to decypher them, it was indeed unnecessary to attempt it; for he would undertake to prove that they were replete with fraud and imposition, the money not having appeared to be applied to the several purposes for which parliament had granted it; that the practice was to raise money upon false pretences; that Parliament had voted 60,000l. for the express purposes of repairing two 74 gun ships and one frigate, not a shilling of which money had been so expended, the two large ships being decayed for want of repair, and the frigate broken up as soon as the money was asked for. He then proved several other impositions not less gross; but contended, that the large supplies granted annually by Parliament were sufficient, with good management, to answer all the necessary expenses of the navy. He showed, that either by ignorance or fraud, a great and heavy debt was incurred; but said he was sure that the House was not before acquainted with the means by which that debt was contracted, and was persuaded government could only trust to the indolence of Parliament, and the insufficiency of the estimates, to shelter themselves from that resentful fish impositions on the public, and insult on the Commons merited. He then stated that more than half a million of money had been voted for naval stores since 1771, exclusive of half the four pence per man for each month, which is a very great supply towards the wear and tear; that several articles in the ordinary estimates have increased nearly double in the space of a few years; that naval stores supplied by America before the war, had of late years fell one third in their price; that harbour moorings now stand government in 50,000l. a year, which a few years ago did not exceed 20,000l. though they are not so frequently shifted, nor attended with the same expense as formerly; that 400,000l. had been granted annually towards the repairs of our fleet, which is more than double the sum voted the year after the war, though new ships had replaced many of the old ones; and the service our navy had been employed in during the peace could not occasion the necessity of frequent repairs. He then stated many more supplies, such as 264,795*l.* for improving the 400,000*l.* towards paying off the navy debt, &c. but which way all these sums had really been applied, he contended, could not be traced out by means of the estimates, or other accounts laid before Parliament; certain it was however that the navy debt (reckoning the 400,000*l.* granted by Parliament) from the 31st of December, 1771, to the 31st of December, 1775, had increased from 1,179,375*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.* to 3,098,679,03*s.* He then took many exceptions to several articles in the navy estimate laid before Parliament, such as the number of seamen charged more than had been voted, a mutilated account of 20,096*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* as the whole expence that appeared for building King's ships in contractors yards, when 17,574*l.* granted for the same purpose, had been smuggled into another estimate the same year; that no less than 91,524*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* was not to be accounted for by the ingenuity of office, but by a supposition of the navy boards, that there might be more provisions on board the ships than last year, and that the price was higher. He concluded by insisting, that the charge of 96,291*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* for victualling land forces, ought not to have been included in the navy debt; and in support of this assertion, as well as to point out the necessity of a strict parliamentary enquiry into the many impositions he had alluded to, and the remedy necessary to be applied, he desired that the clerk might read an address from the commons to the crown, on Thursday, May 31, 1771, in which they set forth, that it is their privilege to adjust the proportion of the money they grant, or are for the sake of the public credit bound to pay; that when the sums are stated and granted, those through whose hands the disposition of them passes, are not to be allowed in any shape to alter or enlarge them; that when uses are found out, such as were neither voted nor addressed for, it is a misapplication of the public money; the Commons set forth the abuse of diverting several sums issued for one service, and transferring them to other purposes, for which they were not intended, and that such practices amount to attempts, which differ very little from levying money without the consent of Parliament at all. That the sum of 660,806*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* charged to the navy debt, has been paid for victualling land forces sent to the garrison of Gibraltar, &c. for which no deduction appears to be made from the pay of those forces, nor any part of that sum re-assigned to the victualling, which is a breach of several acts of Parliament; and the address, setting forth exactly similar abuses to those now practised towards the navy, prays, that for the sake of Her Majesty's honour, and for the public good, she will be pleased to remove those persons from office and public trust, who have been found guilty of such frauds, and that they may be prosecuted by law for their offences.

Lord John Cavendish seconded Mr. Hartley's motion. He desired to know what money would be wanted, that the House might be enabled to judge fairly of the expediency of the undertaking, and entreated that administration would desist from their shameful dissingenuous conduct, of bringing in their accounts by piecemeal, recommending to them to speak out like men, who had nothing to fear or conceal, and were ready to submit the measure at large, with all its consequences, to the eye of Parliament.

Mr. Hartley. Interested as I am not to incur the displeasure or slight opinion of the House, which must have been my punishment if I had presumed to make myself so much the object of their attention, as I have done this day, upon frivolous, crude, unwarranted, or undigested materials, I now address them with more confidence, as the noble Lord has neither denied, nor even contested, any material fact or probable calculation which I have offered to you. He has not entered much into detail; but he has told us in general terms, that the expence must be enormous; that no estimate could be made that could give any satisfaction to Parliament (which is but poor encouragement to proceed;) that it has not been usual to forecast, or to provide for the actual expences of each year within the year, but that it may be proper to provide for a few navy-bills; and though he has not consented to have authentic estimates laid before the House, yet he has given a full confirmation to mine, as not being exaggerated, but probably much under-rated.

Upon this warrant from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I will now apply myself to another noble Lord, lately advanced to the head of the American department, and who is therefore to be considered as standing in the place of efficient and responsible minister of the present civil war. As to the first Lord of the Treasury, his measures have been vilified; his plans have been ridiculed; he has been publicly reproached in this House with indolence. The other noble Lord, who is not of a disposition to be dictated to, is now brought forward to restore himself to our councils: He will turn over a new leaf: He will inspire new vigor into the civil war: His principles and conduct have always been consistent: He declares uniformly and repeatedly, in the most peremptory tone, that he will never consent to any treaty with the colonies whatsoever, previous to unconditional submission. Let this noble Lord now look at the work that he has undertaken, and the support that he is likely to receive from his colleagues in office. Will he sit patiently in his place, and hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer admit the enormity of the financial provisions necessary, yet openly declaring in the House that he will not make those necessary provisions?

I appeal to the House, if the noble Lord, who is Chancellor of the Exchequer, did not admit my estimates of the probable expence of this year to be under-rated, at the same time declaring that he would not make provision for them in this year's account, but leave them to time and chance? Concluding with telling us, that it might be proper to provide for a few navy bills.

Would the great minister of the late war have patiently submitted to such an undignified declaration? No; nor would he under those conditions have stood responsible. I do not mean to instigate the war : no one will suspect me of that ; but I apply to the discretion of those men who have undertaken it. — Granted, that they can still think it may be within the limits of possibility to make a conquest of America (which I think madness;) yet without concert, without union, without leaven; your levies not raised, your transports not hired, your embarkations already two months after their time, and still not in forwardness; your chancellor of the exchequer starving the service; one of your commanders declaring in his place in this House, for himself and his colleagues, that the service was unsought; will not ministers pause for a moment? Is the prospect so encouraging, or do they begin to suspect that they have undertaken more than they can accomplish, at least in the disunion and distraction of their present councils? It is now avowed, that we are too late to expect the conquest of America in this campaign; that point has slipped already; set down ten or twelve millions more for that sleepy fit. I apply to the prudence of ministers, whether in the present circumstances at least, they may not think it advisable to relax from the peremptory terms of unconditional submission.

The whole of my object in applying to you this day, is to submit to the consideration of the House, and of the public, whether for the sake of justice, and upon a review of the state of the nation, and of all the consequences which must attend this fatal war, they will not think it reasonable and expedient (if this armament must proceed) to send, at the same time, a solemn, clear, distinct, and unambiguous specification of just and honourable terms to be offered to your colonies, previous to any further acts of hostility. I think that parliament owe to their own dignity, and to the honour of the kingdom which they represent, to set up the standard of national justice upon that ground. I do not take it as a simple proposition, either of concession or accommodation, but of indispensable justice, as connected with these armaments of vengeance which you are preparing. Let it be avowed openly and unequivocally to every member of the constitution, that the British government knows no other foundation, and acknowledges no other principle for its title and demands, than the compact of rational obedience and conditional submission. I take my line from the address and petition of the corporation of the city of London lately presented to the throne. That address will remain to the latest times a perpetual testimony and memorial of their prudence and diligence to direct, as far as their influence can extend, the movements of government by justice and reason, and of their earnestness and zeal for the support of good order and just obedience, as long as government will abide by their part of their compact. No people can be bound to surrender their rights and liberties in return for protection. When any government make such demands, the compact is void. These are bold and manly principles. They are the pillars of our own constitution. That great and respectable corporation, the city of London, have taken a decided part worthy of themselves. They earnestly implore his Majesty, through the means of parliament, to assure the colonies that they shall be protected in their rights and liberties, and upon that ground to demand, in return, rational and contented obedience. Let the justice of the legislature stand vindicated in the contest, and they offer their hands and hearts to support you. In a confederate state, where there are dependences and subordinations, the term of a supreme legislature has a very intelligible import; but an arbitrary legislature is a totally repugnant to every principle of sound and just government, as an arbitrary monarch. Reason is the law to legislatures, and the measure of obedience to subjects.

Whatever be the event of this unhappy civil contest, the city of London, as a very important member of the state, have discharged their duty with prudence and firmness. They have not presumed to dictate the terms; but upon the most liberal principles, they have suggested, that the fundamentals of this government, which are taxation by representatives, and security of charters, ought, in the spirit of justice, to be confirmed to all parts of the British dominions. I think that it now remains with us, in conjunction with the other branches of the legislature, to fulfil our parts. If we neglect this step of justice now, the future national reproach will lie at our door. The answer which the city of London have received, too plainly imports unconditional submission, or no peace. Whoever has advised that answer, and still takes upon himself to persist inflexibly in these principles, has in my opinion taken a very desperate responsibility upon himself.

If ministers have no regard for the honour and justice of their country, let them at least pause for one moment; and before they cut off all retreat, let them reflect upon their present enterprise and future responsibility: And first, I apply myself to the wisdom of the House upon the arguments of prudence, which the present state of the nation, as I have endeavoured to lay it before you, seems to me irresistibly to suggest; I then address myself to the noble lord at the head of the American department, to remind him of his own responsibility, and I make my tender to him of the proposition of conditional terms, as arising out of the address of the city of London to the king. I have drawn up the sentiments of that address, in a form of an address from the House to the King, which I confess appears to me most indispensable, and which, with great deference, but most earnestly I recommend to the consideration of the House. The substance of the proposition is to put the American colonies upon the same footing of taxation that Ireland is, and always has been, and to give them security for charters. If you do not meditate to introduce the same innovations into the mode of taxation in Ireland which you have attempted in America, then put them both upon the same ground, and let them be mutually a security to each other. The example of Ireland is entirely pertinent to the case of the colonies; your provinces in America have always hitherto been upon the same footing in taxation as Ireland. Let them be simply replaced as they were, and then the principles and uniformity of your provincial governments in all your dependencies will be maintained. Your colonies, in their

their late humble and dutiful petition to the King, have implicitly submitted themselves to his wisdom and gracious interposition, to prescribe the terms of peace : Then let these terms precede your acts of vengeance. Assure to them the security of their rights and liberties, and then make your demand of submission.

One word, Sir, of apology for myself. My situation is at present distressing to me. I have so often troubled you upon the subject of America, which I confess engrosses all my thoughts, that I do not know how to trespass upon your patience any further, especially at the conclusion of an intricate debate upon the state of the nation. But having set before you on the one side the very alarming, though real state of things, if I do not, on the other hand, offer to you the alternative, by which you may avert the calamities impending upon this country, my work will be frustrated. Let me entreat you to open the door to reconciliation and peace, and not to drive them from you, while they are yet within your reach. With the permission of the House, I will read to you an address to the King for specific terms of peace to be offered to the colonies. I will importune you no farther, but to recommend it to the serious consideration of the House; I wish I might add, to their adoption, that it might receive the weight of their sanction and authority before it be too late.

It is as follows :

“ That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, setting forth, That this House, having taken into their serious consideration the very alarming state of the present disturbances in America, and the ruinous prospect thence arising to the commerce and public credit of these kingdoms, and to the safety of all his Majesty's dominions, together with the enormous debt, deficiencies and boundless expence which every day and hour accumulate, out of measure, in this destructive and exhausting civil war; and that his Majesty's faithful Commons being most anxious to provide for the peace, prosperity and security of all his Majesty's dominions, and to save the effusion of blood, and thinking that the most probable means of restoring peace to his Majesty's subjects in America, and of securing their constitutional dependance on Great Britain, would be, to empower his commissioner or commissioners to offer to them some specific line of rational obedience, instead of unconstitutional submission, and to give them assurance of redress to all their reasonable complaints of grievances, together with a full security of all their constitutional rights; beg leave to recommend to his Majesty to give instructions to his commissioner or commissioners to issue a proclamation in his Majesty's name, declaring, that his Majesty's colonies in America shall be put upon the same footing of giving and granting their own money, by their own representatives, as his Majesty's subjects in Ireland are, and always have been; and that all charters which have at any time been granted to any of the said colonies by his Majesty, or any of his predecessors, shall be confirmed and secured to them; and to assure his Majesty, that this House will give his Majesty every possible assistance to put such assurances into full effect and execution.

A negative was put upon all the motions except the last, upon which Lord North put the previous question. There was no division.

History of the Proceedings of the present Session of the British Parliament. (Continued from the App. p. 929.)

Monday, December 2.

HIS Majesty went to the House of Peers, and gave the royal assent to the malt-tax bill; the bill for punishing mutiny and desertion: the bill for better regulating the marine forces when on shore; to two road bills, and three naturalization bills.

The lords after his majesty was gone, called in the counsel, and heard the pleadings on the Irish cause, adjourned over from last week.—The merits of this cause turned on the words of a clause in the will of one Jackson, who, after having mentioned a particular bequest in land to his mother Mary Jackson, in a further disputed clause gives her all the residue of his effects real and personal. The heirs at law set up a claim in Ireland to his landed estate, as not being within the meaning of the word effects, and the court of King's Bench in Ireland gave judgment in their favour. Mary Jackson brought the cause into the court of King's Bench at Westminster hall, when the decree of the Irish court was reversed. The heirs at law then brought a writ of error before the house of peers, and the judges were summoned to attend. After many learned arguments from the counsel on both sides, the Lord Chancellor made a very able speech, and then put the question to the judges, “ Whether any, and what part of the estate claimed by the heirs at law, was not included in the devise of the testator to Mary Jackson?” When after a short consultation, lord chief baron Smythe delivered the opinion of the judges—that all the real estate of the testator was meant by the words residue of my effects; the decree of the court of King's Bench in Westminster-hall was therefore ordered by their lordships to be affirmed. The bar was extremely crowded to hear this curious trial.—Lord Mansfield did not attend, as it was an appeal from his judgment. The house adjourned to Friday the 13th, the day of the fast.

In the house of commons the report was made from the committee to whom it was referred, to consider of the petition of the city of London, praying for a bill to enable them to purchase the right of the several tolls levied for the navigation of the Thames westward of London, and to lay on one general toll in the room of them; when a bill was ordered in accordingly. The speaker objected to a passage in the report, which required explanation, but as none of the city members were present, it will be investigated in the course of the progress of the bill.

Received the report from the committee of supply, granting an aid to discharge the exchequer quer bills made out in consequence of the vote of credit of last session. Agreed to it.

Some private bills were read, and accounts received from the public offices; after which the house adjourned to Thursday the 12th.

Thursday 12.

The House of Commons met pursuant to their last adjournment, when a new writ was ordered to be issued out for the election of a Burgess to serve in parliament, in the room of Hugh, commonly called Earl Percy, who is called up to the house of peers by the title of Baron Percy, devolved to him by the death of his mother, the late duchess of Northumberland.

A bill for the better regulating the poor of the parish of Ilington,* and for building a workhouse, was read a third time, and passed.

Two or three petitions for road bills and inclosures were received, read, and bills ordered to be prepared accordingly.

A petition was presented from the York Buildings Water-works company, praying for a bill to enable them to sell part of their estates in Scotland, in order to enable them to pay off their small bond creditors. This petition was referred to a committee to consider of the contents, and report the same to the house.

Between two and three o'clock the house rose, having adjourned till to-morrow at one o'clock, being the time they expect to return from St. Margaret's church.

Friday 13.

The lord chancellor, the archbishop of Canterbury, with five other spiritual lords, and six temporal, attended divine service at Westminster-Abbey, in conformity to his Majesty's proclamation for solemnizing a general fast. Prayers did not begin till past twelve o'clock; and though the doors were not opened till near that time, the concourse of people was astonishing. An excellent sermon was preached by the bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, from the following words: "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies." Psalm 119. v. 59. The drift of his lordship's discourse was, to shew the necessity of a national reformation and repentance, to be begun by every individual, and extended to the body politic. He painted the corruption and degeneracy of the times in strong colours, not sparing persons in high life, and informing his auditors, that it was his duty to speak plain, and the truth, on such a solemn occasion. Excessive luxury, a spirit of gaming and suicide, his lordship described as sins characteristic of our time; and recommended it as the most probable means of insuring success to the measures of government for restoring peace and union to the British empire, that every individual should shew his zeal for his country, and his public spirit, by a strict regard to the moral duties, and to the precepts of christianity; always remembering the great example set before us by the piety and virtues of our supreme governor, who had called upon us to join with him in supplicating the divine blessing and protection for himself and all his subjects. A most solemn anthem was sung after the sermon, chiefly by two boys, with exquisite voices. The words "Hear my prayer, O Lord, and let my cry come unto thee, &c."

The lords afterwards assembled in the chamber of parliament, and ordered thanks to be given to the bishop, and his lordship to be desired to print his sermon. The house then adjourned to Thursday, Jan. 23.

The duke of Montague, the earl of Dartmouth and lord Weymouth attended the chancellor in state to the abbey.

Divine service began at St. Margaret's at a quarter after eleven. The speaker, and about fifty members of the house of commons, among whom were lord North, lord George Germaine, sir Gey Cooper, and several other gentlemen in office attended, and the largest congregation ever known in that church. The sermon was preached by the rev. Dr. John Butler, L. L. D. archdeacon of Surry, on these words: "And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the Lord, be nigh unto the Lord our God day and night, that he maintain the cause of his servant, and the cause of his people Israel at all times, as the matter shall require." 1 Kings, chap. viii. v. 59. It is a part of the prayer of Solomon on the dedication of the temple.

The chief scope of the discourse was, to point out the situations in which nations might with propriety adopt the supplication of Solomon, which the doctor observed was found on a principle which distinguished the Jewish religion at the time, from all other religions then known or practised in the world; a belief in and dependance on Providence. This being likewise a principle of the christian religion, he took occasion to enlarge on the propriety of the appointed day of humiliation, with sentiments of genuine piety, humanity, and benevolence; he deplored the unhappy defection of the Americans, and lamented the necessity this country had been under to oblige them to return to the allegiance they owe to his Majesty, and to a natural and constitutional dependance on its legislative authority. Though he delineated us a people far gone in sensuality and other national vices, he gave us comfort from the amiable virtues which render us still pre-eminent over other nations; such as public charity, liberality, benevolence, candour, and moderation. Upon the whole, he seemed to think, that we have many righteous men amongst us, whose piety, public spirit, and moral rectitude of conduct might save these kingdoms from the fate of those which have been ruined by their vices.—The restoration of peace and tranquillity he considered as at no great distance, and the supplication of the day, followed by a proper application of the use of such solemn acts of devotion, in our future conduct, as the properest means to procure the interposition of Providence in our favour.

The speaker went in state to St. Margaret's church, and afterwards to the house of commons, where lord North moved, that the thanks of the house be given to doctor Butler for his sermon, and that he be desired to print it. It was also voted that lord North should present the order of the house to doctor Butler.

Adjourned to Tuesday, Jan. 21.

A Poem, sacred to the Glorious Memory of our late most gracious Sovereign Lord King George I. Inscribed to the Right Honourable George Dodington, Esq; by Richard Savage, Son of the late Earl Rivers, not printed in his Works.

LET gaudy Mirth, to the blithe Carrol-long,
In loose light-meatur'd Numbers dance along;

Thou, Muse, no flow'ry Fancies here display,
Nor warble with the chearful Lark thy Lay.
In the dark Cypress Grove, or moss-grown Cell,
Where dreary Ravens haunt, would Sorrow dwell!

Where Ghosts, that shun the Day, come sweeping by,

Or fix in melancholy Frenzy's Eye;
Yet now the turns her Flight to Scenes of State,
Where Wealth and Grandeur weep the Frowns of Fate!

Wealth, Want, Rank, Power, here each alike
partakes,

As the Shrub bends, the lofty Cedar shakes;
To her wide View is no Contract on known,
Tis Youth, 'tis Age, the Cottage and the Throne.

O Exclamation! lend thy sad Relief!
O Dodington! indulge the righteous Grief!
Distant, I've long beheld, in Thee, transcend
The Poet, Patron, Patriot, and the Friend.
Thou, who must live in Truth's remotest Page,
Form'd to delight, and dignify an Age;
Whose Words, whose Manners, and whose Mind declare,

Each Grace, each Moral, and each Muse are there;
Accept this Poet's, void of venal Aim,
Made sacred by thy Royal Master's Name.

But why, O Muse! are longful Hours thy Choice?

Loft is the Life, whose Glory lifts thy Voice!
George is no more! As at the doleful sound
Of the last Trump, all Nature feels the Wound!
Each private, each distinguish'd Virtue bleeds!
And what but Lamentation long succeeds!
Where wilt thou then for apt Allusions fly?
What Eloquence can throbbing Grief supply?

Late, golden Pleasures urg'd their shining Way,
With George they flourish'd, and with George decay!

Now dusky Woes, o'er varied Scenes extend, Groans rise! Rocks echo! and chill Damps descend!

Grief strikes my View with ever-weeping Eyes,
At her wan Look, each lively Fancy dies.

In fear, in hope, dull rest, or ruffling Storms,
Thus Woe belets us, tho' in various Forms!
That dire Event of Youth's ungovern'd Rage!
That dear-bought Knowledge to declining Age!
In Want, in Scorn, it haunts an humble State,
'Tis Care, 'tis Envy, to perplex the Great!
A Kingdom's Curse, it in Dissension brings;
Or heavier falls, when falls the best of Kings!
Worth it exalts, when aiming to debase;
'Tis Virtue's Triumph, or 'tis Guilt's Disgrace!
It humbles Life, yet dignifies our End;
Reflection's Torment, yet Reflection's Friend!
Then let the Muse her meaning Notes resume,
And pay due Sorrows to the hallow'd Tomb.

Was there a Glory, yet to Greatness known,
That not in Brunswick's Soul superior shone?
Ill fare the Man, who, rob'd in purple Pride,
To wounded Worth has no Relief apply'd!

February, 1777.

Benevolence makes Pow'r to Prudence dear,
When Pity weeps, what Pearl excels the Tear?
When not one Virtue glows to bless Mankind,
When Pride's cold Influence petrifies the Mind;
Let the Prince blaze with Gems!—in Wisdom's View,

An Emblem of the Rock, where once they grew!
Yet Springs gush out, to prove ev'n Rocks can flow

In Rills refreshful to the Vales below.

Why has he pow'r, and why no heart to cheer,
Unseeing Eyes, and Ears that will not hear?
Swift, as his Blis, shall his light Name decay,
Who, self-indulgent, sports his Hours away!
But, Oh!—what Love, what Honour shall he claim,

Whose Joy is Bounty, and whose Gift is Fame?
He (truly Great!) his useful Pow'r refines,
By him discover'd Worth exalted shines;
Exalted Worth, th' enlivening Art, repeats,
And draws new Virtues from obscure Retreats:
He, as the first, creative Influence, prais'd,
Smiles o'er the Beings, which his Bounty rais'd.
Such Dodington, thy Royal Master shin'd,
Such Thou, thy Image of thy Monarch's Mind,

Nations were ballanc'd by his guardian Skill,
Like the pois'd Planets by th' all-powerful Will.
Mark the Swede succour'd! mark the aspiring C Z A R!

Check'd are his hopes, and shun'd the naval War.
By George the Austrian Eagle learns to tower,
While the proud Turk shakes conscious of her Power;

But when her Menace braves our envied Shore,
She trembles at the British Lyon's Roar;
Trembles, tho' aided by the Force of Spain,
And India's Wealth!—'gainst Brunswick, All how vain?

He bade thy Honour, Albion, foremost shine!
His was the Care, unmeasur'd Bliss was Thine!
Yet oft against his virtue faction rose!
An angel, if thy monarch, would have foes.

Come charity, first-born of virtue's line!
Come meek-ey'd mercy from the seat divin-!
Pure temperance, mist e'er of a tranquil mind,
By whom each sensual passion stands confin'd!
Fix'd fortitude, from whom fierce peril flies!
By whom (O soul of action!) empires rise!
Fair justice, author of a godlike reign!
Peace, plenty, liberty adorn thy train!
Lov'd prudence! queen of virtues! blissful dame!

Parent, and guide of each illustrious aim!
From whose firm step confusion turns in flight,
That shapeless spawn of anarchy and night!
From whom kind harmony deduc'd her race,
Then order, all in one united grace!
And thou religion! truest, heav'nly friend!
Whom these alone establish, these defend!
Assemble to the wailing muse's call!

Weep o'er the clay-cold breast, that held you all!
O death, rouse all those terrors to thy aid,
Weak sea, or swift valour would evade!
Whether foul pestilence in dire array,
Red war, or pale-ey'd famine point your way,
What can y u more than Kingdoms overthrow?
What aim'd you less, when Brunswick felt the blow?

But mark!—Augustus, still above thy Rage,
Steps forth to give a second golden Age.

Ye great Plantagenets! distinguish'd race!
 One greater meets you on celestial 'pace.
 And thou, Nassau the fairest noblest name!
 Ev'n mid the blest, superior still thy flame!
 Behold an equal now! — how dear th' embrace!
 Oh, fly! — present him at the throne of grace!
 'Tis done! — he's crown'd with a resplendent
 joy,

Which age shall never dim, nor time destroy.

See! — from yon golden cloud, amidst a band
 Of angel-pow'rs, once patriots of the land,
 Soft-lesning o'er Britannia's weeping isle,
 And shedding sweet, a fond, paternal smile;
 Pointing, the visionary seraph cries,
 Suspend thy tears! behold a Sov'reign rise,
 Thy second George! whose reign shall soon disclose

All that mine gave, and heav'n, in grace bestows.

He said, — again, with majesty refin'd,
 Up-wing'd to realms of bliss, th' ætherial mind.

Extempore, by the late Lord Chesterfield, on seeing Mr. Garrick's improvements at his seat at Hampton, 1764.

HERE drooping science shall revive once
 more,
 And laurels bloom, where ivy creep'd before;
 Arts long neglected all around shall smile,
 And exil'd muses hover o'er the pile.

On the Birth of a Son.

HAIL, happy father, of a blooming boy,
 Hail, gentle mother, of a new born joy,
 Long may thy presence, in the world's great stage,
 Strengthen the morals of his ripening age;
 Long may his ear, be ready to obey,
 The tender dictates, of parental sway;
 And if the gods, still partial to the breast,
 That harbours virtue, and each heav'nly guest,
 Shall please to call thee to abodes above,
 Rewarding honour, and religious love,
 May thy perfections, in thy son arise,
 Demanding wonder, from admiring eyes.

Charity display'd, or a Paraphrase on Cor. i. 13.

WOULD heav'n, to whom such mighty gifts belong,
 Favour a mortal with an angel's tongue,
 Could every speech the various nations know,
 Glide from my lips in one continued flow,
 If Charity, of graces first and best,
 With gen'rous warmth my bosom never blest,
 The tinkling cymbal or the sounding brass,
 Would be the noisy types of what I was.

Could I the myst'ries of religion scan,
 Or open all futurity to man;
 Or did the beams of science in me shine,
 Tho' ne'er so bright enliv'ning or divine;
 Or could my faith into the ocean roll
 The rooted rock, or shake the distant pole;
 If Charity her virtues ne'er impart,
 Vain all my power, my knowledge, and my art.

Should I profusely waste my golden store,
 To cloath the naked, and to feed the poor;
 Nay should I give my body to the flame,
 And bear the honour of a martyr's name;
 If sacred Charity my breast disown,
 Vain my compassion, suffering and renown.

Fair Charity enjoys a patient mind,
 For ever lovely, and for ever kind:
 Let others boast their riches and their state,
 She smiles content, nor wishes to be great;
 In her no proud, no empty looks are seen,
 Mild are her words, becoming is her mien;
 Cheerful she sacrifices health and ease,
 To raise the low, or give the troubled peace:
 No wrath is ever known to change her brow;
 Nor meditates the evil for her foe.
 If wickedness in any shape appears,
 Her melting eyes, her sorrow speaks in tears;
 And when religion spreads her happy sway,
 She gives her sorrow, and her tears away:
 She hopes, she trusts, she suffers, she believes,
 And cheerfully the greatest wrongs receives.

Faith is intended for no state but this.
 And Hope ere long shall be dissolv'd in bliss
 But Charity hereafter shall obtain
 Divinest honours, and an endless reign.

Liſburne, Feb. 13.

Epitaph by David Garrick, Esq.

NEAR this PLACE
 Are deposited the Remains of PAUL WHITEHEAD, Esq;
 Who was born January 25, 1710,

And died December 30, 1774,

Aged 65.

HERE lies a man misfortune could not bend,
 Prais'd as a poet, honour'd as a friend!
 Tho' his youth kindled with the love of fame,
 Within his bosom glow'd a brighter flame!
 Whene'er his friends with sharp afflictions bled,
 And from the wounded deer the head was fled,
 Whitehead stood forth — the healing * balm
 apply'd,
 Nor quitted their distresses — 'till he died!

A Hymn of King David to the Deity. Psalm 8.

LORD! how illustrious is thy name,
 Whose power both heaven and earth proclaim!
 When I the heavens, thy fabrick see,
 The moon and stars dispos'd by thee;
 O what is man, or his frail race,
 That thou shouldst such a shadow grace,
 Next to thy angels most renown'd,
 With majesty and glory crown'd!
 All that on dales and mountains feed,
 All that the wood or desert breed,
 What e'er thro' airy region flies,
 Or swims in deep or stormy seas,
 Thou all beneath his feet hath laid,
 King of thy whole creation made.
 Lord! how illustrious is thy name
 Whose power both heaven and earth proclaim!

Q. X.

Liſburne, Feb. 13.

Paris,

Paris, December 13.

DR. FRANKLIN is arrived here in two days from Nantz, where he landed.

The privateer that brought him over has taken two English prizes, valued at 80,000 livres. It is not certain what has brought the doctor here, but it is conjectured, to carry on a negotiation with us. However, there are persons, who pretend to be in the secret, that say, the doctor cannot agree with the chief members of the congress, and that he has preferred France for a residence till the disputes between England and America are settled.

The doctor keeps himself very reserved in his conversation.

Petersburgh, Dec. 14. Whilst government is endeavouring on one hand to open a passage towards North America, and on the other to open a communication with Japan, they do not neglect to facilitate the commerce between the different provinces of the state, by means of highways and canals.—The empress is likewise endeavouring to form a more direct communication with China, in order to prevent the expence and danger of caravans; for which purpose her Imperial majesty planted colonies in the large track of country between the towns of Uderisk and Selenisk, on the frontiers of China. Ever since the year 1766 a colony of Polish farmers have begun to people those vast deserts; but the views of our august sovereign have been perverted by the tyranny exercised by the magistrates in those parts, who imagining themselves at too great a distance from court to be noticed, were guilty of great cruelty and exactions, which tended to subvert the project of the empress, who being informed of these proceedings, has given orders for the state of those colonies to be laid before her, and the conduct of the governors to be examined into, and those who have abused the power which was given them to be severely punished.

Frankfort, Dec. 14. Our letters from Italy mention, that the commissaries appointed by the court of Vienna, and the republic of Venice, to terminate the differences which subsisted about the limits of Morlachia, have concluded a convention, of which the following are the heads:

First, That this agreement shall not be called a treaty, but a convention: secondly, that the cultivated land, of which the Venetians are in possession, shall be declared the lawful property of the republic: thirdly, that the land between Mount Stolla, and Mount Pestock, shall be divided into two equal portions, and a line drawn between them to Mount Billbach, which line shall be the frontiers between the Venetian states, and the territories of the court of Vienna. Fourthly, the pillars shall be erected along the said line to mark the confines, which are mutually agreed upon. Fifthly, that measures shall be taken amicably to determine all contests and disputes which may arise between the neighbouring countries, with regard to the jurisdiction of the confines, without their being obliged to have recourse to the respective sovereigns.

Madrid, Dec. 17. The court has received the agreeable news that our squadron under Don Félix de Taxada, which was cruising at the entrance of the Straights of Gibraltar, has destroyed two Algerine chebecs, one of 36 gun, and the other of 24, together with a Portuguese packet, which these corsairs had taken. This expedition cost us only twenty-one wounds, but according to advice from the camp at Melille, they have lost 116 men.

Don Timothy Eleanan, principal physician to the department of the marine, first introduced into Galicia, in the year 1771, and has inoculated 115 children in the city of Corogul, among others the sons of Don Emanuel de Flores, vice-roy of Santa Fe, and those of Don Joseph Anthony d'Armina, intendant of Galicia, besides many other persons, all of whom have done very well.

Cherbourg, Dec. 19. The basin of our port, which we have been many years cleaning, is at last effected, and on Dec. 14, the first ship entered it, amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants.

Rome, Dec. 21. On Thursday last, the 19th inst. the following important discovery was made at the castle of St. Angelo: a heavy shower of rain made it necessary for a constable to go and cover the cannon, when he found that the pieces which stood facing the street di Borgo Nuovo, were put out of their places, and a bundle lay laid near them. This made him suspect something, and he immediately went and gave information; upon which the officers of the guards examined the guns, and found three of them loaded with chain shot; they then examined the powder, and found it was not the same as is commonly used at the Castle of St. Angelo, but of the very best quality, such as is used in hunting; besides which, these pieces were raised six palms from the ground, and so placed as to command the whole breadth of the street di Borgo Nuovo, through which the pope passes every evening, at seven, when he goes to the Vatican. Besides these, five more pieces were found loaded with a single ball each; these cannon pointed directly to the Vatican palace.

Such an unexpected piece of treachery has spread an universal alarm, and has affected the pope very much, as it is plain that this stroke was intended either against him, or to put the whole city into confusion.—The pope has returned thanks to Heaven for the preservation of this city from the success of this villainous design, and the government are using their utmost endeavours to discover the persons concerned in this affair; several people have been taken up, and confined in the castle, but no discovery has yet been made.

Vienna, Dec. 25. The last advices from Constantinople, so far from confirming the accounts of the success of the Ottoman arms against the Persians, say, on the contrary, that the latter have taken Kerkeh, and that they are on the way to Bagdat; that the Porte has itself obliged to send a Seader, and a large sum of money, to Erzerum. These advices add, that the Multi Salih Mehemed Zane is deposed, and replaced by Hindi Molla Mehemet Elissad Efendi, and that it is thought the Grand Vizir will soon be dismissed.

The court being more and more sensible of the advantages arising from the spirit of toleration, has published an edict, which gives permission to all Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Jacobites, and other subjects of the Ottoman empire to trade in the Archduchy of Austria, provided they settle there with their families.

Antwerp, Dec. 30. The Baron Proli, whose father was formerly at the head of the East-India company, which was at Ostend, went some time ago from hence to Vienna, in hopes of obtaining the approbation of his Imperial majesty, to the projects he had drawn up with regard to the navigation between Trieste and Ostend, and we are assured he has obtained an exclusive grant, by virtue of which, all the goods and merchandize of the produce of the Hereditary Countries, which he may import from Trieste by Ostend, into the Catholic Netherlands, shall at their entry pay less duty than the production of other countries imported by other people, and that he shall enjoy the same favour with regard to the productions of the Catholic Netherlands, which he shall import into the estates of his Imperial and royal apostolic majesty in Germany, by Ostend to Trieste. In consequence of this grant, we hear that the Baron Proli is building a magazine at Bruges.

Vienna, Jan. 2. A courier is arrived from our ambassador at Russia with advice, that the troops of the Emperors of Russia have seized on Precop, in the Crimea, not with any intention of the Emperors to extend the limits of her empire, but to oblige the Porte to evacuate Saman, conformable to the late treaty of peace; and for the Turks refusing to admit two Russian vessels to pass the Dardanelles, because they were armed ships, during the late war, but now actually equipped as trading ships.

Hague, Jan. 7. Some letters from Naples mention, that the Marquis de Tanucci, formerly first minister to the King of the Two Sicilies, is confined in a strong tower for the remainder of his life, and that nobody may see him except some of his nearest relations, and those only in the presence of the officer, in whose custody he is, who is changed every eight days.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE

London, January 8.

IN the course of last year 4773 ships have been cleared at the custom-house here, of which 4343 were coastwise, and 430 for foreign parts, being, upon the whole, 270 less than last year.

9. The French ambassador has been given to understand, that any French ships coming out of the American ports, that are taken by his majesty's cruizers, will be deemed lawful prizes, and condemned as such: the Dutch have had the same caution.

An allegation, pleaded by Miss Butterfield, against the validity of the will of the late Mr. Scawen, was debated before the right worshipful Sir George Hay, in the ecclesiastical court in Doctors-Commons. After a variety of learned arguments on both sides the question, the doctor allowed the plea; the lady, therefore, will be admitted to prove the truth of it in a future proceeding. The plea urged on the part of Miss Butterfield is, that "the last will was found in error."

11. The last advices from Leghorn mention, that the English merchants settled in that city, have raised among themselves the sum of 9000 sequins, which they have embarked on board the Squadron of Admiral Mann, and sent to England, as a fee-gift to government, to be employed in carrying on the war against the Americans. We suppose it is intended to be added to the subscriptions raised in England for the benefit of the soldiers serving in America, and their wives and families.

Orders are given to the commissioners and dock-keepers of the different dock-yards, to make a strict inspection into the state of the different stores under their care, and to give in returns by the first of next month.

12. From the complaints received of some of the provisions furnished from Corke, government intended to have killed and tasted all their provisions under their own eye, either in London, or at the several victualling ports of Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth; but upon examination, it was found that the difference of price was so great as to make it a considerable object. Additional inspectors therefore are added at Corke, and every precaution taken to prevent the packing of any bad meat at that place.

The Pomona, owing to her unparalleled swiftness in sailing, has taken more prizes from the Americans than most others of his majesty's ships. She was taken from the French last war, and was repaired at Woolwich before her last going to sea. Another, on the same construction, is building with all possible dispatch, in that dock-yard. Her name is the Ceres, and will be launched early in the spring.

13. The quakers of Philadelphia have published a resolution against the congress dollars, by which their currency is stopped in that province.

Portsmouth, Jan. 15. The Betsey, Loftus, is arrived in seven weeks from St. Augustine, laden with skins and indigo for London. In this ship came passengers Governor Tonyn's lady and family, together with Captain James, of the Augustine packet, who has brought home the mail, his own ship having sprung a leak, and sunk in St. Augustine-River. About sixty leagues off Bermudas, Captain Loftus fell in with a Provincial schooner, laden with rice and indigo, called the Port au Prince, which he took without opposition, and put on board her his mate and ten men, with orders to proceed to the first port in England, since which she is arrived at Plymouth. About a fortnight before Captain Loftus sailed, Doctor Mackay came down from the Cherokee and Creek Indians, and brought an account of their having had an engagement with the Provincials at the Potatoe-Hills, on the back settlements of Carolina, whom they had defeated, and had brought several scalps to St. Augustine. When Captain Loftus sailed, Captain Brown also, with 150 regulars and 3000 Indians, was then upon his march to Georgia, to reduce that province, for which service two armed sloops were taken into the king's service to assist the troops, after which they were to proceed towards Charles-Town. We are informed by Captain Loftus, that Governor Tonyn has taken great pains to fortify St. Augustine.

16. This morning as the workmen were removing a quantity of hemp out of his majesty's ware-house in the dock-yard, they found a machine amongst the hemp, consisting of a large piece of wood, hollowed out and filled with combustibles; it was covered over with tin, full of holes to admit the air, and a tube and match at each end, which appeared to have been set on fire; but providentially went out of itself before it had done any damage.

Mr. Foote and Mr. Colman met, agreeable to their appointment, and executed the articles which confirm the latter's purchase of the former's patent, together with all his property in the Hay-market theatre. By the terms of the demise, Mr. Colman obliges himself to pay Mr. Foote a clear annuity, amounting to 1600*l.* per annum, to be paid by four quarterly payments; he also stipulates to pay Mr. Foote a handsome sum for the right of acting all his unpublished pieces. Mr. Foote, on the other hand, agrees to put Mr. Colman in immediate possession of the premises, and engages not only to give him the rental of all such dramatic writings as he may hereafter produce, but also to perform on no other stage in London, but that of the Hay-market theatre.

17.] There now appears every day in the bill of entry of goods exported and imported, a very uncommon article of tobacco returned from Holland and other foreign parts, where it had been formerly shipped to. From this very new and extraordinary manœuvre in the mercantile way, it is evident that the price of tobacco is so much advanced at home, that it has become more advantageous to have it returned, than landed and consumed abroad at the foreign port; or else the foreign merchants, finding they can have a supply of tobacco cheaper from other ports than from those of Great Britain, have turned this discovery to account, by buying up all the English tobacco, and returning it to Great Britain, to reap the advantage of the present advanced price, well knowing, that according to the present laws of this country, calculated for the encouragement of its colonies, no foreign tobacco can be imported into this kingdom, but from its colonies. It is also evident, that Great Britain suffers by her attachment to her colonies, and having restricted her trade in so very important an article of commerce.

20. It having been represented to his majesty, that Sunday morning last, the 19th instant about seven o'clock, a dreadful fire broke out in a range of warehouses in a place called Quay-lane, in the city of Bristol, whereby the whole range of warehouses, with the several dwelling-houses adjoining, and opposite to the said warehouses, were immediately in flames: and as there is the greatest reason to suspect, that the said warehouses were wilfully and maliciously set on fire by some evil-disposed persons, at present unknown, his majesty's pardon, for the discovering and bringing to justice the persons concerned in the above atrocious offence, is promised to any one of the said offenders (except the person or persons who actually set fire to the said warehouses) who shall discover his or her accomplice or accomplices in the said offence. And his majesty also promises a reward of one thousand pounds unto, or amongst, such person or persons who shall, within three months from this time, discover any of the offenders. A reward of five hundred guineas is likewise offered by the merchants of Bristol and the Union insurers for the same purpose.

Belfast, Jan. 31.

ON Tuesday last a fox was unkenelled by the Hollywood hounds, 23 minutes after ten in the morning; they ran him, without ever being two minutes at a time at fault, until 35 minutes after five in the evening, when he with great difficulty reached his earth; the hounds being so near him for the last hour, that he was frequently seen by the gentlemen then in, to steal out at one corner of a field as the hounds came in at the other. From the lowest calculation of the extent of country he went over, he must have ran considerably more than 50 mile.

Limerick, Feb. 3. It will be a matter of surprise to many, but it is a truth, that can be vouched by many respectable persons, that the wife of Michael Barry of Mullagh in the west of the county Clare, was last week delivered of twins, and she is 62 years of age.

Glennell, Feb. 8. Last Sunday-night the following persons attempted making their escape out of our country jail, charged with the following crimes, viz. Maurice, John, and Henry Mallowney, who were sentenced to be hanged at our last assizes, but afterwards pardoned on condition of settling in his majesty's service; Thomas Magrath, for a robbery in the county of Waterford; Pat. Hickey, Thomas Cole, Thomas Reynolds, and Mary Butler, vagabonds, and for uttering base coin; Malachy and Richard Dwyer, for having carnal knowledge of Elinor Ryan, and robbing her; Daniel Bryan, for sheep-stealing; Dennis Manning, a rioter, and suspected for robbery; and Wm. Heffernan, a horse-stealer. They were confined in two dungeons adjacent to each other, the doors of which were broke with an iron crow, two lock-saws, and three files, which implements were found on them by the janor, and a party of the 32d regiment of foot, who prevented their further progress.

Last Monday night, a set of villains, dressed in white uniforms, with their faces blackened, and armed with guns, pistols, and swords, broke into the house of a poor dairywoman, who lives within a mile of the town of Tipperary, and robbed her of about 30s. being all the cash she had. They then beat her in a cruel manner, in order to extort a confession of her having more money; but she luckily happened to give her master, a few days before, what money she had.

Near Earlstown, in the Queen's county, there is an extraordinary tree, of many years standing, and a great size; up through it there is a spring, which appears at the top of the trunk, where the main branches go off; it is as large as an ordinary well at the mouth, and a thorn tree grows up through it.

Newry, Feb. 10. We have the pleasure to acquaint the public, that Mr. Clements has made an agreement with lord Charlemont to raise coals, for 21 years, in any part of his estate, in Armagh and Tyrone, giving his lordship three pence per ton. — Mr. Clements was so far this day as 75 feet down in a shaft, and then bored, and, five feet more, came to the slate and rack that covers the coals, and hopes in ten days, or thereabouts, to raise coals.

DUBLIN.

A Post Assembly was held at the Tholsel, when it was unanimously resolved, That an humble address of thanks be presented to his majesty for his royal bounty of 2000l. towards building the new gaol of Newgate. Said address was accordingly presented to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant (to be transmitted to Great Britain) by the Right. Hon. the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and Common Council.

We have the pleasure to inform the public, that capt. Beasley received a letter from Sir John Fielding, acquainting him that Patrick Plunket, who was concerned in the murder of Howel, his bailiff, along with Connor, was apprehended at Penzance in Cornwall, and committed to prison at Launceston; the vigilance of this magistrate, in his unwearied endeavours in getting apprehended these two notorious villains for the murder of his faithful constable, and the many other acts of his vigilance, deserve the public thanks.

A broken-winded horse had been kept in a field where there was not any water, except in the bottom of an old lime-kiln, and had recovered his wind, the owner ordered a stable shovel full of quick-lime to be put into a stable bucket of water; the quick lime to be renewed every five or six days, and the water to be poured off and a bucket of it to be given every day to a broken-winded coach horse, aged about eighteen years, who had almost a constant cough. The horse was watered with water thus prepared for about five weeks, and kept in the stable; he is now perfectly recovered in his wind, and free from cough.

The noted Robber, Patrick M'Cann, who lately broke out of Trim Goal, was apprehended in a Public-house in Church-street, by Messrs. Hamilton, Lynch, Farrel, and some other Persons, and lodged in Newgate. This Villain is charged with many Robberies, among which are those of Mason Gerrard, Esq; Mr. Horner of Finglafs, and breaking open the House of Mr. Drought in the Queen's County, and is the Person who has this considerable Time past infested the North Road. There were in Company with him at the Time he was taken, Lynden, the Revenue Officer, who was lately under Sentence of Death for Robbery, but received his Majesty's Pardon, and one Egan, a Cadet Servant.

The Evening of the same Day a Person, who says his Name is Young, went to visit the above Villain in Newgate, where he was detained on Suspicion of being an Accomplice.

We are informed that the above noted Offender (M'Cann) was detected in the following Manner: On the Morning of Thursday last, he purchased a Horse from Connor, in whose House he was taken, and gave in Payment a Bank Note of Messrs. Finley and Co. out of which he was to get Change; Connor not being acquainted with the Nature of Bank Notes, went to a Neighbour, for his advice respecting the Sufficiency of the Payment, who told him it was very good, but desired he might immediately tender it at the Bank; he accordingly took his Friend's Advice, and carried it to the Bank, where it was no sooner seen than known to be one of those taken out of the House of Mr. Horner of Finglafs, as mentioned in the Papers some time ago; Connor was interrogated how he came by the Note; he at once declared he had it from a Man to whom he sold a Horse, and was at that instant at his House in Church-street, waiting for the Change: This not appearing a sufficient justification, it was thought advisable to detain him until the Truth of what he had said would be confirmed; accordingly a Messenger was dispatched to Connor's House, and his Wife informed of the Particulars of her Husband's Detainer; she very prudently desired no Notice should be made till she could procure some friendly Assistance, and instantly sent to Mr. Farrel, who lived opposite to her; he on hearing the Name of the Person who passed the Note, recollected him to be a Villain who was lately mentioned in the public Papers of having committed so many daring offences in the Environs of this City; and, with the Aid of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Lynch, &c. instantly secured him, and lodged him in Newgate as above-mentioned. M'Cann being very strongly armed, obliged them to pay every Attention to his Security, which his Companions took the Advantage of, and made their Escape.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For M A R C H, 1777.

In our next will be given an authentic Account of the Life and Writings of the Rev. Dr. Dodd, now under Sentence of Death for Forgery.

To the Editors of the Hibernian Magazine.

As the success of the Society established in London for recovering persons apparently dead by drowning, must give pleasure to every person of real humanity, I make no doubt but you will readily insert in your Magazine, which is an useful Repository of Intelligence, the following account of some late proceedings of that society. The number of cases of recovery which have already been communicated to the society by their medical assistants and correspondents is eighty-six.

HUMANE SOCIETY.

A General court of the directors of the Humane Society, instituted for the recovery of persons apparently drowned, was held at the London coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, on Wednesday the 11th of Dec. last, in order to transact the necessary business of the society; to hear the several cases of recovery that have occurred since their last meeting; and to present, in a March, 1777.

public manner, the honorary medals which had been voted in a preceding general court to several gentlemen, for their eminent services in the establishment of this society, in the management of its affairs, and the promotion of its interests. The president, Mr. Alderman Bull, being absent on account of the ill state of his health, the Rev. Mr. Joseph Towers, one of the earliest and most active members of this society, and a gentleman whose abilities and eloquence are well known, was appointed chairman for the evening.

After the minutes of the preceding committee had been read and confirmed, the particulars were also read of thirty-four persons, who have been of late happily recovered by the use of the means directed by the society, and under its sanction, and for which premiums have been given. The chairman then proceeded, agreeable to the desire of the society, to present the medals which had been voted.

The first medal was inscribed to the president, Mr. alderman Bull; but as the society

ciety were informed, that his ill state of health had obliged him to retire into the country, they voted, that a committee should be appointed to wait on him with it, on his return to town. The chairman observed, that it was the desire of the society to shew every mark of respect to their worthy president; to which he was intitled, by his zeal to promote this humane institution. He subscribed towards it in the most liberal manner, and by accepting of the office of its president, when he was in the high state of chief magistrate of London, as well as by his uniform attention to its interest, he had rendered it essential service.

The chairman addressed separately the several gentlemen to whom medals had been voted, who were all present, excepting Mr. Bull. But he previously made some remarks relative to the nature, design, and success of the society, and to the reasons which had induced them to cause medals to be struck. He observed, that as the medical assistants took no fee or reward for their attendance and services to those persons who were in such unhappy situations as came within the plan of the institution, it had from the first been publicly declared to be the design of the society, when their finances would admit of it, to give silver medals to those gentlemen who had been instrumental in recovering such persons as were taken out of the water without any apparent signs of life. By the generosity of the public, the society were now enabled to give such medals; and they had previously resolved, that from the die which had been prepared by that very able artist, Mr. Lewis Pingo, four medals should be struck in gold, for the president, the treasurer, and the two institutors of the society, Dr. Cogan and Mr. Hawes.

Mr. Towers also observed, that the custom of striking medals, to perpetuate the memory of events of importance, was of very antient origin; and that if medals had been frequently struck, to preserve the memory of the oppressors and plunderers of mankind, of those who, under the denomination of heroes and conquerors, have laid waste provinces, and depopulated kingdoms, it must be surely much more rational, that medals should be struck in honour of the benefactors of mankind, and of an institution intended for the preservation of the human species.

The second gold medal was voted to James Horsfall, Esq; F. R. S. treasurer of the society: and in his address to this gentleman, the chairman observed, that the diligence and fidelity with which he had discharged the office of treasurer, without any salary or reward, the time and application which he had employed in paying the premiums of the society, and examining into the many cases that had been brought before him, and his constant attention to the interests of so humane an institution, justly entitled him to the honorary medal which was then presented him.

To Dr. Cogan, Mr. Towers observed, that he was one of the first who had excited the attention of the inhabitants of this kingdom, to the practicability of recovering persons who were apparently dead by drowning, by his translation of the Amsterdam Memoirs upon this subject. He was also entitled to very honourable remembrance for having, with Mr. Hawes, exerted his endeavours towards the establishment of so excellent an institution in this country; and had likewise a just claim to the thanks of the Society, for the care, attention, diligence, and judgment, which he had displayed in preparing and digesting the reports of the society.

To Mr. Hawes, the chairman remarked, that to the well-known humanity of his disposition, and to that activity of benevolence for which he was so remarkable, this society in a great degree owed its origin.

The reasonableness and utility of an institution of this kind had been very clearly seen by Hawes, and therefore he had laboured to promote it with a diligence and an ardor that would ever do him honour. Indeed, before the establishment of this society, he had publicly advertised rewards for notice to be brought him of any persons in such situations, within a reasonable distance from his own habitation, as those who are now the objects of this institution; which was the strongest demonstration of his solicitude to promote so benevolent a design; and that afterwards, by joining with his worthy colleague Dr. Cogan, in adopting the necessary measures for establishing the present institution, he had performed a real service to his country.

With respect to Dr. Watkinson, the chairman observed, that it was this gentleman to whom the society were indebted for the ingenious device of the medal, which had been struck for the use of the society, and which had been generally and justly admired by persons of taste, for its propriety and elegant simplicity. The society, therefore thought proper to present the Doctor with a silver medal, as an acknowledgment for this service, as well as for the zeal he had always shewn to promote the interests of this humane institution.

To the several addresses of the chairman, suitable replies were made by the gentlemen to whom the medals were presented. The meeting was a very respectable one; and the gentlemen present expressed their satisfaction

satisfaction at the very prosperous situation of an institution that had been established on the most benevolent principles; which has already been the means of saving many lives; and in consequence of which there is the utmost reason to believe great numbers more will be preserved.

At the above meeting; several silver medals were voted, and ordered to be prepared against the next general court, to be presented to those medical assistants, who have been happily the instruments of restoring life.

To the Proprietors of the Hibernian Magazine.

I Send you a short memoir relating to Dr. Threlkeld; only known in the literary world, among the naturalists, as the author of a book relating to the Plants of Ireland. You would not have been troubled with it, but that I know of no account of this writer before extant. It fell into my hands, by purchasing a copy of his book, being written in the blank leaves thereof, at the beginning. And as it bears the marks of authenticity, I judged it worth preserving in your repository: if you think the same, you will give it a place in your next Magazine.

“Caleb Threlkeld was born the 31st of May, 1676, at Keiberg in the parish of Kirkoswald in Cumberland. In the year 1698 he commenced master of arts in the university of Glasgow, and soon after settled at Low Huddlescough, near the place of his birth, in the character of a dissenting minister. In this situation he made a considerable progress in the study of physic, and contracted a love for plants; in so much, that in 1712 he took a doctor's degree in medicine at Edinburgh; and the next spring, having a strait income, and a large family, he removed to Dublin; and settled there in both characters, as a divine, and a physician. His family consisting of a wife and three sons, and as many daughters, did not follow till more than a year had elapsed; when finding himself likely to succeed, he sent for them over. His practice in medicine soon increased, so far as to enable him to drop his other character entirely, and devote himself wholly to physic; but he died after a short sickness of a violent fever, at his house in Mark's-alley, Francis-street, April 28, 1728, and was buried in the new burial ground belonging to St. Patrick's near Kevin's-street, to which place his obsequies were attended, by a set of children educated by a society of gentlemen. And my memorialist adds, that he was much regretted by the poor to whom he had been both as a man, and as a physician, a kind benefactor.”

It does not appear that Dr. Threlkeld published any other book than that referred to, though he had meditated a history of plants in general. His work bears the following title: “Synopsis Stirpium Hibernicarum alphabetice dispositarum, five Commentatio de Plantis indigenis, præsertim Dubliniensibus, instituta; being a short treatise of native plants, especially such as grow spontaneously in the vicinity of Dublin, with their Latin, English, and Irish names, and an abridgment of their virtues, with several new discoveries, with an appendix of observations made upon plants by Dr. Molyneux, physician to the State in Ireland, the first essay of this kind in the kingdom of Ireland; auctore Caleb Threlkeld, M. D. Dublin 1727.” P. 262. 12mo.

The author, after a dedication of his book to the archbishop of Armagh, and a preface, which, though written in a quaint stile, proves him to be a man of considerable erudition, enumerates all the plants he had observed in the environs of Dublin, by giving, first, the old Latin name, generally from Caspar Bauhine's Pinax; then the English name, and afterwards the Irish; subjoining, wherever it seems necessary, some account of the quality of the plant, and its use in medicine and economy. Besides these he has here and there thrown in a curious observation: to instance, under the word Betula, he says, “The Irish grammarians remark that all the names of the Irish letters are names of trees.”

Dr. Threlkeld appears to have been better acquainted with the history of plants than with plants themselves; as he seems not to have studied them in a systematick way. He incurred the displeasure of the late learned professor Dr. Dillenius, by having thrown out, in this book, three or four criticisms upon that gentleman's introduction of new names into Botany, in his edition of Mr. Ray's Synopsis; published about three years before, and also on his multiplying the species of plants unnecessarily. Dr. Dillenius did not think him an antagonist formidable enough to retort upon; which is not to be wondered at, as few people in England had at that time studied the genera of plants with the attention which this learned Professor had bestowed upon them. The Professor, in a letter that he wrote to a friend soon after the publication of Threlkeld's book, informs him that there is but one plant therein mentioned that was not known to grow there before; this is the Pseudo-stachys Alpina C. B. (Stachys Alpina of Linnaeus;) and that, he says, from the observation of another man.

This book of Dr. Threlkeld's is now become somewhat scarce; and as it is not of importance enough to be republished, it is hoped this short account thereof, and that of the author, may be acceptable to those who are curious in these matters.

Extracts from a Letter upon Education, written by the King of Prussia, and lately published at Berlin.

I Consider with a partial affection the youth springing up under our eyes; it is the succeeding generation entrusted to the guardianship of the present race; it is a new human species that advances to replace that now existing; they are the hopes and reviving powers of the state, and being well directed will perpetuate its splendor and glory. I think, as you, that a wife prince should engage his whole attention to form in his states useful and virtuous citizens. It is not just at present that I have examined the education given to youth in the different states throughout Europe. The number of illustrious men produced in the Grecian and Roman commonwealths, have prejudiced me greatly in favour of the discipline of the ancients, and I have persuaded myself that in pursuing their method, a nation might be formed to have purer morals and more virtue than what the moderns now possess. The education given to the nobility is certainly reprehensible from one end of Europe to the other. In this country the young noblemen receive the first tincture at home, the second at the public schools and universities, the third they take of themselves; and this last is the worst, because they are too soon left at full liberty to manage their own affairs. In the father's house, the blind affection of parents spares the correction necessary for their children, the mothers especially (let us only just hint it) governing with no small degree of despotism their husbands, know no other principles of education, than an unlimited indulgence. Children are left in the hands of servants, who flatter them, who deprave them, instilling into their young minds pernicious maxims, maxims that make but too strong shoots by the indelible impressions they make upon their yet tender brains. The Mentor chosen to be set over them is commonly some young candidate for divinity or the law, a sort of persons who stand in the greatest need of being instructed themselves as to the manners of the world—Under such skilful teachers our young Telemachus learns his catechism, Latin, and by all means a little geography, and French, as being used in common conversation. Father and mother both applaud this master-piece they have brought into the world, and for fear lest any vexation should impair the health of this phoenix, nobody must dare to find fault with him. At ten or twelve years old the noble youth is sent to the academy, of which there is no want here. There are several, as the Joachim academy, the New Academy of Berlin, the academy of the Dome of Brandenbourg, and that of Closter-berg at Magdeburg; they are provided with skilful professors. The only reproach to be alledged against them is perhaps, that they apply themselves solely to crowd the memories of their scholars, that they do not accustom them to think by themselves, that their judgments are not early enough cultivated, that they neglect to give them an elevation of soul, and to inspire them with noble and virtuous sentiments.

The young man has no sooner set his foot upon the threshold of the academy for the last time, than he forgets every thing that he had learnt, because he only proposed to himself, to repeat by heart his lessons to the pedagogue, and having no further occasion for those lessons, their traces are obliterated by new ideas, and by forgetfulness. The time thus lost at schools, I attribute it rather to a fault in the education, than to the giddiness of youth. Why is not the scholar taught to comprehend, that the confinement which study requires will turn out to his greatest advantage? Why do they not exercise his judgment, not by teaching him the dialectical forms, but by drawing him on to reason by himself? This would be the means of making him conceive, that it is useful for him not to forget what he has but just learned.

On leaving school, the fathers send their sons either to the university, or place them in the army, or obtain some civil employment for them, or they are sent down to their estates.

The self-interest and indolence of the professors (at universities) hinder knowledge and science from being so abundantly diffused as could be wished; they read their public lectures, and all is done, not caring in the least how negligently they fulfil their duty. If the students require of them some private hours, they are not granted but at an exorbitant price, which hinders those who are not rich from profiting by a public foundation instituted to instruct and enlighten all those sent thither for the acquisition of knowledge. Another fault, the lads themselves never compose any discourses, themes, or disputations; it is some hackney'd scholar who writes them, and a student with a sufficient memory, oftentimes without any talent, cheaply gains the applause. Is it not encouraging youth in idleness and sloth, to teach them to do nothing? Man requires a laborious education; let him compose to be corrected; and let him vary his work, that, by dint of making him do it over again, he may be accustomed to think with regularity, and to express himself with accuracy; instead of following this method, all the time that the memory of a young man is exercised, his judgment grows rusty: several branches of knowledge may be heaped up in the brain, but the discernment necessary to render them useful, fails. Another error—it is the bad choice of authors which are explained.

In medicine, it is right to begin with Hippocrates and Galen, and to trace the history of this science (if science it is) down to our time; but instead of adopting the system of Hoffman, or of any other obscure physician, why not comment the excellent works of Boerhaave, who seems to have carried human knowledge on the subject of diseases and remedies as far as the extent of our understandings will permit? It is the same with astronomy and geometry. It is useful to run over all the systems from Ptolemy down to Newton, but good sense determines to fix upon the latter, which is brought the nearest to perfection, and is the most free from errors. Some time ago, there lived at Hall a great man, born to teach philosophy. You easily guess it is the celebrated Thomasius, whom I mean. Let them but follow his method and teach in the same manner. Besides, the universities have not so much as, it is believed, cleansed philosophy from pedantic rust. Indeed the quiddities of Aristotle, and the universalities a parte rei are no longer taught, Doctissimus, Sapientissimus Wolfius has taken place in our time of that antient school hero, and the doctrine of Monades and re-established harmony is substituted in their stead, a system as absurd and unintelligible as that which is forsaken, neither more nor less: The professors repeat this jargon of nonsense, because the expressions are familiar to them and that it is the custom of the place to be Wolfian. One day I fell into company with one of these philosophers, the most infatuated of the Monadists. I ventured humbly to ask him if he had never cast his eyes on the writings of Locke? I have read every thing, answered he snappishly. I know, Sir, said I, that you are paid to know every thing, but what think you of this same Locke? He is an English author, replied our man, roughly. English as he is, added I, he appears to me very sagacious, he never quits the clue of experience to guide him through the darkness of metaphysics; he is prudent, he is intelligible, which is a great merit in a metaphysician, and I strongly believe that he may be in the right. At these words our professor became red in the face, his looks and gestures betrayed an anger not altogether so philosophical, and he maintained with a more exalted tone of voice, "That as every country had its peculiar climate, every state should have its national philosopher." I replied that truth was of every country, and it were to be wished that an abundance of true knowledge should come among us, was such even smuggled in without consent of the universities. After all, geometrical studies are not so much cultivated in Germany as in the other nations of Europe. It is pretended that the Germans have not geometrical beads, which certainly is false, the names of Leibnitz and Copernicus prove the contrary. The true cause is, that these studies do not meet with due encouragement, and above all, that there are wanting skilful professors to teach them.

It is imagined an inheritance is well provided vided for, by an accumulation of riches, by fixing of children in some posts, or procuring them some employments: these are attentions worthy the care of good parents, but they should not stop here, the principal point is to form their manners and to ripen their judgments. I have often been ready to cry out, Fathers of families! love your children; you are invited to it, but be it with a rational love that tends to their real good! Look upon these young creatures whom you have seen brought to life as a sacred deposit entrusted to you by Providence; your reason should serve to support them in all the debility of their childish years and failings. They are ignorant of the world, you have the knowledge of it; you are then obliged to form them such, as their own advantage, that of their family and of society in general, may require. I repeat it, regulate their morals, impress them with virtuous sentiments, elevate their souls, render them laborious, cultivate their understanding with care, use them to reflect upon their actions, teach them to be wise and circumspect, to love frugality and simplicity. Then in dying you may safely trust your inheritance to their good conduct, it will be well administered, and your family will keep up its lustre—otherwise dissipation and irregularities will begin the moment that your eyes are closed, and was it possible for you to rise out of your grave thirty years after your decease, you would see your fine estates in the possession of strangers. I must always go back to the laws of the Greeks and Romans. I believe that, like them, we should not let our children be of age before they had attained their twenty-sixth year, that fathers might in some manner be responsible for their behaviour. Without doubt then young people would not be abandoned to the pernicious company of servants; without doubt then their teachers and preceptors would be chosen with greater discernment, as they are entrusted with that which should be reckoned the most precious blessing; without doubt then the father himself would reprimand his son, and when needful would punish him in order to dissolve every vicious practice at its first appearance. Add to this, some changes necessary in the public schools and universities; that, in loading the memory of youth, the exercising of their reason, which is the chief point to gain, be not neglected; that, their course of studies being finished, young people should be immediately under their parents eye, lest their good manners should be corrupted by evil communication; for the first examples, whether good or bad, make such strong impressions upon youth, as to determine invariably ever after their character; and this is one of those dangerous rocks to be avoided; hence proceed a spirit of inapplication, debauchery, gaming, and every other vice.

The duty of fathers extends yet further; they should, I believe, make use of all their discernment to rate with great precision their childrens talents, in order to place them out suitable to their genius. Whatever variety of knowledge they might have acquired, it will be none too much for any employments they are to embrace: The profession of arms demands a very general acquaintance with arts and sciences. It is an assertion equally ridiculous as impertinent, in the mouths of many people, My son will not apply to his studies, at all events he will do for a soldier. Yes, for a foot soldier; but not for an officer qualified to raise himself to some one of the highest ranks in the army, the only point however he should constantly tend toward. It happens again, that another inconvenience arises from the eagerness and impatience of fathers; they wish their childrens fortunes to be made too rapidly; they will have them pass without difficulty from the subaltern posts to the most exalted, before that experience has improved their capacity and ripened their judgment.

The law, the finances, politics, the army (and we may add the navy) may adorn an illustrious birth: But all would be lost in a state, if birth was to prevail over merit; so erroneous, so absurd a principle, that a government that would adopt it would soon prove the fatal consequences; it cannot be said, but that there are exceptions to the rule, and that there are found premature subjects, whose merit and talents solicit in their favour; it were only to be wished that such examples were more frequent; in short, I am persuaded that mankind may be moulded at will. Certain it is, that numbers of great men in all branches were produced among the Greeks and Romans, and that they owed them to that manly mode of education which their laws had established. And if these examples should appear too far fetched back, let us consider the labours of Czar Peter I. who attained to polish a nation entirely barbarous; why therefore should not some faults in education be corrected amidst a civilized people? It is falsely believed that arts and sciences soften the manners of a nation. Every thing that can illumine the mind, every thing that can dilate the sphere of knowledge, elevates, but does not degrade the soul; but this is not the case in this nation: Would to Heaven that science was better cherished. It is the education which which is faulty; that once amended, and we shall see morals, virtues, and talents revive. Our effeminate youth have often made me think, What would Arminius say, that bold defender of Germania, if he could see the posterity of those Suevi and Sennones degenerated, depraved, and rendered contemptible? But what would not the Great Elector Frederick William say? he who, chief of a hardy people, with his war-like troops, drove the Swedes from his country which they were laying waste. What is become of those families so celebrated at that time, and where are their descendants to be found? but what is to become of the families of these days? Whoever is a father should make these reflections to incite himself to fulfil all the duties which he owes to posterity.

These are in general the observations I have made in this country upon the defects of education. If you find me an enthusiast for the public welfare, I will glory in the very failing you reproach me with. In requiring a great deal of mankind, something at least may be obtained. You, who have a numerous family, wise and prudent as I know you to be, have reflected upon the duties that the character of father enjoins, and you will find in your own cogitations the source of those I have laid open to you. Among people of fashion, there scarcely can be found opportunities for communing with their own hearts; their ideas remain vague and undetermined, they even reflect less, they follow the tyranny of custom, or the torrent of fashion, which, unluckily, influences their system of education.

It is no wonder therefore that the consequences which follow such erroneous principles should be exactly answerable thereto. What indignation do I feel at the great pains which are taken in this severe climate to bring pine apples and other exotic plants to maturity, and of the little attention paid towards the prosperity of the human species? Let them say whatever they please, yet one man is more precious than all the pine-apples in the universe—He is the plant to be cultivated, which deserves all our cares and all our labours, because it is this plant that makes the ornament and the glory of our native country.

A Bill to empower his Majesty to secure and detain Persons charged with, or suspected of, the crime of High Treason, committed in North America, or on the High Seas, or the Crime of Piracy.

WHEREAS a rebellion and war have been openly and traitorously levied and carried on in certain of his Majesty's colonies and plantations in America, and acts of treason and piracy have been committed on the high seas, and upon the ships and goods of his majesty's subjects; and many persons have been seized and taken, who are expressly charged, or strongly suspected of such treasons and felonies, and many more such persons may be hereafter so seized and taken:

And whereas such persons have been or may be brought into this kingdom, and into other parts of his majesty's dominions; and it may be inconvenient in many such cases to proceed forthwith to the trial of such criminals, and at the same time of evil example to suffer them to go at large:

Be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That all and every person or persons, who have been or shall hereafter be seized or taken in the act of high treason, committed in any of his majesty's colonies or plantations in America, or on the high seas, or in the act of piracy, or who are or shall be charged with, or suspected of, the crime of high treason, committed in any of the said colonies, or on the high seas, or of piracy, and who have been or shall be committed, in any part of his majesty's dominions, for such crimes, or any of them, or on suspicion of such crimes, or any of them, by any magistrate having competent authority in that behalf, to the common goal, or other place of confinement, as is herein-after provided for that purpose, shall and may be thereupon secured and detained in safe custody, without bail or mainprize, until the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight; and that no judge or justice or justice of peace shall bail or try any such person or persons, without orders from his majesty's most honourable privy council, signed by six of the said privy council, until the said first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight; any law, statute, or usage to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

And whereas it may be necessary to provide for such prisoners, within this realm, some other places of confinement besides the common gaols; be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful for his majesty, by warrant under his sign manual, to appoint one or more place or places of confinement, within the realm, for the custody of such prisoners; and all and every magistrate or magistrates, having competent authority in that behalf, are hereby authorized to commit such persons as aforesaid to such place or places of confinement confinement so to be appointed, instead of the common goal.

Provided always, and be it enacted, That no offences shall be construed to be piracy within the meaning of this act, except acts of felony committed on the ships and goods of his majesty's subjects by persons on the high seas.

And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That this act shall continue and be in force until the said first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy eight, and no longer.

Anecdote of Charles II.

ROCHESTER is said to have contrived, with one of the mistresses of Charles II. the following stratagem to cure that monarch of his nocturnal rambles. The witty earl invited him out one night to a house, where he told his majesty the finest women in England were to be found. The king made no scruple to put on his usual disguise, and accompany his libertine companion. Charles, who was naturally amorous, retired immediately with one of the girls; and she, being instructed by Rochester how to behave, picked his majesty's pocket of his money and watch.

During this transaction Rochester retired. Neither the people of the house, nor even the girl, were made acquainted with the quality of the remaining visitor, nor had they the least idea of his superior rank. Charles, as soon as he found leisure, enquired for his companion; but was told that he had quitted the house, without taking leave. This he considered as an instance of disrespect: but into what new embarrassment was he thrown, when on searching his pockets, in order to discharge the reckoning, he found all his money gone!

The king was now under the necessity of asking credit, (being ashamed to mention what had happened) as the gentleman who came in with him, and who was to have paid for both, seemed not likely to return. The consequence of this request was, that his majesty was abused and laughed at. The mother albeis told him, that he had often been served such dirty tricks, and would not suffer him to stir till the bill was paid; and instantly ordered one of her bullies to take charge of him. Thus stood the hope of the three kingdoms, the prisoner of a bawd, and the life of the British monarch, at the mercy of a ruffian, amenable to public justice, and employed in offices of the meanest debauchery!

After many altercations, Charles was under the necessity of offering the old crone a valuable ring, as a pledge for her money. This expedient she also rejected, telling him she did not chuse to accept of such pledges, of which she was no judge. The king then desired that a jeweller might be sent for; but that, it was answered, was impracticable, as no such person could be supposed to be out of bed at so late an hour. After much intreaty, however, he prevailed upon his keeper to call up a jeweller, and shew him the ring; which, as soon as the tradesman inspected, he stood amazed; and enquired, with eyes anxiously fixed on the fellow, who he had got in his house. "A black-looking ugly son of a w—e," replied he, "who has got no money in his pocket, but offers to pawn his ring."

"This ring," said the jeweller, "is so immensely valuable, that only one man in the kingdom can afford to wear it, and that one is his majesty."

In order to satisfy his curiosity, relative to so extraordinary a circumstance, he accompanied the bully; and as soon as he entered the apartment, he fell on his knees, and respectfully presented the ring to his majesty. The bawd and the bully, finding the high quality of their guest, were both thrown into the greatest consternation, and prayed for pardon in the most abject posture. The king, with the greatest good humour, forgave them; and laughing, asked the old woman, whether the ring would not "bear another bottle?"

Charles's facetiousness pleases us, even in situations disgraceful to his character; and many social souls are apt to look back with regret to this jovial reign; but every reflecting man will find reason, on comparison, to be thankful that he lives under George III. a prince, whose life is a constant lesson of morality to his subjects, and a perpetual example of the exercise of every public and private virtue.

Anecdote of Philip King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great.

A Citizen of Macedon demanding justice of Philip, who had been drinking, which caused him to dose in the chair of judgment; the citizen finding he lost his cause from the king's inattention, cried out in an audible voice, I appeal, which roused the haughty monarch, who sternly replied, to whom do you appeal. The honest man, not in the least abashed, added, from you asleep, to you awake. Though the words were very pungent, yet Philip thought proper to inform himself more fully of the affair, and finding that he had right on his side, he revoked the sentence, and gave him his suit by way of appeal.

Terra-Firma.

PORTO BELLO stands in $9^{\circ} 34' 35''$ north latitude, close to the sea, on the declivity of a mountain, which surrounds the whole harbour. This harbour is so large, deep, and safe, that Columbus, who first discovered it, gave it the name of Porto Bello, or the Fine Harbour, which is now commonly used to denote the town. The number of the houses is about one hundred and thirty, most of them of wood, large and spacious, forming one long street along the strand, with other smaller ones crossing it. The governor of the town is always a gentleman of the army, subordinate to the president of Panama; but having under him the commandants of the forts that defend the harbour. At the east end of the town, on the road to Panama, is a place called Guinea, where all the negroes of both sexes, whether slaves or free, have their habitations. This place is very much crowded when the galleons are here, most of the inhabitants of the town quitting their houses entirely, for the sake of letting them; while others content themselves with a small part, in order to make money of the rest. The Mulattoes, and other poor families also, remove either to Guinea or to cottages already erected near it, or built on the occasion. Great numbers of artificers likewise, who flock to Porto Bello from Panama, to work at their respective callings during the fair, lodge in Guinea for cheapness. Towards the sea, in a large tract between the town and Gloria castle, barracks are erected, in most of which the ships crews keep stalls of sweetmeats, and other kinds of eatables, brought from Spain; but at the conclusion of the fair, when the ships put to sea, all these buildings are taken down, and the town returns to its former tranquillity and emptiness. In 1739, the harbour was defended by a castle and two forts, which were all demolished by admiral Vernon, who, with six ships only, made himself master of this port. The country about Porto Bello is over-run with mountains and impenetrable forests, except a few vallies, in which are some scattered farms. Among the mountains that surround the harbour, one distinguished by the name of Capiro, and its superior loftiness, is a sort of barometer to the country, by foretelling every change of the weather. Its top is always covered with clouds, of a density and darkness seldom seen in those of the atmosphere. When these clouds thicken, encrease their blackness, and sink below their usual station, it is a sure sign of a tempest; while, on the other hand, their clearness and ascent as certainly indicate the approach of fair weather. These changes are very sudden and frequent here. The summit of the mountain is scarce ever clear from clouds, and when it happens, it is only, as it were, for an instant. Except in the fair, all the inhabitants of Porto Bello do not amount to three thousand, half of whom are Indians, Mulattoes, or Negroes; the Spaniards of any substance not chusing to reside in a place so extremely unhealthy, and fatal even to the lives of the natives. Ulloa tells us, that the cattle brought hither from Panama or Carthagena, lose their flesh so fast in the best pasture, as to become scarce eatable: he assures us also, that neither horses nor asses are bred here. The heat, indeed, is excessive, and the torrents of rain so dreadful, sudden, and impetuous, that one not accustomed to them would imagine a second deluge was coming. These torrents also are accompanied with frightful tempests of thunder and lightning, the awfulness of the scene being heightened by the repercussions from the mountains, and the shrieks and howlings of multitudes of monkeys of all kinds, which inhabit the surrounding woods.

Fresh water pours down in streams from the mountains, some running without the town, and others crossing it. These waters are very light and digestive; qualities which in other countries would be very valuable, but are here pernicious, producing dysenteries, which the patient very seldom survives. However, these rivulets, formed into reservoirs, serve the purposes of bathing, which is here found to be very conducive to health.

As the forests almost border on the houses of the town, tygers often make incursions into the streets during the night, carrying off fowls, dogs, and other domestic animals, and sometimes even children have fallen a prey to them. Besides the snares usually laid for them, the negroes and mulattoes, who fell wood in the forests of the mountains, are very dextrous in encountering them; and some, for a slender reward, even seek them in their retreats.

The town of Porto Bello, which is thinly inhabited by reason of its noxious air, the scarcity of provisions, and the barrenness of the soil, becomes, after the arrival of the galleons, one of the most populous towns in the world. He who had seen it quite empty, and every place wearing a melancholy aspect, would be filled with astonishment, to see the bustling multitudes in the time of the fair, when every house is crowded, the squares and streets encumbered with bales of merchandize, and chests of gold and silver, the harbour full of ships and vessels, some loaded with provisions from Carthagena, and others with the goods of Peru, as cocoa, Jesuits bark, Vicuna wool, and Bezoar stones; and this town, at all other times detested for its deliterious qualities, becomes the staple of the riches of the Old and New World, and the scene of one of the most considerable branches of trade in the universe. Formerly the fair was limited to no particular time; but as a long stay in such a sickly place extremely affected the health of the traders, his catholic majesty transmitted an order that the fair should not last above forty days, and that, if in that time the merchants could not agree on their rates, those of Spain should be allowed to carry their goods up the country to Peru; and accordingly, the commodore of the galleons has orders to re-embark them, and return to Carthagena; but otherwise, by virtue of a compact between the merchants of both kingdoms, and ratified by the king, no Spanish trader is to send his goods, on his own account, beyond Porto Bello.—The English were formerly allowed to send a ship annually to this fair, which turned to great account; and, whilst the assiento contract subsisted, either with the English or the French, one of their principal factories was at Porto Bello.

In the year 1695, the Scotch parliament passed an act for creating a company to trade to Africa, and the East and West-Indies, under his majesty's letters patent, which the company obtained. The design was so plausible that it induced several English and Hamburg merchants to engage deeply in the adventure, in consequence of which divers ships were equipped, and a body of forces raised to plant a colony on or near the isthmus of Darien. The territory which the adventurers took possession of was near the north-west point of the gulph. Here they built the fortress of New Edinburgh, and denominated the surrounding country Caledonia. The Indian princes being then at war with the Spaniards, joyfully received the Scotch, in hopes of being able to expel the Spaniards by their assistance. For some time the new colony flourished extremely; but their good fortune soon met with a check from the jealousy of the English East-India company, and the complaints of the court of Madrid. The former complained of a violation of their charter, and the latter of a breach of the treaties subsisting between Spain and Great Britain. Accordingly the English parliament interposed, and addressed king William to vacate the charter granted to the Scotch company.—The Scotch defended their rights with all the arguments of reason and justice; but the influence of their adversaries was too powerful, and all measures, the most iniquitous, base, and tyrannical, were taken to ruin the infant settlement.—The Hamburgers were prevailed on to withdraw their subscriptions; the merchants of London were threatened with the ministerial displeasure, and orders were sent to the English plantations to deny the colonists all provisions and assistance. In a word, such was the power of faction, and private interest, that the nation was robbed of the benefit of one of the most useful establishments ever projected, the advantages of which must have appeared in the most sensible manner, whenever a rupture happened between England and Spain; for while the Isthmus remained in the possession of the colony, the Spanish treasures must have been detained in America.

The province of Carthagena is neither rich, fertile, nor populous; it produces indeed some valuable gums, balms, and drugs, but no mines of gold and silver, nor any great quantity of corn or cattle.

Carthagena, the metropolis of the province, is not only a fine opulent city, but a strong fortress, situate in $10^{\circ} 25' 48'' \frac{1}{2}$ north latitude, and in the longitude of $30^{\circ} 19' 36''$ from the peak of Teneriffe, on a sandy island, called a peninsula by most writers. The harbour lies between the island and the main, and the entrance is at the south-west; the other passage, called Bocca-Chica, having been filled up by order from the court of Spain, since the unsuccessful attack made upon the town in the year 1741, by admiral Vernon and general Wentworth. To the eastward the town has a communication, by means of a wooden bridge, with a large suburb, called Xexemani, built on another island, which is joined to the continent by a bridge of the same materials. The fortifications both of the city and suburbs are constructed in the modern fashion, and built with free-stone; and, in time of peace, the garrison consists of ten companies of seventy-seven men each, besides the militia. The city and suburbs are well laid out, the streets straight, broad, uniform, and well paved. The houses are built of stone or brick, with balconies or lattices of wood, which is more durable in this climate than iron, the latter being soon corroded by the acrimonious quality of the nitrous atmosphere.—The city is populous, though most of the inhabitants are the descendants of the Indian tribes; but is by no means opulent, compared with many other cities in South-America, the country producing no mines; and even the money for paying the salaries of the governor and inferior officers, and the garrison, coming from Santa Fe and Quito.

of Lurgan, and sixty-four N. W. of Dublin. It consists of two streets, the upper or northern street, containing about fifty cabbins, some of brick, others of stone, disposed in two rows, one on each side of the street, at the extremity of which is a very fine seat belonging to Richard Magennis, Esq; one side of the lower or southern street, is formed by a row of neat thatched houses, and the other by a fine mansion house, belonging to Mr. Warring, landlord of the town; before this house is a green, with walks planted with elms, where the villagers have permission to take their Sunday's walk; at one end of the green stands a handsome little church; the demesne behind Mr. Warring's house is beautiful; the several entrances into the village are planted at each side with tall elms, which, together with the neat little cabbins make a very agreeable appearance not to be equalled in any other village in this country; the whole number of houses in this town may be about one hundred.

From Warrington we rode five miles to Dromore, staid a night there in but indifferent lodgings, next morning we rode about a mile to a fine seat called Gillhall, belonging to Mr. Magill, brother to lady Clanwilliam; this house is a large and grand building, finely situated in a beautiful park: in the neighbourhood of this seat, the houses of inferior gentry and linen-draper, which are very numerous, well built, and promiscuously dispersed among the hills and groves of firr, and other ever greens, have a pleasing effect to the eye.

We rode about two miles along the river Lagan, and leaving that river north of us, we descended to the rude bank of the rapid river Bann; this river, rolling over a number of weirs, the rugged and steep banks on each side, with innumerable houses and bleach-greens, has a very grand and beautiful appearance; but the bridges over this river, being most of them of timber, are very bad and dangerous to be passed over by strangers.

We rode about three miles along a precipice, by the Bann-side, and came into Gilford, a village containing about forty or fifty houses, and the seat of Sir Richard Johnson, bart. Having crossed the Bann, and Newry canal, and rode about three miles, we came to Tanderagee, a small ill built market town, but situated in a most beautiful country.

We rode from hence about ten miles, through a well planted part of the county of Armagh, and at length arrived at Newry, from whence we set out, having travelled about one hundred miles.

Good Nature: A Character often usurped.

A Man must have been some time conversant in the world, and have got a key to the fashionable language, to be able to form a true opinion of men from the character given them, and would find himself extremely deceived if he was to take them literally, and according to the common acceptance of the English language.

For example, one would not at first imagine, that a man of nice and jealous honour meant only a deliberate murderer; a careful man, a thief; a very honest fellow meant nothing but a drunken one; or a very good sort of a man, or a very good natured man, meant either nothing at all, or a fool. Yet this is the true state of the case, as daily experience shews us.

I shall now more particularly analyse the fashionable character of the good natured or very good sort of man, and shew what is, or what ought to be meant by it, which are at present two different things.

One of the principal duties in moral, and one of the most valuable qualities in social life, is Good Nature, by which I mean, and mean only, a strong benevolence to mankind, according to the several relations to them: a desire of relieving their distresses, and of promoting their good, and a willingness to employ our labour, our money, our credit for that purpose.—This I take to be the real definition of good nature, arising from sentiment and reflection, and founded on that principle of morality and christianity, of doing as we would be done by; but how unlike is this to that which generally usurps its name!—how lavishly is that character bestowed, how commonly enjoyed, and how little merited!—It is now universal, and seems to have absorbed all others: one hardly hears any thing else said of any body, and one hardly knows any body of whom it is not said. Every man is the best natured man alive, the panegyrick is indiscriminate, is made and returned like bows, and upon as slight knowledge and acquaintance.—The truth is, it is the staple commodity that knaves and fools traffick in and export, and as it is their own manufacture, whatever returns it makes them, are clear gains. But if pride and self-love did not take off their goods, they would soon leave off their trade.

Common decency and good manners are commonly mistaken for, or miscalled good nature, especially by the ladies; every man at his first introduction into company, seems to be a very good sort of a man, for in polite mouths these terms are synonymous.—I would gladly know by what he seems so? or why he may not as well seem to be an excellent Chymist, or an eminent Mathematician?—And what harmony of features, what complexion, what size denote a very good natured man? But indeed how should he seem otherwise, upon so slight an acquaintance, unless he was a madman into the bargain? This extempore commendation means no more of a man, than it does of a house-dog, which is that he does not bite in the day-time.—It is therefore as unreasonable to bestow this character on this unknown person, as it would be unjust to give him a contrary one; and he may surely wait contented with that of a decent man, till he is known to deserve a better.

Good humour is always mistaken for good nature; a man who talks much and cheerfully laughs, readily takes the tone of the company, be it what it will, is without enquiry, pronounced a good natured man. Though I have known very many of those good humoured men lay out their whole stock of good humour to great advantage, in mixed company, and reserve an abundant one of ill nature to dispose of among those who depend upon them, and where they may do it with impunity.

A man of fashionable vices, is the top of fashionable good nature; if in the hours of riot or excess, he has no will of his own, but cheerfully adopts the vice of the majority of the company; if he pimps for his companions; assists them in their drunken ferapes; lends them money for their unjustifiable wants; these effects of sympathizing profligacy are ascribed to an inexhaustible fund of good nature, though at the same time he brutalizes his wife and children, beats his servants, ruins his tradesmen, and sells his country.

The protecting and screening of iniquity and guilt, especially with respect to the public, is most unjustly called good nature, though it can only proceed from a participation of the crime, a willingness to commit it, or a consciousness of equal guilt. Virtue knows no indulgence to crimes; she punishes the offence, though she pities the offender.

Fools, as fools, are by courtesy termed good natured, though perhaps none deserve the title less. Fools indeed may have a kind of good nature, that arises from weak nerves and sympathizing sensations, which are no more than an involuntary movement, and effect of self-love. The same thing will affect them with mirth and grief, according to the tone in which it is related, and their grief is always excited by some compassionate object. Thus they will hear of a murder with indifference, but if the throat be cut from ear to ear, or the dead body dragged by the hair of the head, they shudder with horror, and melt with pity: they however are the best kind of fools, the harmless, inoffensive fools, little above vegetables, but who, from intending no harm, have a right to toleration, though they have no claim to favour.—All they can ask, and all we can do for them is to say nothing at all of them.

But there is a much more dangerous sort of fools, which are the crafty, subtle, and designing fools, who rise a little out of the fool, to get a little into the knave, and who have just sense enough to know they have not sense enough to recommend them, and therefore have recourse to the appearances of good nature, which they produce on all occasions, like bills of health, to get admittance. These people have reduced good nature to a science, and proceed systematically; they have the word always in their mouths, and declare it to be the rule whereby they guide themselves, and judge others:—they pass their frivolous troublesome attentions, and perpetual offers of useless service, for perpetual offers of friendship and good nature. Their tone is soft and plaintive, their conversation stupidly stuffed with fulsome panegyrick, tender epithets, and compassionate ejaculations, such as ‘alas! poor man,’ &c.—nay their tenderness to dumb animals, and they caress dogs and birds with the tender epithets of ‘poor things,’ and ‘poor fellows.’—By these arts they impose upon the weak and superficial judging part of mankind, are reckoned the best natured sort of people in the world, and are not only well received in companies, but admitted into friendships and confidence, which they seldom fail to abuse, when it suits with their interest;—these fools are the implacable enemies of men of parts;—they hate and lament their ill nature, wish they would employ their wit better, and even thank God they have none themselves, since they find it always employed at the expense of good nature: thus endeavouring, as indeed it is their interest, to confound wit and ill nature together, as to make them seem inseparable. With these numerous knaves combine, though from different motives, and between them both, under a false and interested pretence of good nature, they have almost established a general amnesty for vice and folly.

All passionate people, without exception, are reckoned extremely good natured, no matter how often they are in a passion, and what mischief they do in it. ‘He is the best natured in the world, when he is not angry,’ is a very common expression, which in truth is no more or no less than he is good natured when he is not ill natured. But surely if these very good natured tured choleric people had any good nature at all, they would in their lucid intervals not only consent but desire to be locked up for the rest of their lives, that they might do no more mischief.

Having thus shewn what good-nature is not, and torn off that common mask of knaves and fools, I need say very little to shew what it is. Every one feels what it is, though so many misal and so few practise it. Let then that glorious character be only bestowed upon those who by acts of compassion, tenderness and generosity, really deserve it; and let not what is only their due be indiscriminately squandered and lavished among the undeserving, either from selfish views of expected returns, or want of something else to say, which is often the case. Praise is debt due to merit, and those who give it where it is not deserved are as unjust as those, who from an ostentatious generosity or private views, give away to others what is due to their lawful creditors. Virtue discriminates and speaks out, but those who universally commend despair of praise themselves upon any other terms, as those who universally blame despair of it on any terms at all.

Lisburne, Feb. 13.

Q. X.

The Character of Philip II. from Watson's History of that King.

NO character was ever drawn by different historians in more opposite colours than that of Philip; and yet, considering the length and activity of his reign, there is none which it should seem would be more easy to ascertain. From the facts recorded in the preceding history, we cannot doubt that he possessed in an eminent degree, penetration, vigilance, and a capacity for government. His eyes were continually open upon every part of his extensive dominions. He entered upon every branch of administration; watched over the conduct of his ministers with unwearied attention; and in his choice both of them and of his generals, discovered a considerable share of sagacity. He had at all times a composed and settled countenance, and never appeared to be either elated or depressed. His temper was the most imperious, and his looks and demeanour were haughty and severe; yet among his Spanish subjects, he was of easy access; listened patiently to their representations and complaints; and where his ambition and bigotry did not interfere, was generally willing to redress their grievances. When we have said thus much in his praise, we have said all that justice requires, or truth permits. It is indeed impossible to suppose he was insincere in his zeal for religion. But as his religion was of the most corrupt kind, it served to increase the natural depravity of his disposition; and not only allowed, but even prompted him to commit the most odious and shocking crimes. Although a prince in the bigoted age of Philip might be persuaded, that the interest of religion would be advanced by falsehood and persecution; yet it might be expected, that, in a virtuous prince, the sentiments of honour and humanity would, on some occasions, triumph over the dictates of superstition: but of this triumph, there occurs not a single instance in the reign of Philip; who, without hesitation, violated his most sacred obligations as often as religion afforded him a pretence; and under that pretence exercised for many years the most unrelenting cruelty, without reluctance or remorse. His ambition, which was exorbitant; his resentment, which was implacable; his arbitrary temper, which would submit to no controul; concurred with his bigoted zeal for the catholic religion, and carried the sanguinary spirit, which that religion was calculated to inspire, to a greater height in Philip, than it ever attained in any other prince of that, or of any former or succeeding age.

Some historians have distinguished this prince by the title of Philip the Prudent, and have represented him as the wisest, as well as the most religious prince, that ever filled the Spanish throne. But it is questionable, whether he be entitled to praise on account of his prudence, any more than on account of his religion. In the beginning of his reign, he discovered great caution in his military enterprises; and on some occasions, made even greater preparations than were necessary to insure success. But his ambition, his resentment, and his abhorrence of the protestants were too violent to suffer him to act conformable to the dictates of sound policy and prudence. He might have prevented the revolt of his Dutch and Flemish subjects, if, after the reformation in the Netherlands was suppressed by the dukes of Parma, he had left the reins of government in the hands of that wise prince, and had not sent so odious a tyrant as the duke of Alva to enslave them. He might, after the defeat of the prince of Orange, have riveted the chains of slavery about their necks, and gradually accustomed them to the yoke; if by engaging in too many extensive enterprises, he had not exhausted his exchequer, and made it in some measure necessary for Alva to impose the taxes of the tenth and twentieth pennies, for the maintenance of his troops. He might, through the great abilities of the duke of Parma, have again reduced the revolted provinces to obedience, if he had not conceived the wild ambition of subduing England, and acquiring the sovereignty of France. His armies in the latter part of his reign were never sufficiently numerous to execute the various enterprises which he undertook; yet they were much more numerous than he was able to support. Few years passed in which they did not mutiny for want of pay. And Philip suffered greater prejudice from the disorders and devastations which his own troops committed, than he ever received from the arms of his enemies. Against his attempts on England and France, his wisest counsellors remonstrated in the strongest terms. And prudence certainly required that, previously to any attack upon the dominions of others, he should have secured possession of his own. Yet so great was his illusion, that rather than delay the execution of those schemes which his resentment and ambition had suggested, he chose to run the risk of losing the fruits of all the victories which the duke of Parma had obtained; and having left defenceless the provinces which had submitted to his authority, he thereby afforded an opportunity to the revolted provinces, of establishing their power, on so firm a foundation, as the whole strength of the Spanish monarchy, exerted against them for more than fifty years, was unable to overturn.

The Present State of Europe.

Russia.

THIS kingdom, though in an infant state with regard to commerce, is making daily progress towards maturity; but far greater things have been expected from her than will probably take place till many years shall have been expired. Her late war with the Turks has not been attended with the advantages which at first it promised; for the climate of Turkey in Europe killed more of the Russian soldiers than fell by the swords of the Janizaries. The truth is, the Russian empire is already by far too large; and though much has been done towards civilizing some provinces, yet still the greatest part is inhabited by barbarians.

Sweden.

The change of government which, by the greatest policy, was lately brought about in Sweden, will, like all other revolutions, be attended equally with advantages and disadvantages. On the one hand, it will be happy for the people that they are delivered from the power and tyranny of the senate; on the other hand, it will probably appear in the event, that the poor Swedes have only preferred one tyrant to many; or, in other words, instead of submitting to the senate, they tamely threw themselves into the arms of their sovereign. The useful arts are now much cultivated in Sweden; their commerce is in a middle state, and the political conduct of the King gives him a very respectable footing on the theatre of Europe.

Denmark.

The character of the King of Denmark is very equivocal; but the general opinion is, that he is a very weak prince, and wholly governed by a powerful faction, in whose eyes he is no more than a cypher to fill a seat on the throne. The internal riches of Denmark are very great; the copper-mines and extensive woods give that nation great influence over the maritime states of Europe; and by the exportation of those valuable articles, vast sums of money are annually returned. Denmark, however, is rather strong by nature than by art, and the King being master of the Sound, he can at all times lay the trade of the Baltic under what restrictions he pleases.

Poland.

The large and fertile kingdom of Poland has been dyed with blood from the one extremity to the other. An aristocratical form of government is only fit for a nation of barbarians; and yet for all that, and a thousand other things that might be mentioned, the power of the great landholders has continued in Poland even to the present age, to the disgrace of humanity, the scandal of common sense, and dishonour of every thing sacred or concordant with the natural rights of mankind. Poland scarce knows to whom she owes special obedience. Russia has seized one part of her territories, Austria a second, and the King of Prussia the third; so that little is left for the people, and nothing but the name for the King. Bleeding with her wounds, she is an object of universal pity; and perhaps nothing would be more conducive towards the healing of those wounds, than a general confederacy of the people joining unanimously together, and throwing themselves under the protection of some neighbouring power.

Prussia.

The character of the King of Prussia is so well known, that little is necessary to illustrate it. To support his ambitious schemes, he has occasioned the massacre of perhaps half a million of innocent people, and although advancing in years, he seems to be still as ambitious as ever. Happily for Europe, the dominions of this restless monarch are in many parts widely separate from each other, and he has but few sea-port towns. Had the state of Europe been the same ten years ago as at present, present, much might have been expected, and much feared from this intriguing and enterprising prince; but probably those territories which he has acquired, at the expence of so much human blood, will be divided amongst different competitors.—Power acquired by violence, and supported by tyranny, is little more than an empty name.

The Empire of Germany.

Germany, as a collective body of states, must stand or fall with those nations whose cause she shall at any time espouse. Much has been said in praise of the present Emperor, and perhaps more than is really true. He has been represented as the father of his people, and yet those people are still in a state of slavery. A trifling act of benevolence, which in a private character would have been totally overlooked, has been, when exercised by this Emperor, magnified even to a miracle, which reminds us of what the poet says,

- 'Tis from high life high characters are 'drawn;
 'A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn:
 'A judge is just, a chanc'lor juster still,
 'A gownsmen learn'd, a bishop what you
 'will;
 'Wife if a minister; but if a King,
 'More wise, more just, more learn'd, more
 'ev'ry thing.'

Switzerland.

The Switzers, secured by their inaccessible mountains and lakes, enjoy that internal tranquillity to which most of the other European Nations are strangers. In a political light, Switzerland is but little considered with respect to the balance of power in Europe; but as all the men able to bear arms are brought up to military discipline, so the letting out their soldiers to serve in foreign armies becomes a considerable source of wealth.

Italy.

Italy, once the seat of arms, and still of the fine arts, has but little connexion with the present state of Europe. There are many states in Italy, but they are all less or more dependent. Venice and Genoa depend on the maritime states; Lombardy and Tuscany are inseparably connected with the House of Austria; Naples depends on Spain; the Pope is connected with all the Catholic powers; and with respect to the King of Sardinia, it is his interest at all times, when a war breaks out, to oppose the French.

Holland.

The Dutch, the most sordid, the most avaritious of all people in the world, are sure to accumulate riches at the expence of their neighbours.

In vain do the States General publish ordinances and edicts, prohibiting their subjects from giving assistance to such Powers as are at war with their allies; in vain do they order two or three small vessels to be confiscated, in order to disguise their duplicity; for it is well known, that even those in administration are secretly connected with the adventurers. It is by these practices that the Dutch acquire wealth, while other nations are contracting debts and loading their subjects with taxes.

France.

The French were reduced to such a state of poverty during the last war, that one would have naturally imagined they could not have recovered themselves during a long series of years; but such is the nature of their government, and such are their internal resources, that they are now become extremely formidable. Their schemes are deeply laid, and artfully concealed: self-interest and duplicity give life to all their undertakings. Reckless and impatient, they are continually brooding mischief; wherefore it becomes the business of such powers as are locally connected with them, to be guarded as much as possible against their schemes and machinations.

Spain.

The Spaniards are at present, what they were many years ago, namely, an indolent, proud, lazy, selfish people: possessed of great part of the riches of South America, they know not the proper use of it; instead of cultivating trade, and encouraging manufactures, by which they would become respectable, and their poor would be usefully employed, they send their money into those nations where manufactures are encouraged; and it may be justly said of them,

They starve in midst of nature's country
 curst,
 And in the loaded vineyard die with thirst.

The Court of Spain is as present directed by French councils, and it is the interest of Britain to watch their motions.

Portugal.

In a commercial light, Portugal is the natural ally of Britain; and therefore whenever the Spaniards attempt to attack that kingdom, we are under the necessity of assisting them. The disputes which have lately arisen between the Courts of Spain and Portugal, will in all probability be attended with the most serious consequences; for ever since Portugal was separated from the dominion of Spain, the latter has fought on every occasion, to regain that superiority which she had justly lost by tyranny and oppression.

Great Britain.

Great Britain, long the queen of nations, is now involved in the deepest state of distress. The national debt is arisen to an enormous height; and although the internal sources of this once flourishing island may yet extricate us out of all our difficulties, yet our wounds are deep, and it will require time as well as judgment to heal them.

The success of the war in America being still doubtful, time alone can discover when and what will be the termination of our present calamities: 'tis the ardent wish, however, of every friend to human kind, that such a reconciliation may be brought about, as will support the dignity of the crown on the one hand, and secure the rights of the people on the other.

The above short delineation of the present state of Europe, will throw considerable light on many events which may be naturally expected to take place during the present year.

Anecdotes of Sir Isaac Newton, from the Life of Dr. Pearce, Bishop of Rochester.

SUBJOINED to the life of the late bishop of Rochester, are two letters relative to Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology, which we shall here insert, as they cannot fail of being perfectly acceptable to every reader.

In the Philosophical Transactions, vol. xlviii. part i. p. 19, the learned Mr. Costard observes, that the treatise above mentioned 'never had the finishing hand of its great author;' and that 'it is well known, in what manner it came abroad.'

This occasioned bishop Pearce to write to Dr. Hunt, Hebrew professor at Oxford, desiring, that he would request the favour of Mr. Costard to inform him of the particulars, to which he alluded.

In answer to the bishop, Dr. Hunt, in a letter, dated Aug. 1, 1754, gave the following account of his interview with Mr. Costard:

'I did not see Mr. Costard till the day before yesterday. He says, "the reason why he imagined, that Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology had never received the finishing hand of its author, was, because he had been credibly informed, that, after Sir Isaac's death, fifteen copies of that work were found in his hand writing; of no one of which it could be affirmed that it was so perfect, as not to have received further corrections and improvements, if Sir Isaac himself had lived to have published it. And, as to the manner of its coming abroad, he has been informed, that it was thus: the late queen had prevailed upon

Sir Isaac, a little before his death, to let her have a sight of a copy of it. This copy her majesty happened to lend to the French Ambassador, who then resided here, and who privately employed a great number of hands, and in one night's time got it transcribed; and so sent it into his own country, where it was immediately translated into French, and animadverted on by Souciet. This alarmed Sir Isaac's executors, and put them on printing an authentic edition of it here: who might otherwise perhaps [for this Mr. Costard's stricture should seem to intimate] never have thought of publishing it at all.' Thus far Mr. Costard. 'I went, added Dr. Hunt, soon after Sir Isaac's death into Lord Macclesfield's family, where I heard much talk about that great man; and I think, I remember something of both the circumstances, which Mr. Costard mentions: I am sure I saw Souciet's book soon after it was printed.'

'Upon the receipt of this letter from the professor Dr. Hunt, the bishop wrote the following letter to him, dated August 10, 1754.

'—I am able to give a very different and a much truer account of this matter, which is as follows:

'In the year 1725, and about five months before Sir Isaac died, I had the honour of a visit from him at my house in St. Martin's church-yard, to which he walked, at his great age, from his house near Leicester-fields.

'He staid with me near two hours, and our conversation turned chiefly upon his chronology of antient kingdoms, and upon the fate which his short chronicle had met with. Among other things he said, 'that the late queen, when princess of Wales, had about the year 1720, (if I remember the year aright) sent to him, and desired him to let her see what he had written upon chronology; and that, to oblige the princess, he had drawn up his short chronicle, as thinking it in that shape the properest for her perusal; that he sent it to her, and that she, after some time, lent it to the abbe Conti, a Venetian gentleman of distinction, then in England, and frequenting her court; that the abbe, without the princess's consent (as he believed) took a copy of it: and that some time after, when he was in France, to which he went from England, a translation of it in French was published at Paris*, without Sir Isaac's approbation, or knowledge.'

NOTE.

* An English translation of the Short Chronicle, with Observations, printed at Paris in 1725, was published for J. Peele, London, in 1728.

'The princefs favoured other persons likewise with a sight of this short chronicle, who with, or perhaps without, her leave, took copies of it; for I had one, at the time of this visit, taken by me from another in the possession of the late earl of Macclesfield, then lord chancellor.

'Sir Isaac, at the same visit, informed me, 'that he had spent thirty years at intervals in reading over all the authors, or parts of authors, which could furnish him with any materials for forming a just account of the antient chronology; that he had in his reading made collections from those authors, and had, at the end of thirty years, laid together all his materials, and composed from thence his chronology of antient kingdoms; and that he had written it over several times (it appeared afterwards, I think, sixteen times) making few alterations in it, but what were for the sake of shortening it (as I gathered from his discourse) and leaving out in every later copy some of the authorities and references, upon which he had grounded his opinions.'

It is a pity, that he took so much of the same method in his chronology which he took in his Principia, &c. concealing his proofs, and leaving it to the sagacity of others to discover them. For want of these, in some instances, what he says on chronology does not sufficiently appear at present to rest upon any thing but his assertions; and the want of these was thought so great by the editors (Martin Folkes, esq; and Dr. Pellet) that they or one of them, as I have been informed, did in some places put references to authors in the margin of the work; which are printed now as Sir Isaac's references, though not his, and not perhaps always referring to the very same places, upon which he founded his assertions. I mention this the rather because two or three of the places referred to in the margin of his work have been thought, by good judges, not to speak fully to the point for which they are brought, and therefore Sir Isaac's credit in this particular has suffered with some persons: but proofs he may have had, which he chose to conceal, though what now stands in the margin in those few places may have come from another hand, and may not amount to a full proof, as it pretends to do. In the same conversation I took the liberty of desiring, that he would think of publishing his chronology of antient kingdoms in his life time; representing to him, that what had been published in France, had not done justice to him, as being at best a translation of what was an epitome only of his work, and was never designed for the press; and that there was the greater necessity (as I thought) of his publishing it, as it was unattended with any part of his proofs; and as the translator had sometimes mistaken his meaning. He was pleased to hear me with attention, and said, "that at his time of life it was too late to enter into a controversy, which might perhaps arise upon his publishing his thoughts on antient chronology, as they differed so much from the common opinion; and that he had often met with ill usage from some of the learned abroad (one or two instances of which, though they never appeared to the world, he then mentioned to me) and that he did not care to give them any further handle for repeating the same ill usage again."

Notwithstanding this I continued to press his publishing what he had prepared, and I ventured to advise him to give to the reader, in a short preface to the work, an account (the same with what he had given to me, and which I before mentioned) of the steps taken by him in the composing it; and to add, that this appeared to him to be the truth, after all his time and labour spent upon antient chronology; and that he now left his judgment upon the whole to the reader, being determined not to enter into controversy with any man about any of the particulars of it, at his time of life, when he was so far advanced in years.

To this advice he gave no positive answer: but upon his return home he told Mr. Conduit, who had married his niece, and was then at his house, "that I had been persuading him to publish his chronology, and that he believed, he should do it." Of this Mr. Conduit informed me soon after, and I found it true in what follows.

A few days before he died, I made him a visit at Kensington, where he was then for his health, and where I found Mr. Innys the bookseller with him: he withdrew as soon as I came in, and went away; and I mention this, only for confirming my account by one circumstance, which I shall mention before I conclude.

I dined with Sir Isaac on that day, and we were alone all the time of my stay with him: I found him writing over his chronology of antient kingdoms, without the help of spectacles, at the greatest distance in the room from the windows, and with a parcel of books on the table casting a shade upon his paper. Seeing this, on my entering the room, I said to him, "Sir, you seem to be writing in a place where you cannot so well see." His answer was, "a little light serves me." He then told me, "that he was preparing his chronology for the press, and that he had written the greatest part of it over again for that purpose." He read to me two or three sheets of what he had written, (about the middle, I think, of the work) on occasion of some points in chronology, which had been mentioned in our conversation. I believe, that he continued reading to me, and talking about what he had read, for near an hour, before the dinner was brought up. And one particular I well remember, viz. that, speaking of some fact, he could not recollect the name of the king, in whose reign it had happened, (and therefore he complained of his memory's beginning to fail him;) but he added immediately, that it was in such a year of such an olympiad, naming them both very exactly. A circumstance which I thought very observable, as the ready mention of such chronological dates seemed to me a greater proof of his memory's not failing him, than the naming of the king would have been.

Agreeably to this account of mine, as to Sir Isaac's intention of publishing his treatise on the chronology of antient kingdoms, the advertisement prefixed to the first edition of it in 1728, says, "that he lately revised it, and was actually preparing it for the press at the time of his death; that the short chronicle was never intended to be published by him, and therefore was not so lately corrected by him; and that the sixth chapter (of the chronology) was not copied out with the other five, which makes it doubtful, whether he intended to print it; but that being found among his papers, and evidently appearing to be a continuation of the same work, and, (as such) abridged in the short chronicle, it was thought proper to be added."

'This is the account given by the publishers, and it agrees with mine, as far as it goes: if this then be the true account, it appears, that the five first chapters of the chronology of ancient kingdoms had the finishing hand of the great author: and it is most probable, that his death only prevented his writing over the sixth chapter, and adding it to the others. It appears likewise, that Sir Isaac intended his chronology of antient kingdoms for the press, and that the executors did not take an alarm from any thing which passed in France, and thereupon cause an authentic edition of it to be printed here. What was printed abroad, was only a translation of the short chronicle: the chronology of antient kingdoms was never, I believe, out of Sir Isaac's hands till the day of his death.

'Mr. Innys I saw, (as I said before) at Sir Isaac's a few days before his death: and after his death Mr. Innys came to me, and told me, that, before I came in, Sir Isaac had been talking to him about his design of printing his chronology, and had promised him, that he should have the printing of it; but that upon his application to the executors they seemed to have no regard to what he said about such a promise, because nothing appeared for it, but his own word only. He desired therefore to know from me, whether Sir Isaac, while I was with him, had said any thing about his intention, that he should have the printing it. But as Sir Isaac had said nothing to me on that head, I could not give him the satisfaction, which he wanted; though, I believe, from Mr. Innys's discourse, that Sir Isaac had talked to him about his intention to print it, and probably had given him hopes, that he should be the printer, as he then printed all the Philosophical Transactions for the Royal Society, of which Sir Isaac was president.

'This, to the best of my remembrance, is the truth; and I remember the particulars the better for my having frequently in conversation mentioned them to my acquaintance.

I am, reverend, Sir, &c.

Aug. 10th, 1754.

'Mr. B. Sir Isaac died March 20th, 1726, in the 85th year of his age, as appears by a mourning ring given to me at his funeral which I attended.'

Memoirs of John James Heidegger.

THIS extraordinary man, though born of obscure parents, in the mountains of Switzerland, having visited the principal cities of Europe in early youth, in the humble station of a domestic, acquired a taste for elegant and refined pleasures, which, united to a strong inclination for voluptuousness, by degrees qualified him for the management of public amusements.

He accompanied a nobleman to England, in the capacity of a genteel, dependant companion; and by his sprightly, engaging conversation, and insinuating address, he soon worked himself into the good graces of our young people of fashion. The judicious remarks he made on several defects in the conduct of our operas at that time, and the hints he threw out for improving the entertainments at the King's theatre, soon established his character as a good critic; appeals were made to his judgment, and some very magnificent and elegant decorations introduced upon the stage in consequence of his advice, gave such satisfaction to his late Majesty, who was fond of operas, that upon being informed to whose taste he was indebted for these improvements, his Majesty was pleased from that time to countenance him, and he soon obtained tained the chief management of the opera-house: he then set about improving another species of diversion, not less agreeable to the King, which was the masquerade, and over these he always presided at the King's theatre. He was likewise appointed master of the revels: the nobility now caressed him so much, and had such an opinion of his taste, that all splendid and elegant entertainments given by them upon particular occasions, and all private assemblies by subscription, were submitted to his direction. From the emoluments of these several employments, he gained a regular, considerable income, amounting, it is said, in some years, to 5000*l.* which he generally spent as easily and fast as he gained it, so that it may be said he raised an income, but never a fortune; his chief gratification being eating and drinking, which he indulged to excess, at a most enormous expence.

He was a good judge in music, and composed some operas, this is all we know of his mental abilities.

As to his person, though he was tall and well made, it was uncommonly disagreeable, owing to an ugly face, scarcely human. He was the first to joke upon his own ugliness, and he once laid a wager with lord Chesterfield, that within a certain given time, his lordship would not be able to produce so hideous a face in all London; the time elapsed, Heidegger won the wager. Our readers will not be surprised to hear, that the King condescended to request him to sit for his picture; but in vain, though the nobility who were most intimate with him, and all his best patrons, urged the indecency of the refusal. This obstinacy gave rise to a very laughable adventure.

The late facetious duke of Montague, "the memorable author of the scheme of the bottle-conjurer, at the theatre in the Hay-market," gave an entertainment at the Devil tavern Temple-bar, to several of the nobility and gentry, selecting the most convivial, and a few hard drinkers, who were all in the plot. Heidegger was invited, and in a few hours after dinner, was made so dead drunk, that he was carried out of the room, and laid insensible upon a bed; a profound sleep ensued, when the late Mrs. Salmon's daughter was introduced, who took a mould from his face in plaister of Paris; from this, a mask was made; in wax, coloured to the life, and a few days before the next masquerade, at which the King promised to be present, with the countess of Yarmouth; the duke made application to Heidegger's valet de chambre, to know what suit of cloaths he was likely to wear, and then procuring a similar dress, and a person of the same stature; he gave him his instructions.

On the evening of the masquerade, as soon as his Majesty was seated, (who was always known by the conductor of the entertainment, and the officers of the court, though concealed by his dress from the company) Heidegger, as usual, ordered the music to play "God save the King," but his back was no sooner turned, than the false Heidegger ordered them to strike up, "Charley over the water,"—the whole company were instantly thunder-struck, and all the courtiers not in the plot, were thrown into a stupid consternation.—Heidegger flew to the music gallery, swore, stamped, and raved, accused the musicians of drunkenness, or of being set on, by some secret enemy, to ruin him. The King and the Countess laughed so immoderately, that they hazarded a discovery. While Heidegger staid in the gallery, God save the King was the tune, but after settling matters to rights, he retired to one of the dancing rooms, to observe if decorum was kept by the company; and then the counterfeit stepping forward, and placing himself upon the floor of the theatre, just in front of the music gallery, called out in a most audible voice, imitating Heidegger, —damned them for blockheads, had not he just told them to play Charley over the water?—a pause ensued, the musicians, who knew his character, in their turn, though him either drunk or mad; but as he continued his vociferation, Charley was played again—at this repetition of the supposed affront, some of the officers of the guards, who always attended upon these occasions, were for ascending the gallery, and kicking the musicians out; but the late Duke of Cumberland, who could hardly contain himself, interposed: the company were thrown into great confusion, shame! shame! resounded from all parts, and Heidegger once more flew in a rage to that part of the theatre facing the gallery, when the Duke of Montague artfully addressing himself to him, told him the King was in a violent passion, that his best way was to go instantly and make an apology, for certainly the music were mad, and afterwards to discharge them.

Almost at the same instant, he ordered the false Heidegger to do the same. The scene now became truly comic in the circle before the King. Heidegger had no sooner made a genteel apology, and asked pardon for the insolence of his musicians; but the false Heidegger advanced, and in a plaintive tone, cried out, "indeed, Sire, it was not my fault, but that devil's, in my likeness." Poor Heidegger turned round, stared, staggered, grew pale, and could not utter a word. The Duke then humanely whispered in his ear, the sum of the plot, and the counterfeit was ordered to take off his mask. Here ended the frolick, but Heidegger swore he would never attend any public amusement, if that witch, the wax-work woman did not break the mould, and melt down the mask before his face.

Being once at supper with a large company, when a question was debated, which nationalist of Europe had the greatest ingenuity: to the surprise of all present, he claimed that character for the Swiss, and appealed to himself for the truth of it. I was born a Swiss, said he, and came to England without a farthing, where I have found means to gain 5000*l.* a-year, and to spend it, now I defy the most able Englishman to go to Switzerland, and either to gain that income, or to spend it there in eating and drinking.—He died about the year 1754, not 1750, as inserted in a very imperfect account of him lately published.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principle and refined Improvements.

LETTER VI.

Lady Trenchard to Mr. and Mrs. Pelham.

My good Friends,

I think it would be unkind to Nancy to let her make this visit to her worthy parents, without a testimonial in her favour. Although she will, from the power of natural affection, undoubtedly receive a hearty welcome, yet you will not be able, in the short time she is to tarry with you, to make trial of her worth. Be assured that your hearts may rejoice; she hath behaved with unexceptionable modesty, fidelity, decency, and sobriety, during her abode with us. That she has a thirst after new improvements, both domestic and ingenious, and learns with ease and speed. So far as can judge, she approves herself to all my family, visitors, neighbours, and tenants, and I cannot but hope is fitting for more than common service in her day. Try her at her pen, at her needle, in cookery, in arithmetic. Sound her knowledge, scrutinize her taste and judgment, and I am persuaded you will be surprized—and join piously to bless the Giver of all good, for bestowing such a daughter on you. I am persuaded you will make a prudent use of this openness, and not keep her longer than the time allotted for her stay, as I can but ill spare her. Accept the few trifles she carries with her, as faint acknowledgments of that respect wherewith I am, &c.

LETTER VII.

Nancy Pelham to her Mother.

YOU will forgive me the omission of writing by farmer Woodruff, when I acquaint you the cause was, the illness of my lady. You know how weakly she has been for many years; added to this she lately had a severe fit of the nervous cholic, and had but just recovered from that so as to ride out once in her coach, when she was so earnest to go to meeting, notwithstanding the cold weather (as she always did, if able to ride so far) that she went too soon for her to sit so long in a cold house, which threw her into a violent pleuritic fever. The doctors almost gave her over, and you will think my concern was justly too great on this account, to allow me to write, if I could have left her long enough, but that I could not. She told me, if it would not hurt me, she had rather I should nurse her than any body; and she was so weak that it would have been cruel to let her have a stranger; Mrs. Wilson and Katy assisted me.

I have not been all night in my bed for fourteen nights, and I think all I did was short of what is due from me to so excellent and so kind a mistress. But I was, and still am, afraid I shall soon lose her; for although she is getting better of that disorder, she remains weaker than ever I saw her, and the physicians have told Madam Maslam, they expect she will fall into a fixed hectic, unless some better symptoms take place soon. She seems to be apprehensive herself, that she shall never be better, but is composed and as cheerful as any one can be in her weak state. Who can wonder at this that knows how she lives? Few I believe of her rank are equal to her in piety, goodness, and humility. Lady T——d's light shines before others, though she can't see the lustre of its rays, but calls herself an "unprofitable idle trifler." O! my dear parents, had you searched through the kingdom you could not have found a better lady for me to serve. I shall always have reason to be thankful that I have lived here, and if she dies must ever love her memory. She is a mother, a friend, a guide to me, and is always giving me counsel when I am alone with her, relating to this world and to another. Dr. Brice visits her very often, and Dr. Butler frequently; I know they both admire and love her, and no wonder.

I ought

I ought not to omit telling you, that the day I was eighteen years old, she gave me new clothes, and linen sufficient to last me a great while. Then she asked me whether I chose to go away, or live longer with her, she had rather I should stay, but if I was not quite willing, or if my parents were not so, she would not compel me (and O! my dear mother, the tears fell from her eyes). I told her that my father and mother had left it to me, and that I had rather live with her; upon this she condescended to thank me, and bid me make my terms. I told her that she had been so good to me, I chose to depend on her, rather than to have wages. Well Nancy, replied she, so you shall. She then wrote in her account book, "Nancy is entitled to two guineas a quarter, and is to have decent apparel beside." She bid me lay by the pieces of linen, and other things unmade, which she had given me that day, they would take no hurt, and I might want them when she could not do for me as now. How kind was this! how ungrateful should I be to leave her for any thing, except you, my dear parents, the mediate authors of my being, need, and require my attendance. If ever I lose the sense of my great obligations to you, and fail to render all the respect and obedience I owe you, I shall not only forfeit your love and protection, but basely throw disgrace on the worthy lady who has so often enjoined that duty, and inculcated that respect on,

Your unworthy,

Tho' I beg leave to say,

Dutiful daughter,

ANN PELHAM.

LETTER VIII.

Mrs. Butler to Mrs. Pelham.

I WAS yesterday at Trenchard Manor; your daughter desired me to write to you of her lady's illness, as she could not. Poor dear girl, she is in great affliction, and I am not surprized that she is. Gratitude, added to such high esteem, as she has of her lady, must make a heart, like Nancy's, full of feeling, when such the occasion. Lady T——d is undoubtedly in a confirmed consumption, and is greatly emaciated. A constant heaving cough, and almost unremitted fever. She doth not keep her bed, and her spirits are tolerable (a general case in her disorder) she admits her peculiar friends as before. She is so desirous to see her eldest son, that she and Madam Masham have prevailed on Sir William to recall him from his travels, which he hath done, and they expect him in three weeks. My lady was ever peculiarly fond of this son, and indeed he resembled her much in temper. Nancy is apprehensive her lady will soon drop away, but I who have seen a great deal of this disorder, rather think she will revive, when the cold weather comes on, and live till another spring; but we know little of these things. The art of physic, amidst all its improvements, is yet a blind thing, and the animal œconomy, almost a riddle to the most knowing, and they are always the freest to acknowledge this; witness the great Dr. ———, and our worthy friend Dr. ———. Lady T——d's physicians are so honest as to declare they have no hope of her recovery, tho' they do not think her end is near—nor doth the dear Lady expect to live—yet is cheerful, sedate, and steadily resigned. She is much attached to Nancy—expressed a solicitude for her future welfare with great tenderness; wished she might soon be well settled after her death; for she was afraid her pretty person would engage some rich rake to have her, and she had rather she should earn her living all her days than be unhappy in affluence, being fully satisfied, nothing beneath real virtue in a man, could attach Nancy's esteem—tho' the appearance of it might at first decoy her. How good is this in her! I reminded her of her parent's character, and the regard Nancy always paid to them, as assurances that she was not likely to make a wrong choice. She replied, 'tis just, and I'll endeavour to leave this care, but I love the girl too well to be indifferent to any thing that respects her true interest. She expressed more fear about her son, lest he should be drawn aside by company, and begged all her friends to befriend him; we all promised this; I want him to return soon to have the benefit of such an example, and such counsels, as Lady T——d's. Such the times, and such the youth of our nation; I wonder not when I see parents anxious for their children, especially persons of independent fortunes, as Sir William's son will be. I never heard any thing to the young gentleman's prejudice, and I hope for his mother's sake, as well as his own, that he is virtuous; if otherwise, and she should know it, it would finish her soon. If any great alteration appears in her case, I will give you notice as Nancy desires, who by me sends her duty to Mr. Pelham and you, which is accompanied by the best wishes of

My dear friend,

Your's affectionately,

ISABELLA BUTLER.

I believe

I believe a letter from Mr. Pelham to Lady T——d on her present prospects, would be kindly taken by her. I judge so from a hint she drop'd to Nancy. You will please to think of it.

LETTER IX.

From the Same to the Same.

LADY T——d is much revived; Nancy is quite elated; poor child, she will be disappointed I fear. Yet I know not how to murder her joy, and so have not told her my sentiments. Young Trenchard has been home two months; my lady began to revive before, but this event seemed to put new life in her. He bears a good character abroad, as I am well informed by a gentleman from Leyden, who dined with us lately, and is well respected here and in his own family; he is assiduous to please his mother, and often sits an hour or two with her in a day. I asked Nancy about him, but she says she knows very little of him—for her lady desired that when she came in, she might be left alone with him, unless he should tell her to stay; and Nancy never sits in the parlour, since her lady kept chamber, so that she has scarcely any acquaintance with him: her lady is so much better that she rides a little in fair weather, and Nancy with her, when Sir William or her son cannot conveniently, and Madam Masham or lady Holt are absent—the former comes often, and the lady was there a month.

I wonder what Nancy has done, that all the tenants are so full of her praises; but my dear Dr. tells me, that when he visits any of the poor or sick among them, they speak much of Lady T——d's goodness, and generally bring in that "sweet young woman," as they call her; by this he imagines she is lady T——d's almoner, and carries her bounties to them; and she was always very charitable and discreet in her charities: though she aims at privacy, the benefited will not always be silent, especially the humble poor: and I am apt to think 'tis best, all things considered, that they should make their gratitude vocal; it may influence others to be generous, who would not, except fame attended the action; so though the motive be ignoble, yet the deed doth good. Nancy, I dare say, will profit by such a silent example, and she can keep it secret, or her lady would not entrust her.

Dr. Brice and lady visited here the other day; both took occasion to speak of her, and seem to prize her much for a companion to their agreeable daughters. Miss Collet, Miss Harmel, and Miss Rolfe, sensible, virtuous, well read young ladies, are extremely fond of her, and tell me she is admired by all their friends who have been there in her company. Mrs. Wilson tells me she loves her like a child, she behaves so sweetly to every body in the house. Lady T——d was mightily pleased with Mr. Pelham's letter, and told Nancy she was highly favoured in such parents; that she would answer it, if ever she was able. If my lady continues better, she will let Nancy make you a visit; if not, I know you are too kind hearted to desire it.

I am, your's, &c.

LETTER X.

Mrs. Butler to Mrs. Pelham.

LADY T——d is weaker and weaker, but preserves still the same tranquil state of mind. I sat up with her a few nights past, and she spoke to me about Nancy again, "begging me, and her other friends (whom she has distinguished by the most peculiar tokens of love) to take notice of the dear girl: said she, I cannot reward her for her unremitted care, tenderness and patience, throughout the whole of a tedious confinement. Few, of her years, would brook such close attendance, comply with all the wayward humours of a sick person, and do every thing Nancy does with the like cheerfulness and alacrity. I observed to her that both you and your daughter thought yourselves already much indebted to her, and I believed grateful spirits were not apt to remember their own returns; so I begged her to be easy on this head: she replied, "Yes, I can, and I think I have repaid her for her time and work; but what shall be a meet recompence for so many waking nights! for close confinement from the sweet air to a darkened chamber; for the loss of enlivening company, so agreeable to lively people: for long absence from her father's house, and mother's tender wing? For my sake often deprived of the light of heaven (as my room hath been darkened for days together) so that she can neither improve her mind by reading and conversation, nor divert it by her ingenious works; yet she seems as content while practising all this self-denial, as though she had all the pleasures of sense"—then pausing—"No, I cannot reward her, but gracious heaven will!" I told her that the pleasures arising from the sensations of gratitude, and a self-approving mind, balanced the account; and I heartily believed Nancy and her parents were influenced by the best principles; and that, as she observed, would be fully recompensed. And I doubt not, my

my dear friend, your daughter will find it so :

For heaven rewards what heav'n approves,
And pours its blessings where it loves :
To humble souls fresh bounties flow,
And peace attends them as they go.

This was all that passed, except some very private hints about other affairs, in which Dr. Brice, Nancy, and I are joined, to execute for her. The physicians have done giving medicines or enjoining diet : in her the lamp goes out gradually, and generally it is thus in the most delicate habits, so far as my observation reaches, even in consumptive cases. A person always inclined to one, holds out longer than others—though I own they act differently even in like constitutions. 'Tis a great consolation that we have the best reason to hope Lady T——d will lose nothing by quitting the earth, but is prepared to meet the summons, whenever it comes ! though this borough, but more especially her dependants, poor tenants, and poor neighbours, and the orphan children of the poor, will have a heavy loss : You are not a stranger to her character, and I need not enlarge.

I am, &c.

LETTER XI.

From the Same to the Same.

ALTHOUGH this post brings you the heavy tidings, yet as we have long expected the sorrowful event of Lady T——d's departure from this world, I am more contented that my pen communicates the first notice. My dear Mrs. Pelham, I have lost a constant friend ; the family, the borough, yea the world, has lost a friend, for she loved, and so far as she had opportunity, did good to all. Neither party in church or state confined her well judged charity, or narrowed her noble friendship. She considered all the good (however distinguished by little names of party extract) as fellow christians, and mankind, as her fellow creatures, entitled to regard and benevolence ; she was courteous, candid, sincere, hospitable and generous. Her pity and love extended (and her arms opened with her heart) as her knowledge of the world increased, and yet she did not promiscuously throw her charities abroad to an undistinguished multitude.

The memory of Lady T——d will be embalmed by the tears of the poor, and the mournful, yet pleasurable, recollections of her acquaintance. The funeral is to be two days hence. Madam Masham was there when she died, and soon after was pleased to send for me and Mrs. Brice to assist her in some consultations—tho' such care was taken by Lady T—— that little was left to order, that concerns the females. The domestics are all put into deep mourning—but she has distinguished Nancy and Mrs. Wilton by ordering them second mourning. She has ordered every servant, even to little Cornelius, a plain mourning ring, which they are to keep as long as they live, as remembrancers of her dying charges which she sent to those whom she could not see, and spoke to those who were by. She has left mourning to Dr. Brice and lady—and to me, but instead of mourning to my doctor, the value in guineas. So considerate and kind in every thing—yet as became her she has distinguished Dr. Brice by a generous legacy.

These are all the particulars I know as yet, but Madam Masham says Nancy knows all her bequests. So I suppose she will some time hence tell you all that she was not enjoined to keep secret. I conclude you will have Nancy stay in the house awhile for decency, and she must, till she has executed her late dear lady's orders. Then I suppose you will chuse to have her live at home, and yet I wish you would let her live awhile with us—in this the Dr. joins, as well as in the offer of our best services, with

LETTER XII.

From Nancy Pelham to her Parents.

My ever revered, and dear parents,

I know not how to write, nor how to be silent, on an occasion the most afflicting that ever befell, or could befall me, unless I had lost my natural parents. In my lady I have lost a friend, a guardian, protector, adviser, comforter—what have I not lost ? She was the best of women and the tenderest of mothers and mistresses.—T——d Manor will never see her equal. We her attendants shall never have such instruction, warnings and precepts as flowed gently and unremitting from her lips, as the silver dew on the tender herbage. I shall never, never see her, hear her, help her again—never, never be comforted by her smiles, nor receive the sweets of her approbation ; never, never love one as I have loved her—and as I could not help but love ; for to live with her, as I have done—see her example and hear her admirable conversation, and not esteem and love her, I must have been lost to all sense,

and

and regard for virtue, and real, unaffected, uniform goodness. O my dear parents, you cannot pity your Nancy enough, because you did not know half Lady Trenchard's worth. The family, the borough, the poor bitterly lament her death. Sir William is in great affliction, weeps a great deal, but Mr. Trenchard's is I believe the deepest sorrow, because tho' he is very dull, yet he is silent, and my lady used to say on similar occasions, "Noisy grief is generally soon over, it is dissipated by its own vapour, while the still mourner feeds his own fountain." My Lady finding herself weaker, about six weeks before she died, ordered me to make out a list of her apparel, jewels and trinkets, and linen. Then she marked them in two parcels, except her common wearing linen and ordinary apparel, and made me in her presence divide and put them into separate trunks—One for Mr. Trenchard, and the other for the younger son, and sealed them all with her own seal; there were five trunks and a casket for Mr. Trenchard, and three trunks and a casket for his brother; after which she bade me to get several things and put them in a very large seal-skin trunk, and a list of them inside, and she sealed that; then she ordered me to make out a list of what she gave to several of her friends, and had those put in a smaller trunk, and sealed that, and then a list for Mrs. Wilson, for Rachel, Priscilla the cook, and the laundress, &c. &c. She looked over all the lists and signed them. All this she did at several times with as much composure as she used to write and give out her daily bill of fare when she was well. She then sent for Mr. Trenchard, and desired him to put numbers on each trunk, which he did, and she put into his hands a sheet of paper, of her own writing, which she told him she drew up last winter, and desired him to see all was done that she ordered in it; he promised her he would. The next morning, she told me, I must be her executer in some things, and gave me a paper sealed up, and the key of a little box, which she said, I would meet with no difficulty about, as she had told her son of it, though not how it was to be applied, and she said if I was at any loss, I must apply to Mrs. Brice and Mrs. Butler, who knew her mind; but I must not open it till a month after her death; so what is in the paper and the box I do not yet know. After all this she sent for Sir William, and talked in private with him a good while. She told me in the evenings, that now she had quite done with earthly matters, and her mind was free and easy; Sir William was satisfied with all her disposals, and she hoped every one else would be. I forgot to tell you of a list of household furniture she made me draw out in two copies; she signed both, and sealed and directed them, "For Nancy Pelham," giving me one copy, and Mr. Trenchard the other. I was so surprized I did not know what to say, and I was afraid he and Sir William, and others, would think I had asked for them, and I could not say a word while he was present; for I always had an awe of him, as much as of Sir William; but when he went out, I took the liberty to tell her my fears, and that I did not desire these things—she had done a great deal already for me and my parents—but she stopped me, and begged I would not say any more, adding, "nobody will think ill of you Nancy for what I have ordered; I have taken care of that, and Billy told me he was pleased with what I did; he knows what I have done for every one, except what is in that little box and the paper I gave you with it." I am sure it was very generous in him. (But by all I can find out, he is a great deal like his mama. If he is, happy indeed will the next Lady T——d be in a husband.) After this, she evidently grew worse, her fever rose higher, her cough encreased, and her night sweats were profuse.

The day before she died, she talked a great deal to Mr. Trenchard, and gave him her solemn charges, which he promised to observe, then her blessing, saying, he had always been a dutiful and tender child to her, and she hoped he would have a companion to supply the loss of his mother: he was very much moved, and I was, as much, to see him kneeling and bathing her almost cold arms with his tears, and she smiling on him, and with the tenderest voice and look giving him her last blessing! I wished myself out of the room, but I could not go, because I was sitting behind her to steady her shaking joints. No body else was in the room, and I thought at first he would not like that I was there, but that evening, as I was at the fire warming something for her, he came to me, and speaking very pleasantly, said, "Did you ever hear any thing equal to mama's discourse?" I replied I never did from any lips but my lady's, but she was always like herself. I then apologized for my staying, on the account I mentioned; but he said it needed no apology, he was very glad I was there, which I wondered to hear him say, and to speak so familiarly to me, because he did not use to be free with me. The day she died, she was so low she spoke but little, only to Dr. Brice, who twice visited her, and sent her charges in short sentences, to the men servants, and the maids, maids, by Mrs. Wilfon.—To the older ones, “To be faithful to God, their master and their souls.”—To the young ones, “To seek God early and he would bless them.” To the maid servants, “To secure the one thing needful.” And to all in general, “to be constant, serious, and careful attenders on family and public devotion.” She grew restless about the middle of the afternoon, and sometimes complained of her impatience, tho’, dear Lady, she appeared to all who were with her, a pattern of patience. Sir William was so much affected, he could be but little there; Madam Masham was partly with him, and partly in the chamber; Mr. Trenchard sat on one side the bed, and I on the other, holding and rubbing her hands. She continued till near midnight, and then,—O then, she ceased to breathe! Soon as we saw she was gone, Mr. Trenchard went out of the room, and shut himself in his own, and was not seen till next morning; but they say he never so much as sat or lay down, but was heard to walk about the room constantly, with bitter moans and sighs! I was like a statue, for I could not shed one tear, but my heart and head seemed as if they would burst, I never felt so dreadfully!—I kept in Mrs. Wilfon’s chamber; I did not love to see any body; but Dr. Butler and Madam, and Dr. Brice and Madam came to see me, and tried to comfort me: Madam Masham was so kind as to come several times to me, and told me she would always be a friend to me if I behaved as well as I had done, and she hoped and believed I would. Sir William sent me word he should always respect me for my love to, and care of his dear Lady. Dr. Brice preached the funeral sermon; there was scarce a dry eye in the meeting-house. Both he and Dr. Butler and their ladies, were invited to walk as relations; he buried her very generously.—The tenants and their wives all attended, and instead of gloves had 20s. a piece given them as she desired; so had several poor widows. The sermon is to be printed, and I shall send one to you. I have seen Mr. Trenchard but little since, for I am almost wholly up stairs, doing some work my Lady directed to be done for a poor widow who has seven small children. Mr. Trenchard came into the room one day, and asked me to go into my Lady’s closet, and put her books in the order she used to keep them, for some folks had gone in while she was sick and displaced them; when I had done he gave me the little box, and told me to take it away: then he told me that the large seal-skin trunk was for me, and gave me the key of it, and asked me to get those pieces of furniture together that my Lady had given me. I told him I had rather not; if Sir William gave me the possession of them I would receive them with all gratitude, and keep them as long as I lived, as dear memorials of his mama; he said, “Sir William desired I would.” After this, he put into my hands the catalogue of my Lady’s books, and told me she had given them all to him, and I might take as many as I chose; he had been told I loved reading. I thanked him, and declined taking any; he said, he should be troubled if I did not—it looked as if I was afraid of being under an obligation to him—but he was far from thinking I was or could be obliged to him; he should always think he was to me for my care of his mama. I thought he seemed rather grieved than offended, tho’ he coloured as if he were angry. So I picked out a dozen—and went away. Next day he sent me those and twenty-two more, with this wrote in each, “Nancy Pelham’s, in remembrance of Lady Frances Trenchard, presented by William Trenchard, jun.” They were put into a neat mahogany box locked up, and the key sent in a fine purse of purple and gold of my Lady’s, which I had seen in her casket, together with fifty guineas as my Lady’s legacy. Madam Masham had told me that my Lady left me thirty, I suspect he added twenty himself, but I do not chuse to ask any questions, nor tell any body but you what he gave me. If it is his own, it shows him to be like his mama, for she used often to give her own bounties as from a private hand, and so as none could discover, unless sometimes it came out unavoidably. I have not seen him since except at a distance, so that I have never thanked him. Please to write me word when I am to go home, for I want it very much, as soon as I have finished what my Lady left to my care; but I do not yet know when that will be until I open the box, which I shall do in the presence of Madam Brice and Madam Butler. I am, my dear parents,

Your sorrowful,

Memoirs of the late Hugh Kelly, Esq.

AS an impartial biographer, I shall not suppress any circumstance of Mr. Kelly’s life which have come to my knowledge. He never attempted to conceal any part of his history, and with conscious merit soared above the little prejudices of a mean parentage, or a confined education. The latter circumstance does him the greater honour, as by his own genius, application, and abilities, he attained a reputation reputation in the literary world, that would have done honour to any of the learned seminaries.

After this prelude, we shall not hesitate to acknowledge that Mr. Kelly was the son of a publican in Dublin, who gave him an education suited to his rank; and when he approached towards maturity, apprenticed him to a stay-maker, in that city. This vocation was no way suited to Hugh's genius; he absconded, and went to sea. Upon his return from a short voyage, he was landed at one of the English ports, and travelled up to London on foot. On his arrival here, all his possessions consisted of a jacket and trowsers, a supernumerary checked shirt, and about a shilling in his pocket.

In this condition, he had no other resource than to endeavour getting employment in his original profession, that of a stay-maker. He accordingly repaired to a house of call near Bedford-Bury, and was engaged for a week by a master of the trade. Six whole days did poor Hugh sit cross-legged upon the board for eight shillings: and at the expiration of this time, he had the mortification to be informed, he was ignorant of his trade.

However, hunger and fatigue induced him to think of a substantial supper after fasting so long; and he repaired to the Black Lion, (a well known eating-house in Ruffel-street, Covent Garden) where he ordered a large beef-steak, and a pot of porter. Whilst he was enjoying the dainties of English beef, a dish with which he had been entirely unacquainted, he met with an old acquaintance he had known in Ireland, who promised to introduce him to his master, who was a hard quill-driving attorney near Chancery-Lane.

He was employed, and for some time stuck to the desk as closely as before he had stuck to the board. Here he made a much better figure than he had done in Bedford-bury; and as he wrote a neat expeditious hand, his master considered him as an acquisition to the system of vellum and parchment: but, alas! twelve shillings was but a poor stipend to subsist upon, and appear like a gentleman.

Luckily, at the Tuns, in Fetter-Lane, he met with another acquaintance, whom he had known in Ireland, in the capacity of an itinerant player. Kelly was surprised to see him so well equipped; and after having given a sketch of his own story, naturally inquired how he made so good an appearance; as he well knew the son of Thetis was not the legitimate offspring of either Melpomene or Thalia?

"Why, my dear Hugh, you know I have been as unfortunate upon the boards as you have; my employer turned me off for my incapacity, as did your's. It was time to think of another calling. I had no relish for jappanning of shoes at the corner of the Piazza; and I was not calculated for carrying burthens. What then was to be done?—a light easy genteel calling was my object. I turned collector."

"Collector!" said Kelly, starting, and upon the point of retreating; fancying that some of Sir John Fielding's men might be in an adjacent box.

"Pshaw," replied J——n; "You do not understand me—don't be alarmed—I mean news collector—paragraph writer for the papers."

"Well, Sir," resumed Hugh—"and what do you make of this profession?"

"Why, my dear boy, in case of a lucky fire, or some very fortunate accident—not to mention broken legs, falling of chimnies in a high wind, and the like, upon an average, about five and twenty shillings a week."

After this conference they parted, when Kelly ruminating upon the five and twenty shillings a week, and the accidents, judged that if Mr. J——, whose slender abilities he was well acquainted with, could raise such a weekly sum, he might, without vanity, hope to raise a larger. He accordingly sat down in the morning, and wrote no less than thirty paragraphs. He waited upon the printer of the Gazetteer, who highly approved of every one, and paid him for them all.

Flushed with this success, he went again to work upon the same plan, and made a very comfortable week's operation. Indeed, the printer was so well satisfied with his productions, even in this line, that he advised Mr. Kelly to turn essay writer, and dramatic critic. We now view Mr. Kelly as an author at large, estranged from the copying desk in Chancery-lane, and making a genteel appearance, in decent chambers in the Temple.

Being now in easy circumstances, he made a very prudent choice of a most amiable woman in an honourable way, by whom he had several pledges of their mutual affection.

Soon after this period, Mr. Kelly's reputation as a writer, made him sought after by many capital booksellers and printers in this metropolis. He wrote several ingenious works, and was engaged as editor and chief writer in the Ledger. In this capacity he had many opportunities of recommending himself to persons of rank and fortune, and particularly to the late lord Baltimore, at the time that his affair with

Mifs

Mifs W—d—k made ſo much noiſe. His lordſhip enquired of the printer, who was the author of thoſe letters and paragraphs, ſo greatly in his behalf. The printer acquainted his lordſhip, that he was not at liberty to declare him; but that he would acquaint him with his lordſhip's civil inquiries. In conſequence of this Mr. Kelly waited upon lord Baltimore, who gave him a very genteel reception, and after ſome mutual compliments, preſented him with a gold tooth-pick caſe, (the contents not being the leaſt valuable part,) at the ſame time aſſuring him of his friendſhip and patronage.

Mr. Kelly now turned his thoughts towards the drama. He firſt produced a poem, entitled Theſpis, in imitation of Churchill's Rofcius; and ſoon after, his comedy of Faſſe Delicacy was received upon Drury-lane ſtage, with much applauſe. His next theatrical production was not equally ſucceſſful; probably not ſo much from its deficiency in point of merit, as its being ſtrongly rumoured he was a miniſterial writer, when party ran very high. A comedy, entitled A Word to the Wife, was not permitted to be performed: though he afterwards published it by ſubſcription, to conſiderable advantage. He, nevertheless, ſtill wrote for the ſtage; but concealing his name, or getting a friend to ſtand adopted father, all his pieces ſucceeded; which is a proof that partiality had ſtrongly operated againſt him.

So far with regard to his literary character. As a man, he was a kind huſband, a tender parent, and a warm friend. If we conſider his origin, and the limits of the education he received in his youth, we muſt ſtand amazed at the progreſs he made in polite learning, which his works evince. His application to the law entitled him to be called to the bar, and as a counſellor, he made a very reſpectable figure. It is generally believed that he had a handſome provision from government, for the ſervices he had done, as a political writer; but this cannot be aſcertained; it only accounts for the genteel and hoſpitable manner in which he lived. It is very remarkable, that notwithſtanding the humble ſphere in which he began to move, that few men were more polite, or poſſeſſed a better addreſs.

Mr. Kelly died ſuddenly, in the prime of life, lamented by all his acquaintance, deplored by all his friends.

The English Theatre.

Covent-Garden.

A NEW—or rather revived Tragedy, called Sir Thomas Overbury, was performed at this Theatre for the first time on Saturday the 1st Instant.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Sir Thomas Overbury,	Mr. Lewis.
Earl of Somerset,	Mr. Wroughton.
Earl of Northampton,	Mr. Hull.
Sir Gervis Elvis,	Mr. Whitefield.
Lady Essex, afterwards } Countess of Somerset,	Mrs. Jackson.
Cleora,	Miss Leeson.
And Isabella,	Mrs. Hartley.

S K E T C H.

THE Fable of this Tragedy is not derived from fiction, being founded on a point of real history in the reign of King James the First, and is briefly this:—The celebrated Robert Carr being the favourite of his Royal Master, was from the rank of a private gentleman raised through the various gradations of state preferments, till he was created Earl of Somerset. In this situation he became enamoured of the Countess of Essex, one of the most lovely, yet most abandoned and ambitious of her sex, and who, for her incontinency, had been divorced from her Lord. To gratify her ambition, she espouses the doating Somerset, while her affections were riveted on Sir Thomas Overbury, who slighted a passion which he could not requite, having surrendered his heart to the beauteous and innocent Isabella, ward to the Earl of Somerset; and who sighed in return for him, under the name of Belmour; the fictitious character of a private gentleman, under which he had addressed, and won her affections. Overbury, not knowing of his friend's marriage, flies to him, and endeavours to win him from his enchantment, by representing his mistress in her true colours.—The haughty Countess, piqued at the cold indifference of the man she had addressed with the warmest passion, joins with the Earl of Northampton in plotting his overthrow, who likewise doated on Isabella; and therefore envied the rising fortune of Overbury in love, as well as in his Sovereign's smiles. This diabolical scheme is effected by some of his unsuperscribed affectionate letters to Isabella being intercepted by Northampton, who shewing them to the Countess of Somerset, easily prevails upon her to give them to her Lord, as amorous epistles sent to her by his false friend, who had made repeated attacks upon her virtue.—The credulous Earl, on this evidence of his supposed guilt, renounces his honest friend, impeaches him to his King as a private favourer of the malecontents, and moves his Majesty (by the base machinations of Northampton) to order him on an embassy to Russia, as the touchstone of his guilt.—Overbury refusing to go, is committed close prisoner to the Tower. The Countess, disturbed at being thus the instrument of the fall and death of the innocent man she loved, writes to him that she will visit him; which letter is intercepted, and given to Somerset; who now, convinced of the innocence of his injured friend, goes to his Sovereign, confesses his guilt, and obtains a pardon for Overbury, with which he flies to the Tower with Isabella, and greets him with the tidings; but in the midst of the general ecstasy between love and friendship, Overbury is suddenly seized with the effects of poison, which had been administered to him by Northampton and the Countess, and expires in the arms of the distracted Isabella.

It is unnecessary to observe, that the above Tragedy is the production of the late Richard Savage, Esq. the son of Earl Rivers; the misfortunes of whose life were, perhaps, more numerous and complicated, than ever fell to the lot of an individual—He was indeed

“ The child of sorrow—and baptized in tears!”

The Tragedy now under consideration was first produced at the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, in 1724, (in which the unfortunate author played himself the part of Sir Thomas Overbury), and was received by the town with universal applause. Mr. Savage, however, in 1738, thinking material alterations might be made for the better in his piece, and willing to leave it to posterity in a state more worthy their patronage, revised, and re-wrote some of the scenes, intending to bring this alteration on the stage, had not his death intervened; a chain of strange accidents likewise prevented this amended copy from seeing the light, till chance threw it into the hands of a gentleman well acquainted with the drama, through whose interest it has thus found its way to the stage.—We differ, however, in opinion with Dr. Johnson, who calls it a new play, and not a revival of the old one; as the alterations are by no means sufficient to justify the Doctor's assertion; the principal one of consequence in the fable, being that of Sir Thomas Overbury having addressed Isabella under the fictitious name of Belmour. Indeed there are several judicious transpositions, omissions, and variations in point of language, which certainly tend to the improvement of the drama, and to the pathos of the affecting tale. As it is now brought out, it is evidently a Tragedy that does credit to the English stage. The fable being founded on historical facts, is very interesting in itself, but it is admirably heightened by the skill of the poet,—who, with an elegant flow of numbers, a natural disposition of trying incidents, and a happy contrast of well-drawn virtuous and vicious characters, has thus formed as affecting a Tragedy as ever perhaps was exhibited on any stage.—There are situations, however, to be met with, that remind us of Shakespeare's Othello and Iago—of Otway's Jaffier and Pierre;—but, as an ample atonement for any imitation of the latter, Savage has certainly improved upon his original. What can be more moving than the various scenes between Somerset and Overbury! The agonizing conflicts between love and friendship are natural, and beautiful to a degree!—The termination of the piece, however, in our opinion, would be much better without the frantic appearance of the Countess of Somerset with her dishevelled locks;—it reminds us of a similar entree of Belvidera's, in Venice Preserved, without answering any other purpose whatever.

We are now evidently arrived at a theatrical æra, occasioned by the concurrence of several circumstances, but principally by the resignation of Mr. Colman as manager at Covent-Garden, and of Mr. Garrick, as manager and performer at Drury-lane. Since these unfortunate events the management of both theatres has wholly consisted of expedients and shifts. Tragedies and Comedies are among the first productions of human genius, and it requires at least some portion of genius to judge of them. The managers have seemed conscious of their defect, and have acted cautiously on the judgment of their predecessors, by reviving plays which they had approved. This has suspended all the efforts of genius in original composition for the stage, and generated a new species of Literati, if they may be so called, and which stand to real and original writers, in the same relation that old clothes-men do to tailors. They are sent to rummage dusty shelves for old copies, and old manuscripts, which they procure for small considerations, which they brush and patch without much trouble, and deliver to their employers on terms which perhaps a Jew would stare at, considering the profits which are to ensue. It is thus that merit is kept aloof, and rendered unnecessary at Drury-lane and Covent-garden, and the theatre is become the Monmouth Street of Literature.

The Comic Opera of The Jovial Crew, being cut down, was performed on Saturday the 8th inst. at this theatre for the first time as an after-piece. In its original state it never was much admired, except for some of the excellent old airs and ballads that are to be found in it; and therefore is now not injudiciously curtailed of a great many uninteresting scenes, and much insipid dialogue; indeed in our opinion, too much of both is still remaining behind. Miss Catley and Miss Brown both executed their several songs with great taste and humour; and Mr. Reinhold was encored in the old song.—“I made love to Kate;”—which he sung in a very masterly stile.

When the two ladies, previous to their elopement to turn beggars, talk about their characters being suspected,—“Poh! says Catley, never mind that,—I can swear for the virginity of one of us however!”—which threw the whole house into an immoderate fit of laughter and clapping.

A new Comedy, entitled, Know your own Mind, written by Arthur Murphy, Esq. was performed at this theatre, on the 22d inst.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Sir John Millamour,	Mr. Fearon.
Young Millamour, (his son)	Mr. Lewis.
Mr. Bygrove,	Mr. Aicken.
Capt. Bygrove, (his son)	Mr. Booth.
Malvil,	Mr. Wroughton.
Dashwood,	Mr. Lee Leazes.
Sir Harry Lizard,	Mr. Whitefield.
Charles, (a Valet)	Mr. Weawitzer.
Miss Neville,	Mrs. Hartley.
Mrs. Bromley,	Mrs. Jackson.
Lady Bell, }	{ Mrs. Maitocks.
Lady Jane, }
La Rouge,	Miss Ambrose.

S K E T C H.

The out-lines of this piece are briefly these. Young Millamour,—the Irresolute of D'Esclouches, D'Estouches, is pressed by his father to settle in the world, in order to which, he recommends him to address and marry lady Bell, one of Mrs. Bromley's nieces. The young man complies for the instant, and makes love to her with all imaginable ardour; but all on a sudden he is struck with the elegant simplicity of her sister, lady Jane, and therefore not knowing his own mind, addresses her with all the zeal of the most passionate lover. In compliance with the caprice of the moment, he alternately fancies each the mistress of his affections, and resolves upon marrying first one, and then the other, as whim directs him. In this state of uncertainty he is found by Malvil, who, leagued with Mrs. Bromley, artfully represents to him the widow as the more deserving object of the three, with whom he might sit down comfortably at once, with a borough, and a good jointure. Struck with the novelty of the proposal, he falls into Malvil's snare, addresses Mrs. Bromley, presents her with a sonnet that he had written some time on her personal charms, and swears eternal adoration to them. The young ladies, however, suspecting the sincerity of his declaration, soon after secure him, and press him so close, that he is about to fly the room, when Mrs. Bromley enters, and learning the cause, tells them effectually they need be under no anxiety on account of the dear man, for that she had fixed him herself; upon which she pulls out the verses he had presented to her, and begins to read them; when the two ladies pulling out copies of the same stanzas from Congreve, his inconstancy to all becomes evident, and he experiences no small share of reproach and raillery on every side.

Deſhawood (who is the great string of the fiddle) knowing that his friend capt. Bygrove had a penchant for lady Jane, but whose father insists upon his marrying the other sister,—is determined by a counter-plot to form all the matrimonial arrangements as they should be;—he recommends it therefore to lady Bell to encourage the addresses of Bygrove, as the only means of fixing Millamour;—and to fix lady Bell, who knows her own mind but little better than her lover, advises lady Jane to smile upon Millamour; both of which have their intended effect; for Millamour is tortured beyond expression at the idea of Bygrove's possessing lady Bell, but in revenge turns again to lady Jane, which alarms Bell, who is apprehensive she has lost her spark, by over-playing the game.

There is a kind of under-plot between Sir Harry Lizard and Miss Neville a young lady of engaging person, and extreme sensibility, a dependant on Mrs. Bromley, who is ever reproaching her for her poverty.—Malvil, who had designs on her honour, writes her an anonymous letter, cautioning her against the libertine attacks of Sir Harry, and soon after prevails upon her, in the midst of her distresses, to fly from the persecutions of Mrs. Bromley to the house of La Rouge, the milliner, telling La Rouge, at the same time, that he was married secretly to her, and meant to come to her that evening in private.—La Rouge informing Millamour of this circumstance, he convenes the whole company in a room at madam La Rouge's, thro' which the villain must pass, in his way to the chamber of Miss Neville, who is let into the design, and joins the company in the darkened room before his coming.—At length Malvil arriving, and being let in by La Rouge, expresses the utmost raptures at his approaching bliss; but light being brought, his villainy stands confest to the whole circle.—Sir Harry Lizard now receives the hand of Miss Neville, and lady Bell, as a reward for Millamour's honour in support of insulted innocence, gives him her's—Lady Jane surrendering at the same time to capt. Bygrove;—after which the piece concludes with some observations by Millamour in favour of love and constancy.

Mr. Murphy, the author of this Comedy, is well known as a very peculiar compiler of plays. He has proceeded in preparing the present comedy in the usual manner; has borrowed his plot and the out-lines of his characters from L'Irresolu of D'Estouches, and finished the whole by allotting to his Personages smart sayings, comical puns, and sentimental sentences from his common place book. Mr. Murphy is truly and exactly what ought to be understood by a playwright. Furnish him a plot, and characters and situations, and he will produce from his common-place book, words, and phrases, and sentiments which will suit them tolerably well; but like all imitative and second hand geniuses, he is extremely apt to over-charge his characters. The irresolute man, whom he calls Millamour, and his fickle flame lady Bell, are not drawn after nature; their parts are so crowded with fickle sayings and doings, as to exceed even theatrical probability. This irresolute man falls in love, first with one sister, then with the other, and then with the aunt. His want of constancy is not sufficiently concealed to give eclat to the discovery of it; but the art of the coquetish lady Bell, who loves him, and who secures him at last by piquing his jealousy, is not unnatural.

Mr. Murphy, understanding the present state of fashions in the world of taste, has acted in the business of his play like a judicious and prudent lawyer. Disputes run high between the sickly, enervated, and profligate lovers of sentiment, and the vulgar grinners and laughers. He has aimed to please both parties, and has given Mrs. Bromley (aunt to lady Bell and lady Jane) a meek, humble, and virtuous dependant, whom he calls Miss Neville. This poor creature is used by Mrs. Bromley as such dependants generally are, and she does and says so many sentimental things, that a Sir Harvey Lizzard falls in love with her, and after suffering her to bear her quantity of insults from Mrs. Bromley, and dangers from the artifices of a Mr. Malvil, he determines to marry her. Besides these characters, which are essential to the intended catastrophe of the piece, there is another, whose business seems to be to come on the stage and repeat all the smart, satirical things which Mr. Murphy could collect. This is said to have been copied from that of a well-known and living genius; but if it be, it is horribly drawn. Some of the wit has probably been borrowed, or rather stolen, from Mr. Foote's conversation; but the laboured and mawkish puns on the Minority in the Suds, &c. are from the above-mentioned Common-Place Book.

The performers were extremely perfect in their parts, and did every thing which could well have been done to give success to the Comedy. Mrs. Mattocks distinguished herself. The part of Lady Bell could not have been much better performed. She also spoke an epilogue, written by Mr. Garrick, and which was full of that lively humour for which his pieces are admired.

The play was well received, but the play-houses are now almost deserted by persons of fashion, taste, and letters, who seem disposed to see French Comedies and Tragedies in their first and original state, before they have been mangled and mutilated by Plagiarists and Translators.

DRURY-LANE.

We think ourselves obliged to record so important an event as Signor Tenducci's return to England, as we profess to take notice of every thing on the theatre, which may materially affect the entertainment and morals of the people. At the opening of Drury-lane, under the present auspicious management, we were assured, in New Brooms, that sense was not to be sacrificed to sound; and that men of understanding were not to be driven from the theatre. We were not aware of the duplicity of sentimental honour. We understood New Brooms to be another appellation of new managers. No—the piece was written by Mr. Colman, and though written at the earnest desire of the managers, a circumstance which should have sacredly bound them to its declarations, it is evident they never meant to abide by them. When Oliver Cromwell wanted the assistance of fibbing, he generally employed another. Conscience then was under the direction of Fanaticism; it is now under that of Sentiment: principles equally profligate.

We could hardly imagine ourselves at Drury-lane, the very spot where Garrick, Barry, Mossop, Cibber, Pritchard, acquired immortal fame, from the approbation of an intelligent, and, on the whole, a virtuous people. Tenducci appeared in that most trifling and impertinent of all comedies, the Maid of the Oaks, on the 10th instant*. His talents are well known, and it is sufficient to say, that in the two airs he sung, he did not injure the sort of reputation he has acquired. Some remains of English spirit and good sense, however, discovered themselves frequently by hisses, no doubt, at seeing an English theatre turned into an opera house.

On Monday the twenty-fourth instant, The Trip to Scarborough, was presented at this theatre. It is an alteration by Mr. Sheridan, of the comedy of The Relapse, which was not only replete with gross allusions, but exhibited so glaring a picture of vice and immorality, that it has long been deemed unfit for representation:—The chief alterations, (exclusive of verbal corrections and several additional speeches) consist of the removal of the first scene of The Relapse, the change of the sex of Coupler, the giving Worthy the name of col. Townly, calling the Surgeon Mr. Probe, abridging the 4th act, introducing an entire new scene in the 5th, producing the denouement in a different and improved manner, and preserving the unity of place by laying the scene together in the country. And yet, after all his trouble, it is a matter of doubt, whether the reception of this piece with the public, will be adequate thereto. Indeed the circumstance of its having been

Let your gen'rous hearts befriend me,
Pardon all my want of skill;
Oft you did attention lend me,

A smart colloquy took place after supper between an Irish Carmelite and a wash-woman. A bill-sticker, dressed a la mode de Paris, ridiculed the French players with great acrimony.

The rest of the masks consisted of Turks, Nabobs, Blacks, Harlequins, Friars, Watchmen, Clowns, and Sailors. The ladies were chiefly in fancy dresses, which displayed great taste and elegance, and others represented Nuns, Gypsies, Country Girls, &c. Some of the dominos were very richly trimmed, but were not so numerous as might have been expected in so polite an assembly. The company, which was computed at about 900 persons, began to separate about six o'clock next morning.

*A Description of the Highlands of Scotland, and Remarks on the Second Sight of the Inhabitants. By Dr. Beattie **

THE Highlands of Scotland are a picturesque, but in general a melancholy country. Long tracts of mountainous desert, covered with dark heath, and often obscured by misty weather ; narrow valleys, thinly inhabited, and bounded by precipices, resounding with the fall of torrents ; a soil so rugged and a climate so dreary, as in many parts to admit neither the amusements of pasturage, nor the labours of agriculture ; the mournful dashing of waves along the friths and lakes that intersect the country ; the portentous noises which every change of the wind, and every increase and diminution of the waters is apt to raise in a lonely region full of echoes and rocks and caverns ; the grotesque and ghastly appearance of such a landscape by the light of the moon : objects like these diffuse a gloom over the fancy, which may be compatible enough with occasional and social merriment, but cannot fail to tincture the thoughts of a native in the hour of silence and solitude. If these people, notwithstanding their reformation in religion, and more frequent intercourse with strangers, do still retain many of their old superstitions, we need not doubt but in former times they must have been much more enslaved to the horrors of imagination, when beset with the bugbears of Popery, and the darkness of Paganism. Most of their superstitions are of a melancholy cast. That second sight wherewith some of them are still supposed to be haunted, is considered by themselves as a misfortune, on account of the many dreadful images it is said to obtrude upon the fancy. I have been told that the inhabitants of some of the Alpine regions do likewise lay claim to a sort of second sight. Nor is it wonderful, that persons of lively imagination, immured in deep solitude, and surrounded with the stupendous scenery of clouds, precipices and torrents, should dream, even when they think themselves awake, of those few striking ideas with which their lonely lives are diversified ; of corpses, funeral processions, and other subjects of terror ; or of marriages, and the arrival of strangers, and such like matters of more agreeable curiosity.

Let it be observed also that the ancient Highlanders of Scotland had hardly any other way of supporting themselves, than by hunting, fishing, or war ; professions that are continually exposed to fatal accidents.—And hence, no doubt additional horrors would often haunt their solitude, and a deeper gloom overshadow the imagination even of the hardiest native.

I do not find sufficient evidence for the reality of second sight, or at least of what is commonly understood by that term. A treatise on the subject was published in the year 1762, in which many tales were told of persons whom the author believed to have been favoured, or haunted, with these illuminations ; but most of the tales were trifling and ridiculous ; and the whole work betrayed, on the part of the compiler, such extreme credulity, as could not fail to prejudice many readers against his system.

That any of these visionaries are liable to be swayed in their declarations by sinister ter views, I will not say ; though a gentleman of character assured me, that one of them offered to sell him this unaccountable talent for half a crown. But this I think may be said with confidence, that none but ignorant people pretend to be gifted this way. And in them it may be nothing more, perhaps, than short fits of sudden sleep or drowsiness, attended with lively dreams, and arising from some bodily disorder, the effect of idleness, low spirits, or a gloomy imagination. For it is admitted even by the most credulous Highlanders, that as knowledge and industry are propagated in their country, the second sight disappears in proportion ; and nobody ever laid claim to this faculty, who was much employed in the intercourse of social life. Nor is it at all extraordinary, that one should have the appearance of being awake, and should even think one's self so, during these fits of dozing ; or that they should come on suddenly, and while one is engaged in some business. The same thing happens to persons much fatigued, or long kept awake, who frequently fall asleep for a moment, or for a longer space, while they are standing, or walking, or riding on horseback. Add but a lively dream to this slumber, and (which is the frequent effect of disease) take away the consciousness of having been asleep, and a superstitious man, who is always hearing and believing tales of second sight, may easily mistake his dream for a waking vision ; which, however, is soon forgotten, when no subsequent occurrence recalls it to his memory ; but which, if it shall be thought to resemble any future event, exalts the poor dreamer into a Highland prophet. This conceit makes him more reclusive and more melancholy than ever ; and so feeds his disease, and multiplies his visions ; which, if they are not dissipated by business or society, may continue to haunt him as long as he lives, and which, in their progress, through the neighbourhood, receive some new tincture of the marvellous, from every mouth that promotes their circulation. As to the prophetic nature of this second sight, it cannot be admitted at all. That the Deity should work a miracle, in order to give intimation of the frivolous things that these tales are made up of, the arrival of a stranger, the nailing of a coffin, or the colour of a suit of clothes ; and that these intimations should be given for no end, and to those persons only who are idle and solitary ; who speak Erse, or who live among mountains and deserts, is like nothing in nature or providence that we are acquainted with ; and must therefore, unless it were confirmed by satisfactory proof (which is not the case) be rejected as absurd and incredible.

The visions, such as they are, may reasonably enough be ascribed to a disordered fancy. And that in them, as well as in our ordinary dreams, certain appearances should, on some rare occasions, resemble certain events, is to be expected from the laws of chance ; and seems to have in it nothing more marvellous or supernatural than that the parrot, who deals out his scurrilities at random, should sometimes happen to salute the passenger by his right appellation.

The whole Trial of Doctor Dodd, at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, on Saturday the 22d of February, as taken by Mr. Joseph Gurney, and published by the Authority of the Court.

Dr. Dodd being set to the Bar, addressed the Court as follows :

My Lords,

I AM informed that the bill of indictment depending against me has been found on the evidence of Mr. Robertson, who was taken out of Newgate, without any authority or leave from your lordships, for the purpose of procuring the bill to be found : Mr. Robertson is a subscribing witness to the bond, and, as I conceive, would be swearing to exculpate himself if he should be admitted as a witness against me ; and as the bill has been found upon his evidence, which was surreptitiously obtained, I submit to your lordships that I ought not to be compelled to plead on this indictment, and upon this question I beg to be heard by my counsel. My Lords, I beg leave also further to observe to your lordships, that the gentlemen on the other side of the question are bound over to prosecute Mr. Robertson.

[Previous to the arguments of the Counsel, the Court directed that an order which had been surreptitiously obtained from an officer of the Court, dated Wednesday, February the 19th, and directed to the keeper of Newgate, commanding him to carry Lewis Robertson to Hicks's Hall, in order to his giving evidence before the Grand Inquest on the present bill of indictment ; likewise a resolution of the Court reprobatng the said order ; and also the recognizance entered into by Mr. Manly, Mr. Peach, Mr. Innis, and the Right Hon. the Earl of Chesterfield to prosecute and give evidence against Dr. Dodd and Lewis Robertson for the said forgery should be read, and the Clerk of the Arraignment was directed to inform the Court whether the name Lewis Robertson was indorsed as a witness on the back of the indictment, which was answered in the affirmative.]

Mr. Howarth.—As one of the counsel for Dr. Dodd it is my duty to submit to your lordships such observations as occur to me in support of the objection which has been made by the doctor to his pleading to this indictment: I presume your lordships will not put any person to plead or to answer to an indictment that may be found against him, if it appears upon the face of that indictment that the evidence upon which the bill was found was not legal or competent to have been adduced before the Grand Jury: your lordships find that Lewis Robertson, who was committed as a principal in the forgery, has since been carried before the Grand Jury for the county of Middlesex, by an order that is supposed to be obtained from this Court, and hath before that Grand Jury been examined as a witness against Dr. Dodd; how that order was obtained it is immaterial for me to state to your lordships; it is sufficient for me to find that a gentleman in the commission, who was upon the bench, actuated by a very laudable spirit of preserving the dignity of the Court, and to prevent the Court's being imposed upon, mentioned it to your lordships, and, in consequence of its being so mentioned, that order has since been formally vacated by the Court; it therefore stands now as a certain fact, that a witness committed as a principal in the crime has been carried, without any legal authority, before the Grand Jury of the county of Middlesex, and hath there been permitted to give evidence against the prisoner now standing at the bar: it is obvious to every man who hears the fact stated, that it is incumbent upon the witness so admitted, to exculpate himself, and to throw the whole weight and load of the guilt upon the gentleman now at the bar. Such evidence it is the genius of our law, and has been the humanity of all courts of criminal judicature, never to receive; because they have always acted upon this principle, that supposing the guilt of the party accused to be undeniable, yet the proof of that guilt shall not be received through polluted channels; as I take that to be the uniform practice of all courts of criminal judicature, I trust the same construction will hold with your lordships. It is impossible to know what passes before a Grand Jury, every thing that is transacted there is transacted under a solemn oath of secrecy, and therefore never can come forth to the world: it cannot be alleged by the gentlemen who are of counsel for the prosecution that it was unnecessary to have Robertson as a witness, because the materiality or immateriality of the evidence given by him to the Grand Jury must be perfectly a secret; but however it is fair inference and fair argument to say, that the gentlemen who conducted this prosecution conceived it to be material to have Robertson's evidence, otherwise there was no necessity for that extraordinary exertion to get him there, unless in their judgment and in their apprehension he might be a material evidence to support the charge against Dr. Dodd. My Lords, I say, upon such grounds, I trust it is fair argument in me to suppose that he was a witness materially necessary for the carrying on of this prosecution, and fixing upon the prisoner the guilt the indictment imputes to him, and that without his evidence the guilt could not be brought home to him; I trust it is extremely clear, that Robertson ought not to have been admitted as a witness before the Grand Jury. Suppose a bill of indictment was brought before your lordships, and a prisoner was called upon to plead to it, and it appeared to your lordships that there was but one witness on the back of the bill, which witness also appeared to be an accomplice, and had been committed as a principal in the guilt; that would appear, upon the face of it, to be a bill found by a Grand Jury who are not supposed to be competent judges of law, they are only judges of fact, and the probable guilt of a prisoner is a sufficient ground for them to find a bill; but, I say, supposing it appeared, that that bill was found upon the oath of a person, who by the laws of this country ought not to be received as a witness, or at least, supposing him to be received as a witness, whose evidence never can, never has, and, I trust, never will convict any person, your lordships would not, in such a case, I conceive, put the prisoner to plead to, or answer that indictment; it may be answered to me here, that there are a great many other witnesses on the back of this bill; that it does not appear here what the evidence given by Robertson was, whether there was enough to find a bill against Dr. Dodd or not; I trust that will be no objection; what passed before the Grand Jury must necessarily be a profound secret; it is enough for me to say that there appeared on the back of this bill, as a witness, a person, who was committed as a principal, and who ought to have answered as a principal at the bar of this Court. He has been carried up to the Grand Jury by an order surreptitiously obtained, which order the Court have shewn a just disapprobation of, and have in truth vacated; therefore I trust, in such a case, the law of this country will not

not permit any prisoner at the bar to be put upon his country; and if the rigid law of this country will not permit it, I am too much acquainted with your lordships' humanity to suppose your lordships will permit it.

Mr. Cowper.—Will your lordships please to favour me a few words in support of the motion that has been made by Mr. Howarth, that Dr. Dodd may not be called upon to plead to the bill of indictment that is now found against him, and that that bill may be quashed; and, my lords, it is upon that general ground that the bill of indictment has received the sanction of the Grand Jury of Middlesex, in consequence of evidence having been adduced before them that ought not there to have been produced or heard. The principles upon which we who are of counsel for the prisoner mean to support this idea do not at all combat the general rules of law, with respect to admitting of accomplices' evidence: the attaining justice in a degree through the assistant evidence of those who are partners in the crime, under particular circumstances and in particular cases, is very often found to be necessary; but those circumstances and the situation of the party, who is so admitted an evidence, must appear either to the committing magistrate who selects one, perhaps less attainted with the guilt than another, for the purpose of assisting the prosecution, or to the Court who are to try the prisoner; where there have been instances of the Court directing one of the persons committed for the offence to be admitted as an evidence: but, my Lords, except in one or the other of these situations, where a person is brought before a magistrate and charged as a principal, where, upon the face of the instrument, there is every evidence to shew that he is a principal, where the magistrate upon the hearing of the evidence before him commits him as a principal, and where this Court have refused to admit him to the advantage that the situation of an evidence against the prisoner would give him; I submit to your lordships that Robertson's evidence under these circumstances was improperly carried before the Grand Jury, I will not say more than improperly, that is sufficient, it is not necessary to cast any reflection upon the prosecution, it is not necessary to cast any reflection upon the officer of the Court; it suffices us to say, that Mr. Robertson's evidence has been improperly, and in an unbecoming manner conveyed to Hicks's-hall, and there submitted to the Grand Jury, and upon that evidence, together with the testimony of other persons, this bill of indictment is found against Dr. Dodd. My Lords, the gentlemen on the other side of the question will not surely attempt gravely to tell your lordships that this might have been obtained without the interposition of a magistrate, or without obtaining an order from the Court, because if they do, they will be reduced to the necessity of arguing against their own conduct. Why were the prosecutors to come to the court? your lordships are not to give them advice; your lordships are not counsel in any prosecution; they applied to receive that sanction which they conceived, and I apprehend they conceived very rightly, was necessary for them to obtain, namely, an order for the conveyance of Mr. Robertson before the Grand Jury; however they misunderstood, or however they misrepresented, the answer that your lordships so justly gave to that application I do not know; but still, not departing from the idea that the interposition of this Court was necessary to the conveyance of Robertson before the Grand Jury, an order was obtained for this person, whom the prosecutors were bound over to prosecute capitally, to be carried before the Grand Jury. My Lords, it will be unnecessary to comment upon that order, it has been already stigmatized by the Court itself; it has been discharged, and it has been discharged as surreptitiously obtained; why then, my Lords, have I any proposition that needs an argument to maintain it, when I state this bare fact, that in consequence of an order, now discharged by the Court, now declared by the Court to have been surreptitiously obtained, by this means alone did Robertson's evidence come before the Grand Jury; what Robertson swears, whether he swears any thing material, or swore nothing that was material, whether the Grand Jury credited or disbelieved his evidence, whether they found the bill upon any part of his testimony, or found it solely upon the testimony of others, is totally out of the present case, because that fact remains and must remain in perfect secrecy; for the Grand Jury have not only an oath of secrecy imposed upon them, but if it were the Jury that sit there trying the prisoners your lordships would not permit any incompetent or illegal evidence to go before that Jury, however immaterial, because it is impossible for your lordships ever to say what degree of influence a piece of immaterial evidence might have upon the mind of any person whatsoever; it would be your lordships' duty, and I am sure would be the conduct of the Court upon such an occasion, to take care that the Jury should hear no such evidence. Thus it stands with regard to the present bill of indictment, such was the situation situation of Mr. Robertson committed as a principal, and the parties bound over to prosecute him with effect; what have they done? In a case of forgery that came before this Court not a great while ago, that occasioned a very considerable consideration of the subject of admitting persons as evidence, and what safety the person should derive from being so admitted as evidence, great doubts, I believe, arose. At one time I can venture to say that there were differences of opinion amongst your lordships, with regard to the propriety of admitting a person as evidence, and with regard to the advantages that were to be derived to the person so admitted as an evidence; then, upon that subject so difficult to define, so important in its consequences, and so delicate in its nature, the mistake of the prosecutor, together with the mistake of the officer of the Court (for I will call it no more) is at once to remove every difficulty, every obstruction whatever, and to take Lewis Robertson out of the situation of being committed as a principal in, and liable to be tried for that fact, to be admitted an evidence against a person by which he is to exculpate, and totally to indemnify himself from the consequence of that charge.

Mr. Buller.—My Lords, I am of counsel on the same side with Mr. Howarth and Mr. Cowper. It is the established law of this land, that no man shall be put upon his trial for any offence, unless there be a bill first properly found by a Grand Jury; I say properly found, for if there be any objection whatsoever to the finding of the indictment, and the most familiar that is to be found in our books are those that go to the objection of the Grand Jury; for instance, where only one person of the Grand Jury has been incompetent, where only eleven of the Jury have found the bill, that therefore it shall not be tried; I take it the objections go universally; I am aware that the objections I have been alluding to, and which are particularly stated in Lord Hale, go to the Grand Jury only; but I will beg leave to consider whether the reason that governs the one does not govern the other. Another case put by Lord Hale is this; if one of the Grand Jury is outlawed, these objections go to the persons of the Grand Jury: I am aware that that is not the present objection; but I will beg leave, with your lordships permission, to consider whether this does not fall within the same reason; for I cannot conceive that the law, which is so peculiarly watchful of the personal qualifications of the Grand Jury, should not be equally attentive to the evidence which is laid before them, and upon which they are to decide the fate of the bill which is offered to their consideration: I take it to be as essential to the finding of the bill that the evidence offered to the Grand Jury should be such as the law allows, as it is when the indictment afterwards comes to be tried before your lordships; and if that rule holds, I trust I shall have very little difficulty in convincing your lordships that this bill has been improperly found. My Lords, the prosecutor has thought it so material to admit Mr. Robertson a witness in this cause, that though, in my humble apprehension, he stands in a much more criminal light than the prisoner at the bar, yet they have thought fit to bargain with him, to let him off from a capital felony of the most dangerous sort to society, the most peculiarly so from his situation in life of any man that can be charged with such an offence. Mr. Robertson stands in this business as a sworn broker of the city of London, as such it was his peculiar duty to preserve good faith between man and man; he is bargained with by the prosecutor to be let off in a case where he stands upon the appearance against him now as the most criminal, for the purpose of procuring evidence against the prisoner at the bar. My Lords, if that evidence be improper, there remains but one thing more to be enquired into, that is, whether your lordships can say that evidence has not had an improper effect when it was admitted before the Grand Jury: it is not improbable that the bill might be found wholly upon his evidence; if I have a right to assume that as a fact, because the prosecutor has thought it material and absolutely necessary to produce him before the Grand Jury, why then your lordships sitting here cannot say but this indictment may have been found upon his evidence only; if it be so, is Robertson a person whose evidence ought to have been received? If I am right in saying that the same evidence, and the same evidence only, is legal before a Grand Jury which is legal upon a trial, I apprehend the case which was mentioned yesterday in Lord Hale, folio 303, is decisive upon this point. My Lords, there are more passages in that folio book; the first was the case mentioned yesterday of "Henry Trew was indicted for a burglary, and (by the advice of Keeling, chief justice, Brown, justice, and Wilde, recorder) Perrin was sworn a witness against Trew as to the burglary, which he confessed, but was not indicted for the other felony." Here he was admitted, because he confessed himself guilty. The passage before that in Lord Hale seems to me still stronger: "If two defendants be charged with a crime, one “ party shall not be examined against the other tier to convict him of an offence, unless the party examined confess himself guilty.” Now, has Robertson confessed himself guilty? No, he has not; then there is an express authority by Lord Hale, that not having done it he is no witness, he does not stand in that predicament which Lord Hale states the man to be there. He says, that they were both charged with the crime; that is the case here; the prisoner and Robertson were both committed for the same crime; he stands now charged with that crime, and he has not pleaded guilty; therefore upon this authority I take it to be clear, that he cannot be admitted a witness upon the trial, and if not, I must leave it to the ingenuity of the learned counsel to shew why a man, who the law says shall not be a witness upon the trial, shall be admitted a witness to find the bill upon, against a man whom there is no other evidence to affect.

Mr. Mansfield.—I am to trouble your lordships in answer to this objection, which to me is perfectly new, which to me is totally unlike any that I have ever read or heard of; and I find that the gentlemen who here support this objection, very properly don't produce before your lordships any one instance in which such an attempt was ever made, much less an instance in which such an attempt succeeded; for myself, and for those for whom I stand here, as they have no wishes upon this subject but that justice should have its course, they certainly will not desire me, nor should I find myself at all inclined to give any resistance to the motion that is made, if I did not think that the very proceeding required it, and that the objection is without the least appearance of any legal foundation. I perceive, my Lords, the objection, as it is made, to Dr. Dodd being put upon his trial on this indictment is, that there is a witness supposed to be improperly carried before the Grand Jury, and that witness, when carried before the Grand Jury, is supposed to be so situated and circumstanced that he ought not to be heard, and your lordships are desired, for the first time, almost, I believe, in the history of English judicature, to enquire and consider to what evidence the Grand Jury gave attention, and whether, upon the whole, it appeared to them that there was fit ground to find the bill. My Lords, I have always understood that for the sake, not of bringing men to punishment, but for the sake of defending them, and for the protection of Englishmen, that it was the sole and exclusive privilege of a Grand Jury to judge, not whether a man was guilty, but whether such circumstances appeared against a man accused of a crime that he ought to be put upon trial; and this is so peculiarly and exclusively the province of a Grand Jury, that your lordships are not only forbid, by law, yourselves, to know or presume, what evidence influences the Grand Jury, but they themselves are restrained by an oath from disclosing that evidence; they are to enquire and to judge whether a man ought to be tried, whether such grounds of suspicion (for suspicion is enough to find a bill) appear against a man accused, that he ought to be brought before another Jury to receive a conviction or acquittal; and as that is the province of the Grand Jury, it is no wonder that this is the first attempt, I believe, to desire of a court of judicature, who is to try the indictment found, to declare whether the Grand Jury have or had not sufficient evidence before them in saying, ‘We think this gentleman ought to be put upon his trial;’ for that is all that they have said. My lords, I should have thought this a very full and sufficient answer to the objection, if something had not been said which makes it, for the sake, not of the motion itself, but of the parties concerned, and of those who have acted different parts in it, to say something more to your lordships, as well too as to take notice of some which appear to be indeed very dangerous doctrines, that I have heard delivered upon this occasion. One grand and indeed principal objection, as I before observed, to this witness is, that he was improperly carried before the Grand Jury; “improperly carried,” I think are the words used; and the impropriety consists in this, that an order was obtained for carrying the body of this Lewis Robertson before the Grand Jury, there to be a witness, and then to be brought back again to the gaol of this Court: that that order was improperly obtained, there is no doubt; I am not at liberty now to dispute it; at the same time, though it certainly was improperly obtained, and was obtained from a mere mistake, upon an idea that the proceeding was regular, though it certainly was not, but at the same time it is well known to some that hear me, who are acquainted with the business, that it was a matter of course, if the prisoner had been in another gaol for if he had been in another gaol, and not in that of this Court, your lordships know an Habeas Corpus might have been applied for, and must have been obtained, to carry him before the Grand Jury; as he happens to be in this Court in which the indictment is to be tried, instead of having an Habeas Corpus the Court is to be applied to for a simple order to carry him before the Grand Jury, and and your Lordships order is regularly granted.

Mr. Justice Gould.—You do not put that as a motion of mere course?

Mr. Mansfield.—Whether there may possibly exist cases in which the Court will not permit, I will not go so far as to say, there may be, I don't know that there are; because this I am sure of, that if the prisoner was in another gaol, and his evidence was wanted before a Grand Jury, that the prosecutor upon applying for an Habeas Corpus might have it most certainly; if there may be cases in which it would not be admitted, they must in truth be of a very extraordinary nature: this order of your lordships has been talked of as if, when it was obtained, it gave some weight and effect to this man's testimony; but your lordships know that you neither do nor can make a man a witness, a man is or not a witness by the law of England: that your lordships cannot make or alter; but you administer, and administer it wisely: but it is the law of England says, whether a man can or not be admitted a witness; if that law says, he cannot, it is not in the power of all the courts of judicature in this kingdom to make him; on the contrary, if he is a legal witness, no Court can say he shall not be; and the only purport of this order is to remove the body of the prisoner Robertson, and the only effect of it as it seems to me is this; that the gaoler, who would otherwise be exceedingly blameable in admitting the prisoner out of his gaol, is excused from all fault in so doing; let me suppose this man had escaped from the gaol, and had then gone before the Grand Jury, is it to be doubted that if he was by law a competent witness, that his evidence might be received wherever he offers himself as a witness, though he had escaped from gaol; and your lordships order goes simply to the fact of the gaoler carrying the body of this prisoner before the Grand Jury; and the only difference seems to me, that the gaoler carrying the prisoner out of the gaol without permission from the Court, he might have behaved improperly, but however the witness himself as to his competency could not possibly be affected by the manner in which he went before the Grand Jury: I have heard it said indeed to-day that it may depend upon the Court, that it may depend upon the committing magistrate, whether an accomplice shall be a witness or not; I know of no such law; I know it may depend upon the Court whether a man who has been used as a witness and is afterwards attempted to be tried; whether in the judgment of the Court he is to be put upon his trial; or whether the manner in which he has been used as a witness does entitle him to be excused from prosecution; so a magistrate sometimes advises a person to be admitted as a witness who is an accomplice, and who is perhaps at the same time in gaol; he takes a recognizance from him to appear as an evidence; the Court will afterwards consider whether that person has acted so properly as to be excused from a trial; but this is the first time I have heard it said that the competency of a witness depended upon any magistrate of this kind, and as high and great a regard as I have for your lordships sitting here, I should be very sorry, for one, to have the law of England so changed, that it might depend upon the discretion of judges, and not upon the fixed rules of law, whether a man shall be a witness or not. Thus much upon the first objection, that this man was improperly carried before the Grand Jury; whether he was properly, or whether he was improperly carried is to this point we are now considering totally immaterial; the persons who were guilty of improperly carrying him, those who without legal authority procured the gaoler to let him go, may be worthy of censure; but as to the competency of the witness himself it seems to me to make no sort of difference. I am sorry, my learned friend who last spoke, introduced into this cause something of which you cannot take notice, but which seems to me to cast reflections upon those for whom I am concerned, whom I know are not worthy of such reflections, and the account given by Robertson is, that what he did was totally founded in mistake; in answer to which it is necessary for me to say something, and I will say as little as I can, though I should be justified in saying a great deal more; the argument supposes, at least, that Robertson was as great a criminal as any other person accused, nay, that he was the principal offender; I, who know as much, I believe, as any body can know of this cause, am very far from entertaining that opinion of Robertson; for though I think he acted blameably, yet as there are degrees of guilt, as far as the matter is understood by me, Robertson is considered as almost innocent, for I am perfectly satisfied that Robertson was really persuaded that the bond was genuine; this however does not appear before your lordships, and therefore should not be mentioned; I speak it only because I would not have those for whom I stand suffer from a reflection which is perfectly unmerited, and those persons too are incapable of making any bargain with Ro-

Robertson or any other man, in order to bring about any thing improper in this or any cause, but especially in one like this, where the life of a person is concerned; it was thought proper, it was by my advice, and that is enough to excuse all others concerned in the business, that Robertson should be received as a witness; now as to Robertson being guilty or having acted a criminal part, the whole of the argument your lordships see assumed is, how does your lordships know, or how can you know, what part Robinson acted?

Mr. Justice Willes.—All that we know is, he is committed for the same crime, we do not assume it, but we judge from his commitment that he is equally guilty.

Mr. Mansfield.—He is committed for the same crime; is it for a court of justice without evidence or hearing a circumstance of the matter, to know that the magistrate is justified in committing him for that crime, that there was evidence to find him guilty, or that he may not be perfectly innocent? I have never yet heard that the commitment by a magistrate is in any place a presumption of guilt against a man who is committed; it cannot be; it never is heard of in any instance at all that appears; and all that is stated with regard to Robertson, is, that he is committed for the same crime, and so might the most innocent man alive be; nay, innocent men are committed, and consequently upon the commitment of a man for a capital crime, it is the magistrate's duty to bind by recognizance the person that appears to prosecute him who is so committed; the recognizance, as it seems to me, makes no difference in the case at all, because it is the necessary consequence of the commitment; as no magistrate can be justified in committing a man for a capital crime, who does not also bind the person who appears as prosecutor, by recognizance, to prosecute the person committed: all that appears before your lordships, is, that this man is committed for the same crime that Dr. Dodd is; there is, as I say, no evidence at all before your lordships of the guilt of this man, that can be taken as any thing like evidence; for this is the first time I ever heard it suggested in a court, that a man who was committed for a crime, was by that commitment defensible from being a witness; I never heard of such a doctrine being insinuated; suppose it now appears, which it does not, nor can it, that Robertson was equally guilty with Dr. Dodd; I will suppose it, that it appeared that it was possible for any man to know without forming presumption

(which he is not authorized to form) that Robertson is equally guilty with Dr. Dodd: I will suppose it appeared so; why is it not the practice in this Court every sessions? where accomplices in the greatest crimes are admitted as witnesses, they are admitted with a degree of reserve, who by their single testimony cannot convict a person.

Mr. Justice Gould.—I wish to see the opinion upon the subject which is in print; I recollect where the dividing line was there; I held, that the justice of peace, by a constant and established practice, and I have seen things since to confirm that, particularly a very learned treatise by the late Mr. Fielding, concerning the growth and encrease of robberies; he lays it down as a known practice, that they do judge upon all the circumstances appearing before them, which of the criminals to admit as the witness, that matter was disputed from by ten of the twelve judges; but as I understood their opinion to be, it was then to be in the discretion, not of the justice of peace, but in the discretion of the court of gaol delivery, where it was found necessary, which of the persons committed for a capital crime should be admitted as a witness; I believe Mr. Reynolds was present when that opinion was delivered; he told me; according to his remembrance, that was said by the learned judge here.

Mr. Mansfield.—The question then was solely upon the privilege of Mrs. Rudd, not upon the competency as a witness.

Mr. Justice Gould.—The true reason of that decision was, that that was a matter for the discretion of the justice of peace, to hold forth an absolute indemnity.

Mr. Justice Willes.—I am of opinion the judges went upon the general principle, that in that case, the inferior magistrate was to exercise a discretion.—Mr. Mansfield, before you go on, I would mention, that the argument on the part of the prisoner points itself very strong this way, that no person committed for the same offence shall be allowed to be an evidence against a co-criminal without the interference of some legal authority, and in this case, there is no legal authority authorizing him to be a witness.

Mr. Mansfield.—With regard to the case of Mrs. Rudd, it never was made a doubt, whether Mrs. Rudd could be a witness; but the question was, Mrs. Rudd having been in fact taken and tried as a witness by the magistrate, whether she should should be considered as entitled to an indemnity which should screen her from prosecution; and that I apprehended was the only question: so in the general opinion expressed by the judges, I never conceived or apprehended, that it was meant so be considered by the judges, whether they could or could not say a criminal, an accomplice, should or should not be a witness; they can say, when the person is brought before them to be tried, whether they shall hold him entitled to favour or prevent his being convicted; they can say too, where the prosecutors, who are bound by recognizance to prosecute a person committed, shall be relieved from that recognizance, because they have thought proper not to prosecute the man, but use him as a witness; but it is new to me, if it is to depend upon the discretion of the judges, whether an accomplice is a competent witness, for that is the argument made use of here. It is to depend upon the discretion of the judges, whether an accomplice is a competent witness; now that position is utterly new to me; all the favours that a man derives from being a witness, all the consequential steps which are to affect the prosecutor, one way or the other for not prosecuting, all those must depend upon the discretion and judgment of the Court, at the time when that matter comes before them; but as to the admission of a witness, as to the question of his competency, I do apprehend it must depend, not upon the discretion of the Court, but upon the rules of law. With regard to the present question, what is it Mr. Robertson has proved to the Grand Jury? As to parts of the case, it cannot be doubted, that Mr. Robertson might be permitted to give evidence, if he chose it; that he did not receive the bond from Lord Chesterfield; for instance, that he did receive it from Dr. Dodd; that he knows no more of it; can any mortal say, that as to these questions, Mr. Robertson, let him stand in what predicament he will, is not a competent witness? I have no doubt, nor have I heard an argument suggested, that he cannot be a witness throughout, but what law or dictum is found, which warrants the doctrine contended for? that this man is not to be received as a witness, a case is produced from Lord Hale, in which two men being actually charged or indicted, one is admitted an evidence against the other.

Mr. Justice Gould.—In that case, it is expressly said, that by the advice of Mr. Justice Brown, a very learned and eminent man, and Mr. Wylde the recorder, who was afterwards a very learned judge at Westminster-hall, Perrin was admitted a witness against Trew; Perrin confessing himself guilty of that burglary, he was admitted an evidence.

Mr. Mansfield.—Advice there, I should suppose, must mean a legal opinion of the court; for a judge, sitting in his judicial character, does not advise prosecutors; it is the province of those in a different place to give advice; judges only give legal opinions, and when it is said by advice, it seems to me it can mean nothing else but a legal judgment.

Mr. Baron Perryn.—If any advice was asked of a judge, except sitting in judgment, I should think it exceedingly improper.

Mr. Mansfield.—Then, all that I can collect from thence, is, that in the opinion of the judges, he was a legal witness; in another way, if it was to depend upon that question, whether he being admitted a witness, is to be prosecuted for other crimes; here it must be determined by the judgment and discretion of the Court, whether the man is so used as a witness, that he is entitled to any protection; that judgment must be exercised according to legal discretion; but where the word advice is used as applied to a man's competency, it must mean that the judgment of the court was, that he was competent; another case mentioned by Mr. Buller is—

Mr. Justice Willes.—The other case is, if two defendants be charged for a crime, one shall not be examined against the other to convict him of an offence unless the party examined confesses himself guilty, and then he shall be admitted.

Mr. Mansfield.—But the charge must mean legal charge, must mean charge upon an indictment, for there is no other way of charging.

Mr. Justice Willes.—Charge and indictment are synonymous words in the law of England.

Mr. Mansfield.—In ——— reports, it is said that a particeps criminis may be admitted as a witness; where a person was indicted for treason, and others were concerned in that treason, the party that confessed it might be a witness.

Mr. Baron Perryn.—There is no doubt of that.

Mr. Mansfield.—Then there is an end of all questions as to the competency of this man's evidence.

Mr. Justice Willes.—No doubt as to his competency.

Mr. Mansfield.—The arguments against this man were, that he was an accomplice, to which I before gave your lordships what appeared appeared to me to be a satisfactory answer. Although twenty witnesses appear upon the back of an indictment, if one witness satisfies the Grand Jury that the man ought to be tried, they often proceed no further in examining witnesses; whether either of them proved enough to warrant the bill, it is impossible for the Court to say; if your lordships were to stop the proceeding for any thing that now appears, you must presume that the Grand Jury found the bill upon the testimony of a man whom, if there be an objection to, they ought not to have heard; now that presumption in law does not authorize your lordships at all, because if the Grand Jury were to examine twenty witnesses, nineteen of whom should prove nothing, yet their names must appear upon the back of the indictment; and your lordships have no ground now upon which you can presume that the Grand Jury did find the bill upon a circumstance that they ought not to have heard; and unless therefore your lordships can do that which the Grand Jury are not authorized to enable you to do, unless you can yourselves say, that the Grand Jury have found this bill upon an exceptionable man's evidence, supposing there was any exception to him, unless you can say there is no foundation for the application now made, which it is clear you cannot say, because the Grand Jury may have paid no attention to more than one of the witnesses; and if upon the evidence of any one, however they might disregard the rest, there was such a ground appeared to them, as made it fit for them to find the indictment, they would be bound to find it. I have heard it said by one of my friends in argument, that it is totally immaterial, as Robertson's name appears here, whether the Grand Jury believed him or not; whether what he said was material or not, is nothing to the purpose: I beg leave to say the contrary; the form of business is, the witnesses are sworn, and their names are put upon the indictment before they go in to the Grand Jury, the Grand Jury then call the names appearing upon the indictment; they don't often examine them all; they examine as many as they think proper, and it is impossible for your lordships to say, that the Grand Jury found the indictment upon this, or that man's evidence, or to know whether they had a legal authority for finding the bill; therefore I trust your lordships will be of opinion that this trial is to go on, recollecting that this is admitted to be the first attempt of the sort that ever was made for rejecting a bill upon a supposed knowledge of what passed before the Grand Jury, and I submit to your lordships that it is entirely without authority.

Mr. Justice Willes.—Mr. Davenport, before you go on, tell us if you know of any case where a prisoner committed as a principal has been admitted an evidence against a person concerned with him in the same offence, without the interference of a magistrate or the direction of the Court before whom the matter is to be tried?

Mr. Davenport.—I hope to satisfy your lordships, that the constant practice has always been so; it depends upon the practice, and not upon any written authority.

Mr. Justice Willes.—The clerk of assize has come to me on the circuit, and said such a justice of peace has examined this matter, and wishes, if you have no objection to it, that one prisoner may be admitted an evidence against the other; then I always pay that deference to the discretion of the justice, unless the circumstances make it improper to do as he has desired: sometimes the clerk of assize has brought me the informations taken by the justice of peace; I look over them carefully and exercise my discretion, whether such a person ought or not to be admitted an evidence against a co-defendant, and if I see there is no probability of convicting him by the assistance of that evidence, then I never admit him: I wish Mr. Reynolds would say what has been the practice at this Court, of which he is a very old officer.

Mr. Reynolds.—The judges were of opinion that every accomplice, or every man charged with a felony, that was intended by the justice to give evidence, should notwithstanding that be committed as a principal; and they mentioned as a circumstance, suppose such a man broke gaol, can he be indicted for felony? now with regard to the orders for removing persons where it appears by the calendar, that they were committed expressly to give evidence; orders have always been granted for their being removed to the proper Jury, without asking any thing of the Court; but I never knew an instance in my life where two persons were committed as principals, that ever an order was made of course, or was ever done without the particular directions of the judges to the officer.

The Life of Bishop Beveridge.

BEVERIDGE (William) a learned and venerable English prelate, was born at Barrow, in Leicestershire, in the year 1638. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he applied with great assiduity to the study of the oriental languages, and made such proficiency in this part of learning, that at eighteen years of age, he wrote a treatise of the excellency and use of the oriental tongues, especially the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Samaritan, with a Syriac grammar. He became successively vicar of Yeaving in Middlesex, rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill, prebendary of St. Paul's cathedral, archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Canterbury, chaplain in ordinary to king William and queen Mary; and, in 1704, was promoted to the bishopric of St. Asaph. This dignity, however, he enjoyed but a short time; for he died the 5th of March, 1708, at the age of seventy, and was interred in St. Paul's cathedral. He wrote, 1. Institutionum Chronologicarum Libri Duo: 2. The Church Catechism explained: 3. Private Thoughts upon Religion: 4. Private Thoughts upon a Christian Life: 5. One hundred and fifty Sermons and Discourses on several subjects: 6. Theſaurus Theologicus; or, a complete System of Divinity: 7. An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles; and some other works.

Bishop Beveridge was highly instructive in his discourses from the pulpit; and his labours were crowned with such success, that he was styled, "The great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." The author of a letter published in the Guardian, having made an extract out of one of the bishop's sermons, tells us, that it may, for acuteness of judgment, ornament of speech, and true sublime, compare with any of the choicest writings of the ancient fathers, or doctors of the church. Dr. Henry Felton, in his Dissertation on the Classics tells us, "that our learned and venerable bishop hath delivered himself with those ornaments alone, which his subject suggested to him, and hath written in that plainness and solemnity of style, that gravity and simplicity, which give authority to the sacred truths he teacheth, and unanswerable evidence to the doctrines he defendeth; that there is something so great, primitive, and apostolical in his writings, that it creates an awe and veneration in our mind: That the importance of his subjects is above the decoration of words, and what is great and majestic in itself, looketh most like itself, the less it is adorned."

The Life of Mr. John Biddle.

Biddle (John) an eminent Socinian writer, was born at Wotton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, in the year 1615, and educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford. In 1641 he took his degree, gree of master of arts; and the magistrates of Gloucester choosing him master of the free-school of St. Mary le Crypt in that city; he settled there, and was much esteemed for his diligence; but falling into some opinions concerning the Trinity, different from those commonly received, and expressing his thoughts with too much freedom, he was accused of heresy, and on the 2d of December, 1645, committed to the common jail; but was discharged on a gentleman's giving security for his appearance, when the parliament should send for him. Six months after his enlargement, he was summoned to appear at Westminster, and a committee being appointed by the parliament to examine him, he freely told them, that he did not believe the commonly received notion of the divinity of the Holy Ghost, but was ready to hear what could be opposed against him. He was at length, after many delays, committed to the custody of one of their officers, and referred to the assembly of divines then sitting at Westminster, before whom he often appeared, and gave them in writing twelve arguments he had drawn up against the divinity of the Holy Ghost, which were printed in the year 1647. Upon their publication, he was summoned to appear at the bar of the house of commons, where being asked if he owned that treatise, and the opinions it contained, he answered in the affirmative, upon which he was committed to prison, in September, 1647, and the block burnt by the hangman.

The next year Mr. Biddle published two tracts, one entitled, A Confession of Faith touching the Holy Trinity, according to the Scripture; and the other, The Testimonies of Irenæus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Novatianus, Theophilus, Origen, Eusebius, &c. concerning one God, and the Persons of the Holy Trinity. These were no sooner published, than the assembly of divines solicited the parliament, and procured an ordinance inflicting death upon those who held opinions contrary to the received doctrine of the Trinity, and severe penalties upon those who differed in smaller matters. Mr. Biddle however escaped by a dissension in the parliament, and the ordinance lying unregarded for several years, his keeper, upon his giving security, suffered him to go into Staffordshire, where he was hospitably entertained by a justice of peace. But Bradshaw, president of the council of state, hearing of the indulgence granted him, caused him to be recalled, and more strictly confined.

In 1651, Biddle was restored to liberty; and in 1654 he published his Larger and Shorter Scripture Catechisms, for which he was brought to the bar of the house of commons, and committed close prisoner to the Gate-house; but after about six months imprisonment, he was acquitted by the court of king's bench. The next year, being accused of blasphemy, he was sent to Newgate, and ordered to be tried for his life at the ensuing sessions; but the protector not choosing to have him either condemned or acquitted, took him out of the hands of the law, and detained him in prison; and, at length, being weary of receiving petitions for and against him, banished him to St. Mary's castle, in the Isle of Scilly. But in 1658, Biddle was brought back to London by a habeas corpus, and, nothing being then laid to his charge, was set at liberty, and became pastor of an independent meeting. Upon the restoration of Charles II. when the liberty of dissenters was taken away, he restrained himself from public to more private assemblies; but on the first of June, 1662, he was seized in his lodging, where he and a few of his friends were met for divine worship: they were taken before a justice of peace, who committed them to prison, where they lay till the recorder took security for their answering to the charge brought against them at the next sessions. But the court being unable to find a statute whereon to form any criminal indictment, they were referred to the sessions following, and proceeded against at common law: each of the hearers was fined twenty pounds, Mr. Biddle one hundred, and ordered to lie in prison till it was paid: but in less than five weeks, he, by his close confinement, contracted a disease, which put an end to his life on the 22d of September, 1662, in the forty seventh year of his age. He was a man of great learning and piety, and of the most irreproachable life. He had so happy a memory, that he retained word for word the whole New Testament, not only in English, but in Greek, as far as the fourth chapter of the Revelation of St. John.

The Life of Sir Richard Blackmore.

Blackmore (Sir Richard) an eminent physician, and an indefatigable writer, who has left a great number of works, theological, poetical, and physical. He received the first part of his education at a private school in the country, from whence he was removed to Westminster, and afterwards to the university of Oxford. When he had finished his academical studies, he travelled to Italy, and took his degrees in physic at Padua. He also visited France, Germany, and the Low Countries, and after a year and a half's absence, returned to England, where he practised physic, and was chosen fellow of the college of physicians. His zeal for the Revolution recommended him to king William III. who, in 1697, made him one of his physicians in ordinary. That prince also conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and presented him with a gold medal and chain. Upon queen Anne's accession to the throne, he was appointed one of her physicians, and continued in that capacity for some time.

Mr. Dryden and Mr. Pope have treated the poetical performances of Sir Richard with great contempt; the former says, that he

"Writ to the rumbling of his coach's wheels."

Mr. Pope thus characterises him in his Dunciad, Book II. ver. 259.

"But far o'er all, sonorous Blackmore's strain;

"Walls, steeples, sties, bray back to him again.

"In Tot nam fields the brethren, with amaze,

"Prick all their ears up, and forget to graze;

"Long Chancery-Lane retentive rolls the
"sound,

"And courts to courts return it round and

"round;

"Thames wafts it thence to Rufus' roaring
"hall,

"And Hungerford re-echoes bawl for bawl.

"All hail him victor in both gifts of song,

"Who sings so loudly, and who sings so long."

But notwithstanding Sir Richard has been so much depreciated by these wits, yet he must be allowed some merit. His poem on the Creation is his most celebrated performance. Mr. Addison, after having criticised on that book of Milton, which gives an account of the works of the creation, thus proceeds: "I cannot conclude this book upon the creation, without mentioning a poem which has lately appeared under that title. The work was undertaken with so good an intention, and is executed with so great a mastery, that it deserves to be looked upon as one of the most useful and noble productions in our English verse. The reader cannot but be pleased to find the depths of philosophy enlivened with all the charms of poetry, and to see so great a strength of reason, amidst so beautiful a redundancy of imagination, &c." It must be mentioned too in honour of sir Richard, that he was a chaste writer, and a warm advocate for virtue, at a time when an almost universal degeneracy prevailed. He had been very free in his censures upon the libertine writers of the age, and it was owing to some liberties he had taken of this kind, that he drew upon him the resentment of Mr. Dryden. He had likewise given offence to Mr. Pope; for having been informed by Mr. Curl that he was the author of a travestie on the first Psalm, he took occasion to reprehend him for it in his essay on polite learning.

Sir Richard Blackmore died on the 9th of October, 1729. He wrote, 1. Essays on several subjects, in two volumes, octavo. 2. History of the conspiracy against king William III. a few Theological Tracts, and the following poetical and medicinal pieces: 3. Creation. 4. The Redeemer. 5. Eliza. 6. King Arthur. 7. Prince Arthur. 8. King Alfred. 9. A new Version of the Book of Psalms. 10. A Paraphrase on the Book of Job. 11. The Nature of Man. 12. A Collection of Poems. 13. A Treatise on the Small-Pox. 14. A Discourse on the Plague. 15. A Treatise on Consumptions. 16. Another on the Spleen and Vapours. 17. A critical Dissertation on the Spleen. 18. Dissertations on Dropsies. 19. Discourses on the Gout.

The Life of Mr. John Blagrave.

Blagrave (John) an excellent English mathematician, who flourished in the 16th and 17th centuries, was the second son of John Blagrave, of Bulmarsh-court, in Berkshire. He received the rudiments of his education at Reading, from whence he removed to St. John's college, Oxford. He soon quitted the university, and retired to Southcote-Lodge, near Reading, where he devoted his time to study and contemplation. His genius seemed to be chiefly turned to mathematics, and that he might study this science without interruption, he had added himself to a retired life. He published the four following valuable works, viz. 1. A Mathematical Jewel. 2. Of the Making and Use of the Familiar Familiar Staff. 3. Astrolabium Uranicum Generale. 4. The Art of Dialling. Mr. Blagrave was a man of great beneficence in private life. As he was born in the town of Reading, and had spent most of his time there, he was therefore desirous of leaving in that place some monuments of his beneficent disposition, and such too as might have reference to each of the three parishes of Reading. He accordingly bequeathed a legacy for this purpose. We have an account of it by Mr. Ashmole, in the following words: "You are to note, that he doth devise that each church-warden should send on Good-Friday one virtuous maid that has lived five years with her master. All three maids appear at the town-hall before the mayor and aldermen, and cast dice. She that throws most has ten pounds put in a purse, and she is to be attended by the other two that lost the throw. The next year come again the two maids, and one more added to them. He orders in his will that each maid should have three throws before she loses it; and if she has no luck in the three years, he orders that still new-faces may come and be presented. It is lucky money, for I never heard but the maid that had the ten pounds suddenly had a good husband." Mr. Blagrave died at his house near Reading, the 9th of August, 1611, and was interred near his mother in the church of St. Lawrence, in that town.

The Life of Admiral Robert Blake.

Blake (Robert) a celebrated English admiral, was born at Bridgwater, in Somersetshire, in August, 1598. Of his earliest years we have no other account, than that, during his father's life-time, he was educated at a free-school in Bridgwater. In 1615, he was admitted into the University of Oxford, where he continued till 1623, and took the degree of bachelor of arts. After leaving Oxford, he retired to his native place, where he lived without any appearance of ambition to be a greater man than he was; but inveighed with great freedom against the licence of the times, and power of the court. In 1640, he was chosen burgess for Bridgwater, by the Puritan party, to whom he had recommended himself by his disapprobation of bishop Laud's violence and severity, and his non-compliance with those new ceremonies which that prelate was then endeavouring to introduce. When the civil war broke out, Blake, in conformity with his avowed principles, declared for the parliament; and, thinking a bare declaration for right not all the duty required of a good man, raised a troop of dragoons for his party, and appeared in the field with great intrepidity. In 1645, he was governor of Taunton, when lord Goring came before it with an army of ten thousand men. The town was ill-fortified, and unsupplied with almost every thing necessary for supporting a siege. The state of this garrison encouraged col. Wyndham, who was acquainted with Blake, to propose a capitulation; which was rejected by Blake with indignation and contempt. Nor were either menaces or persuasions of any effect; for he maintained the place under all its disadvantages, till the siege was raised by the parliament's army. For his gallant behaviour on this occasion, the parliament ordered Blake a present of five hundred pounds.

In 1649, he was made a commissioner of the navy, and appointed to serve on that element, for which he seems by nature to have been designed. He was soon after sent in pursuit of Prince Rupert, whom he shut up in the harbour of Kinsale, in Ireland, for several months, till want of provisions, and despair of relief, excited the prince to make a daring effort for his escape, by forcing through the parliament's fleet. This design he executed with great intrepidity, and succeeded in it, though with the loss of three ships. He was pursued by Blake to the coast of Portugal, where Rupert was received into the Tagus, and treated with great distinction by the Portuguese. Blake coming to the mouth of that river, sent a messenger to the king, to inform him, that the fleet in his port belonging to the enemy of the commonwealth of England, he demanded leave to attack it. This being refused, though the refusal was in very soft terms, and accompanied with declarations of esteem, and a present of provisions, so exasperated the admiral, that, without any hesitation, he fell upon the Portuguese fleet, then returning from Brasil, of which he took seventeen ships, and burnt three. It was to no purpose that the king of Portugal, alarmed at so unexpected a destruction, ordered Prince Rupert to attack them, and re-take the Brasil ships; for Blake carried home his prizes without molestation, the Prince not having force sufficient to pursue him. Blake soon supplied his fleet with provisions, and received orders to make reprisals upon the French who had suffered their privateers to molest the English trade. Sailing with this commission, he took in his way a French man of war, which is said to have been worth a million. Then following Prince Rupert, whose fleet was now reduced to five ships, into Carthagea, he demanded leave of the Spanish governor to attack him in the harbour; but received answer, that they had a right to protect all ships that came into their dominions; that if the admiral was forced in thither, he should find the same security; and that he required him not to violate the peace of a neutral port. Blake withdrew upon this answer into the Mediterranean; and Rupert, leaving Carthagea, entered the port of Malaga, where he burnt and sunk several English merchant ships. Blake judging this to be an infringement of the neutrality professed by the Spaniards, now made no scruple of attacking Rupert's fleet in the harbour of Malaga; and having destroyed three of his ships, obliged him to quit the sea, and take sanctuary at the Spanish court.

In 1651, Blake, still continuing to cruise in the Mediterranean, met with a French ship of considerable force, and commanded the captain to come on board, there being no war declared between the two nations. The captain, when he came, was asked by him, "whether he was willing to lay down his sword, and yield;" which he gallantly refused, though in his enemy's power. Blake, scorning to take advantage of an artifice, and detesting the appearance of treachery, told him that "he was at liberty to go back to his ship, and defend it as long as he was able." The Captain willingly accepted his offer, and after a fight of two hours, confessed himself conquered, kissed his sword, and surrendered it. This ship, with four others, Blake sent into England;

England; and not long after, arriving at Plymouth with his Squadron, he there received the thanks of the parliament for his vigilance and valour in his station, and was constituted one of the lord-wardens of the cinque ports, as an additional mark of their esteem and confidence.*

In 1652, broke out the memorable war between the two commonwealths of England and Holland; a war, in which the greatest admirals that perhaps any age has produced, were engaged on each side: in which nothing less was contested than the dominion of the sea, and which was carried on with vigour, animosity, and resolution, proportioned to the importance of the dispute. The chief commanders of the Dutch fleets were, Van Trump, De Ruyter, and De Witt, the most celebrated names of their own nation, and who had been perhaps more renowned, had they been opposed by any other enemies. The states of Holland having carried on their trade without opposition, and almost without competition, not only during the inactive reign of king James I. but during the commotions of England, had arrived to such a height of naval power, and such affluence of wealth, that, with the arrogance which a long-continued prosperity naturally produces, they began to invent new claims, and to treat other nations with insolence, which nothing can defend but superiority of force. They had for some time made uncommon preparations at a vast expence, and had equipped a large fleet, without any apparent danger threatening them, or any avowed design of attacking their neighbours. This unusual armament was not beheld by the English without some jealousy, and care was taken to fit out such a fleet as might secure the trade from interruption, and the coasts from insults: of this Blake was constituted admiral for nine months. In this situation the two nations remained, keeping a watchful eye upon each other, without actual hostilities on either side, till the 18th of May, 1652, when Van Trump appeared in the Downs, with a fleet of forty-five men of war. Blake, who had then but twenty-three ships, upon the approach of the Dutch admiral, saluted him with three single shot, to require that he should strike his flag; upon which Van Trump, in contempt, fired on the contrary side. Blake fired a second and a third gun, which the Dutch admiral answered with a broadside: the English admiral therefore, perceiving his intention to fight, detached himself from the rest of his fleet to treat with Van Trump upon that point of honour, and to prevent the effusion of blood, and a national quarrel. When Blake approached nearer to Van Trump, he and the rest of his fleet, contrary to the law of nations, (the English admiral coming with a design to treat) fired on Blake with whole broadsides. The admiral was in his cabin drinking with some officers, little expecting to be so saluted, when the shot broke the windows of his ship, and shattered the steen, which put him into a vehement passion; so that curling his whiskers, as was his custom when angry, he commanded his men to answer the Dutch in their kind, saying, when his heat was somewhat over, "he took it very ill of Van Trump, that he should take his ship for a bawdy-house, and break his windows."—Blake for some time stood alone against the whole Dutch fleet, till the rest of his Squadron came up, and the fight was continued from between four and five in the afternoon till nine at night, when the Dutch retired with the loss of two ships, having not destroyed a single vessel, nor more than fifteen men.

In the latter end of September, Blake, who was stationed in the Downs with about sixty sail, discovered the Dutch admirals De Witt and De Ruyter, with near the same number, and advanced towards them; but the Dutch being obliged, by the nature of their coast, and the shallowness of their rivers, to build their ships in such a manner, that they require less depth of water than the English vessels, took advantage of the form of their shipping, and sheltered themselves behind a flat, called Kentish-knock; so that the English, finding some of their ships a-ground, were obliged to alter their course; but perceiving early the next morning that the Hollanders had forsaken their station, they pursued them with all the speed that the wind, which was weak and uncertain, allowed; but found themselves unable to reach them with the bulk of their fleet, and therefore detached some of the lightest frigates to chase them. These came so near as to fire upon them about three in the afternoon, but the Dutch, instead of tacking about hoisted their sails, steered towards their own coast, and finding themselves the next day followed by the whole English fleet, retired into Goree. That in this engagement the victory belonged to the English, is beyond dispute; since, without the loss of one ship, and with no more than forty men killed, they drove the enemy into their ports, took the Rear-Admiral and another vessel, and so discouraged the Dutch admirals, who had not agreed in their measures, that De Ruyter, who had declared against hazarding a battle, desired to resign his commission; and De Witt, who had insisted upon fighting, fell sick, as it was supposed, with vexation. But how great the loss of the Dutch was, is not certainly known; that two ships were taken, they are too wise to deny; but affirm that those two were all that were destroyed. The English, on the other side, affirm that three of their vessels were disabled at the first encounter, that their numbers on the second day were visibly diminished, and that on the last day they saw three or four ships sink in their flight.

De Witt being now discharged by the Hollanders as unfortunate, and the chief command restored to Van Trump, great preparations were made for retrieving their reputation, and repairing their losses. In the mean time, admiral Blake, who had weakened his fleet by many detachments, lay with no more than forty sail in the Downs, very ill provided both with men and ammunition, and expecting new supplies from the parliament,

Van Trump, having now the sole command of the Dutch fleet, was desirous of distinguishing himself by some remarkable action, and had therefore assembled eighty ships of war, and ten fire-ships, and steered towards the Downs; where Blake was then stationed. The English admiral, notwithstanding notwithstanding his force was so much inferior, resolved to give Van Trump battle, and got under sail accordingly; though his fleet was so weakly manned, that half his ships were obliged to lie idle, without engaging, for want of sailors. The force of the whole Dutch fleet was therefore sustained by about twenty-two ships. Two of the English frigates, named the Vanguard and the Victory, after having for a long time stood engaged amidst the whole Dutch fleet, broke through without much injury, nor did the English lose any ships till the evening, when the Garland, carrying forty guns, was boarded at once by two great ships, which were opposed by the English till they had scarcely any men left to defend the decks; then retiring into the lower part of the vessel, they blew up their decks, and at length were overpowered and taken. The Bonaventure, a stout well-built merchant-ship, going to relieve the Garland, was attacked by a man of war, and after a stout resistance, in which the captain, who defended her with the utmost bravery, was killed, was likewise carried off by the Dutch. Blake, in the Triumph, seeing the Garland in distress, pressed forward to relieve her; in his way he had his fore-mast shattered, and was himself boarded, but beating off the enemy, he disengaged himself, and retired into the Thames, with the loss of only two ships of force, and four small frigates, but with his whole fleet much shattered. Nor was the victory gained at a cheap rate, notwithstanding the disproportion of strength; for of the Dutch flag-ships, one was blown up and the other two disabled. A proof of the English bravery, which should have induced Van Trump to have spared the insolence of carrying a broom at his main-top-mast, in his triumphant passage through the channel, which he intended as a declaration that he would sweep the sea clear of the English shipping. This battle was fought on the 29th of November, 1652.

It was not long before Blake had an opportunity of revenging his loss, and restraining the insolence of the Dutch. On the 18th of February, 1653, he being at the head of eighty sail, and assisted by the colonels Monk and Dean, espied Van Trump with a fleet of above one hundred men of war, as Clarendon relates; of seventy, by their own public accounts, and three hundred merchant ships under his convoy. The English, with their usual intrepidity, advanced towards them; and Blake in the Triumph, with twelve other ships, came to an engagement with the main body of the Dutch fleet, and by the disparity of their force was reduced to the last extremity, having received in his hull no less than seven hundred shot, when Lawson, in the Fastax, came to his assistance. The rest of the English fleet now came in, and the fight was continued with vigour and resolution, till night gave the Dutch an opportunity of retiring, with the loss of one flag-ship, and six other men of war. The English had many vessels damaged, but none lost. On board Lawson's ship were killed one hundred men, and as many on board Blake's, who lost his captain and secretary, and himself received a wound in the thigh. Notwithstanding which, having put ashore his wounded men, he sailed in pursuit of Van Trump, who sent his convoy before, and himself retired fighting towards Boulogne. Blake, ordering his light frigates to follow the merchant men, still continued to harraß Van Trump; and on the third day, the 20th of February, the two fleets came to another battle, in which Trump once more retired before the English; and making use of the peculiar form of his shipping, secured himself in the shoals.

About the beginning of May, 1653, Blake, Monk, and Dean, sailed out of the English harbours with a hundred men of war, and finding the Dutch with seventy sail on their own coasts, drove them to the Texel, and took fifty dogger. They then sailed northward in pursuit of Van Trump, who having a fleet of merchants under his convoy, durst not enter the channel, but steered towards the Sound, and by his dexterity and address eluded the three English admirals, and brought all his ships into harbour; then knowing that Blake was still in the north, came before Dover, and fired upon the town, but was driven off by the castle. Monk and Dean stationed themselves again at the mouth of the Texel, and blocked up the Dutch in their own ports with eighty sail; but hearing that Trump was at Goree, with a hundred and twenty men of war, they ordered all ships of force in the river and ports to repair to them. On the third of June, the two fleets came to an engagement, in the beginning of which Dean was killed with a cannon-ball; yet the fight continued from about twelve to six in the afternoon, when the Dutch gave way, and retreated fighting. On the 4th in the afternoon, Blake came up with eighteen fresh ships, and procured the English a complete victory; nor could the Dutch any otherwise preserve their ships, than by retiring into the flats and shallows, where the largest of the English vessels could not approach. Our writers agree, that in the engagement the Dutch had six of their best ships sunk, two blown up, and eleven taken; six of their principal captains were made prisoners, and fifteen hundred men. On our side, admiral Dean and one captain were all the persons of note killed; of private men there were but few, and not a ship was missing; so that a more signal victory could scarcely be obtained or desired.

In March, 1655, admiral Blake, having forced Algiers to submission, entered the harbour of Tunis, demanding reparation for the robberies committed upon the English by the pirates of that place, and insisted that the captives of his nation should be set at liberty. The governor having planted batteries along the shore, and drawn up his ships under the castles, sent Blake a haughty and insolent answer; "There, said he, are our castles of Goletta and Porto Ferino, upon which you may do your worst;" adding other menaces and insults, and mentioning, in terms of ridicule, the inequality of a fight between ships and castles. Blake had likewise demanded leave to take in fresh water, which was refused him. Fired with indignation at this treatment, he began to curl his whiskers, and entering Porto Ferino with his great ships, discharged his shot so fast upon the batteries and castles, that in two hours the guns were dismounted, and the works forsaken, though he was at first exposed to the fire of sixty cannon. He then ordered his officers to send out their long-boats, well manned, to seize nine of the piratical ships lying in the road, himself continuing to fire upon the castle. This was so bravely executed, that with the loss of only twenty-five men killed, and forty-eight wounded, all the ships were fired in the sight of Tunis. Blake's exploits had before rendered him extremely formidable in Europe; and this daring action spread the terror of his name through Africa and Asia. From Tunis he went to Tripoli, and concluded a peace with that government; thence he returned to Tunis, and threatening to do further execution, the Tunisians implored his mercy, and begged him to grant them a peace, which he did on terms highly advantageous to England. From thence he sailed to Malta, to oblige the knights to restore the effects taken by their privateers from the English, where he had the same success as at Tripoli, Algiers, and Tunis, and brought the knights to reason. He exacted from the duke of Muscany 60,000*l.* and, as it is said, sent home sixteen ships, laden with the effects which he had received from several states. *

In 1656, the protector having declared war against Spain, dispatched Blake with twenty-five men of war to infest their coasts, and intercept their shipping. In pursuance of these orders, he cruized during the winter about the Streights, and then lay at the mouth of the harbour of Cadiz, where he received intelligence that the Spanish plate-fleet lay at anchor in the bay of Santa Cruz, in the Isle of Teneriffe. On the 13th of April, 1657, he departed from Cadiz, and on the 20th arrived at Santa Cruz. The fleet, which lay in the bay, consisted of six galleons, richly laden, and ten other vessels of less burthen. The ten smaller ships were drawn up in the form of a half-moon, with a strong barricado before them; and the six galleons, which could not come so near the shore, lay with their broadsides towards the sea. The bay was defended by six or seven forts, with several batteries all round it, and a cattle at the entrance, all which were sufficiently furnished with ordnance. In this posture, the Spanish admiral vainly thought himself so secure, that a Dutch merchant-ship going out of the harbour, he sent a message thereby to Blake, that "he might now come if he durst." But the Spaniard was not sufficiently acquainted with the man with whom he had to deal: for Blake now made one of the most desperate attempts that had ever been made at sea.

When the English fleet came to the mouth of the bay of Santa Cruz, our admiral, having taken a view of the enemy's situation, saw it would be impossible to bring off the galleons. However, he resolved to burn them, and, for that purpose, sent in captain Stayner, with a squadron, to attack them. He soon forced his passage into the bay, whilst other frigates entertained the forts, and lesser breast-works, with continual broadsides. These were presently supported by Blake himself, with the whole fleet, who placing some of his ships in such a manner that they might continually fire their broadsides into the castle and forts, he with Stayner continued to engage the Spanish fleet, and in a few hours obtained a complete victory, having driven the Spaniards from their ships, and possessed himself of every one of them. It being, however, impossible to bring them off, he ordered his men to let them on fire. They had no sooner done this, than the wind luckily turned, and carried the whole English fleet, without the loss of one ship, out of the bay, and put them safe to sea again.

"The whole action (says Clarendon) was so miraculous, that all men who knew the place, wondered that any sober men, with what courage soever endued, would ever have undertaken it; and they could hardly persuade themselves to believe what they had done: whilst the Spaniards comforted themselves with the belief that they were devils, and not men, who had destroyed them in such a manner. So much a strong resolution of bold and courageous men can bring to pass, that no resistance and advantage of ground can disappoint them. And it can hardly be imagined how small a loss the English sustained in this unparalleled action; not one ship being left behind, and the killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred men, when the slaughter on board the Spanish ships, and on shore, was incredible."

Blake returned, after this glorious action, to the coasts of Spain, where he cruized for some time off the harbour of Cadiz; but perceiving that his ships were become foul, and being seized with a dangerous disorder, he resolved to sail for England. In his passage home, it increased on him, and he became so sensible of his approaching end, that he frequently enquired for land, a mark of his affection for his native soil, which, however, he did not live to see; dying, as his ship, the St. George, entered Plymouth-sound, on the 17th of August, 1657, at about fifty-nine years of age. His body was the next day embalmed and wrapped in lead, his bowels taken out, and buried in the great church at Plymouth, and his corpse, by order of the protector, conveyed by water to Greenwich-house; from whence it was carried, on the 4th of September, to Westminster-abbey, and there interred with the utmost solemnity. After the restoration of king Charles II. his body, in virtue of his majesty's express command, was taken up and buried in a pit with others in St. Margaret's church-yard, on the 12th of September, 1661. "In which place," says Wood, "it now remaineth, enjoying no other monument but what is reared by his valour, which time itself can hardly efface." Some pains have been taken to extenuate this base action; and it has been said, that Blake's corpse was decently re-interred in St. Margaret's church-yard. What degree of decency was observed in the second burial, if it may be so termed, of this great man, we are not informed. This, however, is certain, that the removal of him from Westminster-abbey to St. Margaret's church-yard, was intended as an indignity; though, in fact, it reflected dishonour on those only who were guilty of the unworthy treatment of the remains of a gallant admiral, who was an honour to his country, and to the age in which he lived. But, as it is justly observed by a very ingenious writer, "that regard which was denied to his body, has been paid to his better remains, his name and his memory. Nor has any writer dared to deny him the praise of intrepidity, honesty, contempt of wealth, and love of his country."

Admiral Blake was in his person of a low stature, but of a quick, lively eye. He possessed a degree of courage which no dangers could dismay; and yet was cool in action, and shewed great military conduct in the disposition of the most desperate attacks. Though not bred to the profession of a seaman, and though he did not apply himself to it but at an advanced period of life, he distinguished himself by his naval exploits above all his contemporaries. He was just and upright; and so disinterested, that though he had great opportunities of enriching himself by the vast sums he had taken from the enemies of England, yet he threw it all into the public treasury, and did not die five hundred pounds richer than his father left him. He was jealous of the liberty of the subject, and the glory of his nation; and as he made use of no mean artifices to raise himself to the highest command at sea, so he required no interest but his merit to support him in it. He was pious without affectation, and liberal to the utmost extent of his fortune. He treated his officers with the familiarity of a friend; and by his tenderness and generosity to the seamen, he so endeared himself to them, that when he died they lamented his loss as that of their common father.

The earl of Clarendon says, "Blake was the first man that declined the old tack, and made it manifest that the science might be attained in less time than was imagined; and despised those rules which had been long in practice, to keep his ship and men out of danger, which had been held in former times a point of great ability and circumspection; as if the principal art requisite in the captain of a ship, had been to be sure to come safe home again. He was the first man who brought ships to contend castles on shore, which had been thought ever very formidable, and were discovered by him to make a noise only, to fright those who could be rarely hurt by them. He was the first that infused that proportion of courage into the seamen, by making them see by experience what mighty things they could do, if they were resolved; and taught them to fight in fire, as well as upon water; and though he hath been very well imitated and followed, he was the first that gave the example of that kind of naval courage, and bold and resolute achievements."

The Life of Mr. Thomas Blood.

Blood (Thomas) generally called colonel Blood, as extraordinary an adventurer as ever lived, was born in Ireland, about the year 1628. He served as a lieutenant in the parliament's army, and, after the restoration, laid a plan for seizing Dublin castle and the person of the duke of Ormond, then lord lieutenant of Ireland, which would certainly have taken effect, had it not been discovered in time; but, notwithstanding a reward was offered for taking him, he had the address to escape. After this, he, with five accomplices, seized the duke of Ormond in his coach, in the streets of Westminster, took him out, and carried him off in the dark towards Tyburn, where, it is thought, they intended to hang him, but being pursued by the duke's servants, his grace was rescued, yet Blood and his associates escaped. But the most bold and daring of all his attempts was that to carry off the regalia from the Tower; of which we shall give a particular account.

About three weeks before Blood made this attempt, he came to the Tower in the habit of a clergyman, with a woman whom he called his wife, to shew her the crown, and having seen it, he pretended to have a sick quail, and desired Mr. Edwards, the keeper of the crown, to send for some spirits; and when she had drank, Mrs. Edwards invited her to repose herself upon a bed, which she accepted of, and soon recovered. At their departure, they, in the warmest terms, expressed their gratitude, and about three days after, Blood returned with a present of four pair of gloves from his wife; and having thus begun the acquaintance, made frequent visits to improve it. In one of these visits, the pretended clergyman observed to Mr. Edwards, that his wife had at length thought of a handsome way of requital. "You have, said he, a pretty gentlewoman to your daughter, and I have a young nephew, who has two or three hundred pounds a year in land, and is at my disposal; if your daughter be free, and you approve of it, I'll bring him hither to see her, and we will endeavour to make it a match." This Mr. Edwards readily assented to, and invited Blood to dine with him that day, and he as cheerfully accepted the invitation. At his departure, he appointed a day and hour to bring his young nephew to his mistress. He came, as he had proposed, at eleven o'clock in the morning; he went to the jewel-house, with three of his associates, all armed with rapier-blades in their canes, and each having a dagger, and a pair of pocket-pistols. Two of his companions entered in with him, and the third staid at the door. Blood told Mr. Edwards, that he would not go up stairs till his wife came, and desired him to shew his friends the crown, to pass away time till then; but as soon as they had entered the room, and the door was (as usual) shut, they threw a cloak over the old man's head, clapped a gag into his mouth, and an iron hook to his nose, that no sound might pass that way; they then told him that they were resolved to have the crown, globe, and sceptre, and promised, if he would submit, to spare his life, otherwise he was to expect no mercy. The old man then struggled, and made all the noise he could, on which they knocked him down, gave him seven blows, and stabbed him in his belly, when, thinking him dead, they omitted tying his hands behind him; one of them put the globe into his breeches; Blood kept the crown under his cloak; the third designed to file the sceptre in two, because it was too long to carry conveniently; but before this could be done, young Mr. Edwards, the old gentleman's son, who had been in Flanders, arrived, and asking the man at the door, if he wanted his father, went up stairs. In the mean time, the conjugal gave notice of his arrival, and they immediately hasted away with the crown and globe, but left the sceptre. The old man suddenly rose, pulled out the gag, and cried, "Treason! Murder!" at which the daughter running down, and seeing her father wounded, rushed out upon Tower-hill, and cried, "Treason! the crown is stolen!" Instantly young Edwards and one captain Beckman pursued the villains, who were advanced beyond the main guard; and the alarm being given to the warden of the draw-bridge, he put himself in a posture to stop them, but Blood firing a pistol, though the bullet missed him, he dropped down, when getting to the little ward-house gate, the centinel let them pass; then running over the draw-bridge, they got upon the wharf, and hasted to their two other companions who held their horses at Iron Gate, crying themselves as they ran, stop the rogues! They were immediately overtaken by captain Beckman, at whom Blood discharged his second pistol, but he, stooping, avoided the shot, and seized upon him with the crown under his cloak; yet Blood, though he found himself a prisoner, had the impudence to struggle a long while for it; and when it was wrested from him, cried, "It was a gallant attempt, though unsuccessful, for it was for a crown." In short, not only Blood, but the rest of the gang were taken, and committed prisoners to the Tower. This happened on the 9th of May, 1671.

But what seems the most remarkable circumstance is still to be related. The duke of Buckingham raised the king's curiosity to see so extraordinary a person; on which Blood was carried to court, and introduced into the royal presence. His majesty enquired first into the particulars of the attempt on the duke of Ormond; when he confessed the fact, and added, that the duke had taken away his estate, and executed some of his friends, and that he and many others had engaged by solemn oaths to revenge it. He absolutely refused to betray his accomplices, and voluntarily told the king, that he had been engaged in a design to kill his majesty with a carbine, in a place near Battersea, where Charles used to bathe in the river; that with this view he had actually concealed himself among the reeds; but his spirits were so damped with the awe of majesty, that he relented, and diverted the rest of the associates from the design. He said he expected the utmost rigour of the law; but that he should die without concern: that, however, there were hundreds of his associates who had sworn to revenge the death of any individual of the confederacy, which would expose his majesty and all his ministers to the daily fear of assassination; but that if he would spare the lives of a few, and receive them to favour, he would oblige them to be as daring in his service. In short, the artful speeches of this villain had such an effect, that the king desired Blood to write to the duke of Ormond to beg his pardon; and not only forgave him and his associates, but, to the surprise of the whole kingdom, rewarded him by settling upon him a salary of five hundred pounds a year, and admitting him to all the privacy and intimacy of the court. Blood enjoyed his pension about ten years, till being charged with fixing an imputation of a scandalous nature on the duke of Buckingham, he was thrown into prison, where he died on the twenty-fourth of August, 1680.

The Life of Sir Thomas Bodley.

Bodley (Sir Thomas) from whom the Bodleian library at Oxford takes its name, was the eldest son of Mr. John Bodley, of Exeter, and was born in that city on the 2d of March, 1544. He was about twelve years of age, when his father, being obliged to leave England on account of religion, settled with his family at Geneva, where he lived a voluntary exile during the reign of queen Mary. In that university, then newly erected, young Mr. Bodley applied himself to the study of the learned languages and divinity. Upon the accession of queen Elizabeth, in 1558, he returned to England with his father, who settled in London; and soon after was sent to Magdalen college, in Oxford. In 1563, he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and the year following was admitted fellow of Merton college. In 1565, he undertook the reading of a Greek lecture in the hall of that college. In 1566, he took his degree of master of arts, and the same year read natural philosophy in the public schools. In 1569, he was elected one of the professors of the university; and, for a considerable time, supplied the place of university orator. In 1576, Mr. Bodley went abroad, and spent four years in France, Germany, and Italy, with a view of improving himself in the modern European languages; and upon his return he applied to the study of history and politics. In 1583, he was made gentleman-usher to queen Elizabeth; and in 1585, married a lady of considerable fortune. About two years afterwards, he was employed in several embassies, to Frederick king of Denmark, Julius duke of Brunswick, William Landgrave of Hesse, and other German princes, to engage them in the service of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France; and, having discharged that commission, he was sent to king Henry III. at the time when this prince was forced by the duke of Guise to quit Paris. In 1588, he was sent to the Hague, to manage the queen's affairs in the United Provinces; where, according to an agreement betwixt the queen and the states, he was admitted one of the council of state, and took his place next to count Maurice. In this station he behaved entirely to the satisfaction of queen Elizabeth; and after about five years residence in Holland, he obtained leave to return into England, to settle his private affairs; but was shortly after remanded back to the Hague. At length, having finished all his negotiations, he had his final revocation in 1597. After his return, finding his advancement at court obstructed by the jealousies and intrigues of the great men, though he was favoured by the earl of Essex, he retired from the court and all public business, and never a tier would accept of any new employment.

Mr. Bodley having thus quitted public affairs, formed a design of restoring, or rather founding anew, the public library at Oxford. Accordingly he wrote a letter to Dr. Ravis, dean of Christchurch, then vice-chancellor, to be communicated to the university; offering therein to restore the fabric of the library, and to settle an annual income income for the purchase of books, and the support of such officers as might be necessary to take care of it. This letter was received with the greatest satisfaction by the university, and an answer returned, testifying their most grateful acknowledgment and acceptance of his noble offer. Whereupon Mr. Bodley immediately set about the work, and in two years brought it to a good degree of perfection. He furnished it with a large collection of books, purchased in foreign countries at a great expence; and this collection in a short time became so much enlarged by the generous benefactions of several noblemen, bishops, and others, that neither the shelves nor the room could contain them. Mr. Bodley offering to make a considerable addition to the building, the motion was readily embraced, and, on the 19th of June, 1610, the first stone of the new foundation was laid with great solemnity, the vice-chancellor, doctors, masters of arts, &c. attending in their proper habits, and a speech being made upon the occasion. But Sir Thomas Bodley did not live to see this part of his design completed, though he left sufficient to do it with some friends in trust; for, as appears by the copy of his will, he bequeathed his whole estate (his debts, legacies, and funeral charges defrayed) to the noble purposes of this foundation. By this means, and the help of other benefactions, in procuring which Sir Thomas was very serviceable, by his great interest with many eminent persons; the university was enabled to add three other sides to what was already built; whereby a noble quadrangle was formed, as well as spacious rooms for schools of arts. By Sir Thomas's will, two hundred pounds per annum were settled on the library for ever; out of which he appointed near forty pounds to the head librarian, ten pounds for the sub-librarian, and eight for the junior. He likewise drew up a body of excellent statutes for the government of the library.

King James, upon his accession to the throne, had conferred the honour of knighthood on Mr. Bodley. He died on the 28th of January, 1612, and was buried with great solemnity at the upper end of Merton-college choir: over him is erected a monument of black and white marble, on which is placed his effigy, in a scholar's gown, surrounded with books: and at the four corners stand the figures of grammar, rhetoric, music, and arithmetic.

The Bodleian library is justly esteemed one of the noblest libraries in the world. King James I. we are told, when he came to Oxford, in the year 1605, and, among other edifies, took a view of this famous library, at his departure, in imitation of Alexander, broke out into the following speech: "If I were not a king, I would be an university-man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would have no other prison than that library, and be chained together with so many good authors." A statue was erected in this library, to the memory of Sir Thomas Bodley, by the earl of Dorset, chancellor of the university; and an annual speech in praise of Sir Thomas is still made at Oxford, on the eighth of November.

The Life of Hector Boethius, Boece, or Boeis.

Boethius, Boece, or Boeis, (Hector) a famous Scottish historian, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was born at Dundee, in the shire of Angus, about the year 1470. He studied at Dundee, Aberdeen, and Paris. at which last place he applied himself to philosophy, and became a professor of it there. Upon the death of his patron, bishop Elphinston, in 1514, he wrote his life, and added the lives of his predecessors in the see of Aberdeen. He also wrote the history of Scotland, which has been highly censured by some, and commended by others. He was a great master of classical and polite learning, well skilled in divinity, philosophy, and history, but somewhat credulous, and much addicted to the belief of legendary stories.

"The first president of the king's college in old Aberdeen (says Dr. Samuel Johnson) was Hector Boece, or Boethius, who may be justly revered as one of the revivers of elegant learning. The style of Boethius, though, perhaps, not always rigorously pure, is formed with great diligence upon ancient models, and wholly uninfected with monastic barbarity. His history is written with elegance and vigour, but his fabulousness and credulity are justly blamed. His fabulousness, if he was the author of the fictions, is a fault for which no apology can be made; but his credulity may be excused in an age, when all men were credulous. Learning was then rising on the world; but ages, so long accustomed to darkness, were too much dazzled with its light to see anything distinctly. The first race of scholars, in the fifteenth century, and some time after, were, for the most part, learning to speak, rather than to think, and were therefore more studious of elegance than of truth. The contemporaries of Boethius thought it sufficient to know what the ancients had delivered. The examination of tenets and of facts was reserved for another generation." *

The Life of George Boleyn.

Boleyn (George) viccount Rochford, the unfortunate brother of Anne Boleyn, was raised by her greatness, involved in her fall, and more cruelly in her disgrace. He was accused of too intimate familiarities with his sister, by a most infamous woman his wife, who continued a lady of the bedchamber to the three succeeding queens, till her admitting to the pleasures of the last of them, Catharine Howard, brought that sentence on her, which her malice or jealousy had drawn on her lord and her sister-in-law. The weightiest proof against them was, his having been seen to whisper the queen one morning as she was in bed. But that could make incert, where a jealous or fickle tyrant could make laws at his will! Little is recorded of this nobleman, but two or three embassies to France, his being made governor of Dover and the Cinque Ports, and his subscribing the famous declaration to Clement VII. Like earl Rivers, he rose by the exaltation of his sister; like him was innocently sacrificed on her account; and, like him, shewed that the lustre of his situation did not make him neglect to add accomplishments of his own. Wood says, he was much adored at court, especially by the female sex, for his admirable discourse and symmetry of body, which one may well believe, as the king and the lady Rochford would scarce have suspected the queen of incest, unless her brother had uncommon allurements in his person. Wood ascribes to him several poems, songs, and sonnets, with other things of the like nature; Bale calls them Rythmos elegantissimos. But none of his works are come down to us, unless any of the anonymous pieces, published with the earl of Surry's poems, be of his composition. Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

The Life of Bishop Bonner.

Bonner (Edmond) bishop of London, was born at Hanley in Worcestershire. In 1512, he became a student in Broadgate-Hall, now Pembroke-college, in Oxford. In 1519, he was admitted bachelor of the cannon and civil laws. About the same time, he entered into holy orders, and had some employment in the diocese of Worcester: and in 1525, he was created doctor of the cannon law. It does not appear that he distinguished himself much by his learning; but what principally recommended him, was his skill and dexterity in the management of affairs. It was this introduced him to the notice of Cardinal Wolsey, who appointed him his commissary for the faculties. He had several ecclesiastical preferments bestowed on him: he enjoyed at once the livings of Blaydon and Cherry Burton in Yorkshire, Ripple in Worcestershire, East-Dereham in Norfolk, and the prebend of Chiswick in the cathedral of St. Paul. He was installed archdeacon of Leicester on the 17th of October, 1535. After the death of Wolsey, Dr. Bonner found means to insinuate himself into the good graces of king Henry VIII. who appointed him one of his chaplains.

In 1532, Sir Edward Carne was sent to Rome, to excuse king Henry from appearing there, in person, or by proxy, to answer queen Catharine's appeal, agreeable to the pope's citation for that purpose. And bishop Burnet says, that "Dr. Bonner went with him, who had expressed much zeal in the king's cause, though his great zeal was for preferment, which by the most servile ways he always courted. He was a forward bold man; and since there were many threatenings to be used to the pope and cardinals, he was thought fittest for the employment, but was neither learned nor discreet." The following year he was sent to pope Clement VII. who was then at Ma seilles, to deliver king Henry's appeal to the next general council; and the threatenings which he was ordered by the king to make on this occasion, he delivered with so much vehemence and fury, that his holiness talked of throwing him into a cauldron of melted lead, or burning him alive; upon which he thought proper to make his escape. He was also employed in embassies to the emperor and the kings of Denmark and France; and in 1538, while he was ambassador in the last mentioned kingdom, was nominated to the bishopric of Hereford; but before his consecration he was translated to see of London, in 1539. During the reign of Henry VIII. he appeared zealous against the pope, and in promoting the reformation in this kingdom; though there is but too much reason to suspect that he acted all this while against his conscience, and was a thorough papist in his heart; for in a short time after the accession of Edward VI. he scrupled to renounce the authority of the bishop of Rome, and entered a protest against the king's injunctions and homilies, for which he was committed prisoner to the Fleet; but was soon after released on his recanting his protestation. He now outwardly complied with the methods taken to advance the reformation; though he privately used all possible means to obstruct it. However, being afterwards charged with neglecting the observance of the king's injunctions, he was committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his bishopric; but he soon most severely revenged himself on his enemies; for on the accession of queen Mary he was restored to his see, and in 1554 was made vicegerent and president of the convocation. He then visited his diocese, in order to root out the seeds of the reformation, sent an order to all the ministers to raze such passages of scripture as had been painted on the church walls, and set up the mails again at St. Paul's before the act for restoring it was passed. He was in the commission for turning out some of the reformed bishops, and being known to be of a fierce and cruel disposition, bishop Gardiner, in 1555, left wholly to him the condemning and burning of heretics; in consequence of which, during that and the three following years, he most inhumanly committed to the flames, or otherwise destroyed, hundreds of innocent persons, for their adherence to the protestant religion, and their refusing to embrace the errors of popery. But an end was at length put to these savage butcheries, by the death of queen Mary, which happened on the 17th of November, 1558. The princess Elizabeth was immediately proclaimed queen; on receiving information of which, she came from Hatfield, where she then was, and proceeded towards London. When she had reached Highgate, she was met by Bonner, and the rest of the bishops; but she looked upon him as a man so much defiled with blood, that she would not shew him any mark of her favour.

Bonner remained unmolested for about half a year after the accession of Elizabeth; but being called before the privy council on the 30th of May, 1559, he refused to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and was on that account deprived of his bishopric on the 29th of June following, and committed to the Marshalsea. After having lived some years in his confinement, he died on the 5th of September, 1569; and on the 8th he was buried at midnight, in St. George's church-yard in South-wark, attended by some of his popish friends and relations. "Which was ordered (says Mr. Strype) to be done at that season of the night, and in that obscurity, by the direction of the bishop of London, to prevent any disturbances that might have been made by the citizens, who hated him extremely for having been the death of so many of their pastors, friends, and relations."

Bishop Bonner was a man of little learning, except in the canon law, and in politics, in which he is said to have been well skilled. He was vicious in his private life, much given to the indulgence indulgence of his appetites, addicted to swearing, passionate, insolent and over-bearing. Put the character in which he most distinguished himself, was that of a furious, bigotted, and cruel persecutor. It appeared in numberless instances that his temper was to the last degree savage and inhuman. As to his person, he was remarkably fat and corpulent; which made one say to him, "That he was full of guts, but empty of bowels." In short, to conclude the character of Bonner, we may safely venture to affirm, that he was a disgrace to religion, and to humanity.

The Life of Mr. Barton Booth.

Booth (Barton) a famous English actor, was born in the county palatine of Lancaster, in 1681. At the age of nine years he was put to Westminster-school, under the tuition of Dr. Busby. Here he shewed a strong passion for learning in general, and more particularly for an acquaintance with the Latin poets, the finest passages in whose works he used with great diligence to imprint in his memory; and had besides such a peculiar propensity and judicious emphasis in the repetition of them, assisted by so fine a tone of voice, and adorned with such a natural gracefulness of action, as drew on him the admiration of the whole school. Thence it was, that when, according to custom, a Latin play was to be performed, young Booth was fixed upon to act one of the capital parts. The play happened to be the Andria of Terence, and the part assigned to him that of Pamphilus, which he performed so admirably, as to attract the universal applause of all the spectators; and he has himself confessed that this circumstance was what first fired his breast with theatrical ambition. His father intended him for the church: but when Barton arrived at the age of seventeen, and the time approached when he was to be sent to the university, he stole away from school, and went over to Ireland with Mr. Ashbury, manager of the Dublin theatre. His first appearance on that stage was in the part of Oroonoko, in which he came off with every testimonial of approbation from the audience.* From this time he continued daily improving, and, after two successful campaigns in Ireland, conceived thoughts of returning to his native country, and making a trial of his abilities on the English stage. To this end he first by letters reconciled himself to his friends, and then, as a further step towards insuring his success, obtained a recommendation from lord Fitzharding (one of the lords of the bedchamber to prince George of Denmark) to Mr. Betterton, who very readily took him under his care, and gave him all the assistance in his power. The first character Mr. Booth appeared in at London, which was in 1701, was that of Maximus, in the tragedy of Valentinian; and it was scarce possible for a young actor to meet with a better reception than he did. The Ambitious Step-Mother coming soon after upon the stage, he performed the part of Artaban, which added considerably to the reputation he had acquired, and made him be esteemed one of the first actors then on the stage. Nor was his fame less in all the succeeding characters which he attempted; but he shone with the greatest lustre in the tragedy of Cato, which was brought on the stage in 1712. "Although Cato" (says Mr. Colley Cibber) seems plainly written upon what are called Whig principles, yet the Tories at that time had sense enough not to take it as the least reflection on their administration, but, on the contrary, they seemed to brandish and vaunt their approbation of every sentiment in favour of liberty, which by a public act of their generosity was carried so high, that one evening, while the play was acting, they collected fifty guineas in the boxes, and made a present of them to Booth, with this compliment—for his honest opposition to a perpetual dictator, and his dying so bravely in the cause of liberty."

The reputation to which Mr. Booth was now arrived, seemed to entitle him to a share in the management of the theatre; and in 1713, through the interest of lord Bolingbroke, a new licence was granted, in which Mr. Booth's name was added to those of the former managers, Cibber, Wilks, and Dogget, the last of whom was so offended at this, that he threw up his share, and would not accept of any consideration for it; but Mr. Cibber tells us, he only made this a pretence, and that the true reason of his quitting his share in the management, was his dislike to Wilks, whose humour was become insupportable to him. In 1719, some years after the death of his former wife, Mr. Booth married Miss Hester Santlow, a woman of a most amiable disposition, whose great merit as an actress, added to the utmost discretion and prudential œconomy, had enabled her to obtain a considerable fortune. With this valuable companion, he continued in the most perfect state of domestic happiness, till the year 1727, when he was attacked by a violent fever, which lasted forty-six days without intermission; and although, by the care and skill of those great physicians Dr. Friend and Dr. Brexholm, by whom he was attended, he got the better of the present disorder, yet from that time to the day of his death, which was not till six years after, his health was never perfectly re-established. Nor did he ever, during that interval, appear on the stage, except in the run of a play called the Double Falshood, brought on the theatre in 1729. In this piece he was prevailed on to accept a part on the fifth night of its performance, which he continued to act till the twelfth, which was the last time of his theatrical appearance. He died on the 10th of May, 1733, leaving behind him a disconsolate widow, who immediately quitted the stage, and devoted herself entirely to a private life. Mr. Booth was a man of considerable erudition, and of good classical knowledge: he wrote a dramatic entertainment, called Dido and Æneas; but his masterpiece was a Latin inscription to the memory of Mr. William Smith, an eminent player.

His abilities as an actor have been celebrated by some of the best judges. Aaron Hill, Esq; a gentleman who, by the share he had in the management of the play-house, could not but have sufficient opportunities of becoming well acquainted with his merit, has given us a very high character of him: "Two advantages (says this gentleman) distinguished him in the strongest light from the rest of his fraternity; he had learning to understand perfectly whatever it was his part to speak, and judgment to know how far it agreed or disagreed with his character. Hence arose a peculiar grace, which was visible to every spectator, though few were at the pains of examining into the cause of their pleasure. He could soften and slide over with a kind of elegant negligence, the improprieties in a part he acted, while, on the contrary, he would dwell with energy upon the beauties, as if he exerted a latent spirit, which had been kept back for such an occasion, that he might alarm, awaken, and transport in those places only, where the dignity of his own good sense could be supported by that of his author. A little reflection upon this remarkable quality, will teach us to account for that manifest languor, which has sometimes been observed in his action, and which was generally, though I think falsely, imputed to the natural indolence of his temper. For the same reason, though, in the customary rounds of his business, he would condescend to some parts in comedy, he seldom appeared in any of them with much advantage to his character. The passions which he found in comedy were not strong enough to excite his fire, and what seemed want of qualification, was only absence of impression. He had a talent at discovering the passions, where they lay hid in some celebrated parts by the injudicious practice of other actors, which when he had discovered, he soon grew able to express them. And his secret for attaining this great lesson of the theatre was an adaption of his look to his voice, by which artful imitation and nature, the variations in the sound of his words gave propriety to every change in his countenance. So that it was Mr. Booth's peculiar felicity to be heard and seen the same—whether as the pleased, the grieved, the pitying, the reproachful, or the angry. One would almost be tempted to borrow the aid of a very bold figure, and, to express this excellence the more significantly, beg permission to affirm, that the blind might have seen him in his vice, and the deaf have heard him in his visage."

Mr. Booth's character as a man was adorned with many amiable qualities, among which, a perfect goodness of heart, the basis of every virtue, was remarkably conspicuous. He had the strictest regard to justice and punctuality in his dealings with every one; was a gay, lively, cheerful companion, yet humble and diffident of his own abilities. In 1772 a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey.

April 24.

THE day appointed for opening the budget. Lord North began with recapitulating the grants made by the committee of supply, which he said, amounted to nine millions ninety-seven thousand pounds, consisting of the army, navy, ordnance, navy-debt, expence of coinage, exchequer bills, deficiencies of land and malt, and deficiencies of grants, and miscellaneous articles.

He next stated the sums granted in the committee of ways and means, consisting of land and malt, produce of the sinking fund and exchequer bills, to be issued for the service of the year 1776, all which amounted to seven millions one hundred and forty three thousand pounds.

The difference between the amount of grants and monies provided for, he computed to be one million nine hundred and fifty-six thousand pounds.

He informed the committee, that to balance this deficiency between the grants and supplies, he meant to borrow two millions, which would make an overplus of sixty-four thousand pounds.

To raise this sum, he proposed that annuities should be granted at three per cent. per annum, on one million four hundred thousand pounds, and that the other six hundred thousand pounds, to be raised by lottery, the prizes of which were to be founded and incorporated into the two millions stock; that is to say, every man subscribing one hundred pounds, should be intitled to interest for seventy-seven pounds ten shillings, at the rate of three per cent. per annum, and have three lottery tickets, which, computed at eleven pounds ten shillings per ticket, amount to thirty-four pounds ten shillings.

The seven pounds ten shillings was by way of premium, which, with the profit on the ticket, would stand the public in one hundred and twelve pounds, and if the tickets sold at their usual price, would, in fact, cost the public one hundred and fifteen pounds, but as in the first place the three per cents, consolidated, bore no higher a price than eighty-five and a fraction; and as the prizes in the lottery being to be funded, he did not compute the terms the money thus borrowed stood in relation to the public, but see what the lender has actually to receive. On this ground, then, he said, the seventy-seven pounds ten shillings, three per cent. consolidated was worth at market sixty-five pounds, seventeen shillings and six-pence, and the three lottery tickets thirty-four pounds ten shillings, by which means every subscriber of one hundred pounds would receive in stock and money one hundred pounds seven shillings and six-pence, and if the tickets should sell higher, every thing more they brought would be an additional profit to the seven shillings and six-pence.

To pay the interest on the two millions one hundred and fifty thousand pounds thus borrowed; that is, the two millions loan, and one hundred and fifty thousand pounds premium, the interest of which, he said, would amount to sixty-four thousand pounds, he proposed to lay on the following taxes:

On four-wheel carriages a tax of twenty shillings each, which he computed would amount to seventeen thousand pounds per annum.

On stage coaches, at five pounds each, amounting to two thousand pounds.

On deeds, or all writings to be stamped, at one shilling a stamp, amounting to thirty thousand pounds.

On news papers, one half-penny per stamp, eighteen thousand pounds per annum.

Cards and dice; six-pence a pack on cards, and two and six-pence on dice; six thousand pounds per annum.

Those different sums would amount to seventy-two thousand pounds, which would have a surplus of eight thousand pounds, to go to the credit of the sinking-fund.

His lordship then gave an account of the present

lent flourishing state of the sinking fund. He observed, that the preceding session that fund had been charged with two millions eight hundred thousand pounds, besides one hundred thousand pounds paid to his Majesty for the purchase of Somerset house, which together made the prodigious sum of two millions nine hundred thousand pounds. Yet notwithstanding this heavy charge, considerably more than had ever been laid on that fund before, there was a surplus, lying in the exchequer, at the end of the Christmas quarter, of seventeen thousand pounds, which was now brought to the credit of the ways and means. To this prosperous state he said it might be objected, that the present troubles in America being foreseen, greater importations might have been made from that country in the course of last year than usual, which produced a kind of unnatural increase of the customs; but the very reverse, he assured the committee, was the fact, for, in the course of the last quarter, however unaccountable it might appear, the produce of the sinking fund, on the 4th of the present month, was found to be nine hundred and sixty thousand pounds, so that the last five quarters produce amounted to the almost incredible sum of four millions, or three millions eight hundred and seventy-seven thousand pounds.

Though this state of that fund might appear as if the trade with the colonies was of little or no consequence to this nation, he did not mean to draw any such conclusion from the premises.

He was convinced of the great importance of that very valuable branch of commerce; but it authorized him to draw another conclusion of singular importance, which was, that it proved the great opulence, private consumption, public wealth, and immense resources of this country. When those facts first came to his knowledge, he confessed he was much astonished; he suspected that the imports from America must have been much greater than at any other time, at least in the beginning of the preceding year; he found to his surprise that was not the fact, and the produce of the last quarter convinced him to demonstration. He again enquired, if the decrease in the debentures and drawbacks might not have contributed in a great measure to the increase of the sinking fund; but here again he was disappointed, for though the debentures and drawbacks had decreased, they had not decreased in any proportion at all sufficient to compensate the loss of our American trade. But still, on further enquiry, he found himself more puzzled, for it appeared that it was not by the customs alone that the fund was enriched, but from the excises on inland consumption, the most irrefragable evidence of the increasing, internal, and domestic wealth of the people, who were the consumers of those excised articles.

From this pleasing appearance, he said he was warranted in charging the sinking fund with the sum of two millions nine hundred thousand pounds, now proposed, as he found it so rapidly on the increase. It appeared by taking the average of the two last years, the produce was two millions eight hundred thousand pounds, and on the three last, two millions seven hundred thousand pounds and a fraction, whereas the average of the five preceding years amounted to no more than two millions five hundred thousand pounds, or hardly so much; and previous to the breaking out of the late war, to not more than half that sum. This led him to repeat what he had before mentioned, that our commerce was immense, our resources great, and our internal opulence almost beyond conception; for though the national debt was considerable, and our burthens heavy, the tradesmen, mechanic, and labourers in this country, lived in a manner unknown to any country whatever. Examine the labourer's stile and manner of living; examine his food, his cloathing, his house, and even his little luxuries, and compare him with men of the same class in Ireland, in any other part of the empire, or Europe; and it would amount to this demonstrative proof, that although our taxes were great, our burthens were heavy, that yet the means of procuring the necessaries, nay, even the comforts of life, were easier attainable in this country than in any other under the sun.

On the other operation of finance, that of raising one million five hundred thousand pounds by exchequer bills, he begged leave to explain himself, as it arose from circumstances which related to a matter not immediately before the committee, that was the present state of the East-India company, concerning their transactions with the bank. In the year 1773, government issued one million four hundred thousand pounds exchequer bills, in order to extricate that company out of its difficulties; one million one hundred thousand pounds of which has been since paid; so that three hundred thousand pounds only remaining in circulation, he thought he had a fair opportunity of issuing two hundred and fifty thousand pounds in exchequer bills more than the last year, without running the risque of a glutted market. On this ground therefore, it was, that he encreased the exchequer bills from one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, to one million five hundred thousand pounds.

His Lordship repeated, that the money to be borrowed and funded, would be two millions. In this operation he had two points in view; one was, to make the best bargain he could for the public; the other, to give the stockholder a reasonable profit and encouragement to subscribe; both those he hoped would be effected. It is true there would be a nominal loss to the public of 15 per cent. but it could not possibly be otherwise, and the subscriber would be no real gainer, on account of the very low price of stock, for the premium and the advance on the lottery tickets would amount to no more than a fair market-price for his subscription.

The interest of this stock would amount to fifty-four thousand pounds per annum; and as it was not meant to break in on the sinking fund, the interest money must be paid in by new taxes.

Taxes in all countries, where necessity did not compel, should, as much as possible, be laid on luxury, and the elegant conveniences of life; but much more where the consequence and strength of a kingdom chiefly depend on its trade and commerce. In these he meant to submit to the committee, he should have that great object steadily in view. In many instances this this mode of levying taxes would not answer. Where great sums were to be borrowed, the burden must lie on the bulk of the people at large, who were only capable of bearing it; but in every other operation, such as the present, luxuries ought to be taxed, both because the first weight ought to fall on the rich and opulent, and because every tax, which might in its consequences tend to our manufactures, so as to enhance their value to foreign purchasers, ought, if possible to be avoided.

The tax on four wheel carriages, though an object of convenience, was, in another light, a luxury, because none kept them but such as were really or nominally rich. The tax on two-wheel carriages came under the same description in a secondary degree; but on inspecting into the produce of the last mentioned tax, he observed that it decreased, while the other was yearly on the increase. The number of four-wheel carriages which paid the tax last year, he said, was 18,600; but supposing that gentlemen, who had several of them, would on this account lay down one, or that the number of four-wheel carriages might from other causes actually decrease, he would allow for that decrease, and fix the number at 17,000 which, at twenty shillings each, would produce the sum of seventeen thousand pounds.

The next proper object of taxation, he thought, would be stage-coaches and machines. He said, that gentlemen who paid the tax for their own carriages, thought it a little extraordinary that hackney carriages should be exempted, particularly when they saw four or six inside, and eight or ten outside daily passing them on the road, without contributing a shilling towards the public expence. Those he computed at 400, though he believed them to be considerably more, which, at five pounds each, would produce about two thousand pounds a year.

There had been taxes already laid on all deeds and paper writings sealed, but he thought from the easy manner of collecting the stamp-duties, and the benefits supposed to arise to the parties from such transactions at the time, that deeds would bear an additional stamp of one shilling. The shilling stamp laid on in 1736, produced the last year thirty-two thousand pounds, but taken it on an average of thirty thousand pounds, he proposed that an additional tax of one shilling each should be laid on all deeds or paper writings sealed, heretofore liable to payment of stamp duties.

Cards and dice were matters of real luxury, and ought therefore to be taxed. 174,000 packs of cards had been stamped the last year, which amounted to between three and four thousand pounds. Another sixpenny stamp would produce a like sum, and the half-crown stamp on dice, about four hundred pounds, and both taken together, to upwards of four thousand pounds.

News-papers in general, he thought a very fit object of taxation. He said, many persons thought they did more harm than good, while others looked upon them to be of great public benefit. He did not pretend to determine whether they were, or were not: but he could not help observing that they inculcated one thing which he believed was not to be credited, which was that the liberties of this country were in danger from cruel, ambitious, and tyrannical ministers, when, under this tyrannic government, news-writers were daily permitted to abuse the persons, and misrepresent the measures, of those very men whom they described as enemies of liberty, with impunity. He could further inform them that those calumnies and falsehoods, were propagated and repeated in the course of a year, in no less than 12,230,000 news-papers. It was difficult to determine whence this avidity for reading news-papers arose. He could not say it was from a thirst of knowledge or improvement. He presumed, therefore, it was from a general desire of knowing what was passing, of spending half an hour that lay heavy on their hands, or from an idle foolish curiosity; but let the reason be what it might, it was a species of luxury that ought to be taxed, and from the propensity just mentioned, would he made no doubt, well bear it. He said, by the last returns in the stamp-office, the amount of the tax was fifty thousand pounds on the penny stamp. He proposed now to lay on an additional halfpenny, which would, if the sale were to continue the same, produce twenty-five thousand pounds, but as the sale might possibly decrease somewhat, and thereby affect the penny stamp, and that several papers which were charged, were returned as unsold, and the stamp afterwards allowed for, he would compute the produce of this tax to be no more than eighteen thousand pounds per annum. Taking those several sums together, they made about 70,000*l.* per annum, out of which deducting the interest of the two millions one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which was sixty-four thousand pounds, there would remain about six or eight thousand pounds a year to be applied to the uses of the sinking-fund, that is, provided those several taxes produced what he now stated.

His Lordship then reminded the committee, that the power and wealth of this country were great, and its spirit high, notwithstanding the pains that had been taken to depreciate one, and vilify and traduce the other. Though Englishmen were degraded in the eyes of all Europeans as tame, spiritless and cowardly; though this country had been represented to be exhausted, borne down by taxes, and on the eve of a general bankruptcy; though the disappointments of the last campaign were magnified into defeats; and though America was represented by the same persons, to be the seat of virtue, liberty courage and heroism, he, nevertheless, trusted that this country had both the spirit left to assert her rights, to resent the insults she had received, and to convince her public and domestic enemies, that as she had the will, so she had likewise the means, of repairing her injured honour. He observed, that this country, when roused to a sense of her injuries, had never failed to chastise her foes, whether foreign or domestic; and that however slow she might be in the beginning, experience had taught them to their cost, that she was not to be injured or insulted with impunity.

He observed that the loan had turned out better

ter than it would have done three or four days since, as the 3 per cent. consolidated annuities had fallen one half-penny or three farthings per cent. within that time, on account of a pretended account lately received by a ship lately arrived from Jamaica, giving an account of the hostile preparations of the French, and Spaniards in that quarter, and of martial law being proclaimed through that island. He could not think of passing it over in silence, and suffering it to remain uncontradicted; for if there was the least foundation for it, the governor would never have permitted a vessel to depart for Europe without sending an account of it; therefore he would assure the House the report was totally false. (To be continued.)

Wednesday, January 29.

MR. Hopkins, chairman of the select-committee appointed to try and determine the Hindon election, made the following report from said committee, viz.

Resolved, That Richard Smith, Esq; is not duly returned a member to serve in this present Parliament for the borough of Hindon in the county of Wilts.

Resolved, That Richard Beckford, Esq; is not duly returned a member to serve in this present Parliament for the borough of Hindon, in the county of Wilts.

Resolved, That the said election for members to serve in Parliament for said borough is a void election.

Saturday, February 8.

Lord North presented the Bill to enable his Majesty to secure and detain persons charged with, or suspected of High Treason in North America, or on the Seas for Piracy, which was read a first time, and the Speaker having put the question, that said Bill be read a second time, Mr. John Johnstone (brother to the Governor) rose, and said, he did not see there was any occasion for such a Bill; that the Prerogative was already too strong, and required to be limited, instead of extended.

The motion for the second reading, however, was carried.

Monday, February 10.

The order of the day for the second reading of the bill to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act for a limited time, being called for, the same was read a second time, and a motion made that it be committed for Thursday. This produced a debate, which continued till half after seven o'clock, when the question being put, the house divided, ayes 195, noes 43. The bill accordingly was committed for Thursday. The principal speakers against the second reading were, Mr. Dunning, Mr. Fox, Col. Barre, Mr. Pulteney, Mr. T. Townshend, and Gov. Johnstone. For it, Mr. Attorney-General and Lord North.

The arguments on the above debate were mostly confined to one side of the house, administration (Mr. Thurlow and Lord North excepted, who were each up for about a quarter of an hour) declining to debate the principle of the bill, as the majority seemed to think it necessary to strengthen the hands of government, at this critical and important period.

The opposers of the bill said, the Habeas Corpus Law was never suspended but in cases of necessity; that necessity did not now exist; consequently, the present bill was a wanton and unjustifiable attempt to throw a power into the hands of administration, which was never sought nor exercised since the first establishment of civil government in this island. It was said, that the terrors and that the unheard-of injustice which might be created, and suffered under this bill, would probably have the very worst effect on the people of America. When they heard that the friends of freedom, and well-wishers to the prosperity of both countries, were for their general sentiments imprisoned, banished, or prosecuted, it would at once fill the minds of the colonists with horror and detestation of a government, which could resort to such cruel and barbarous modes of coercion; and urge, in turn, means of retaliation equally bloody, oppressive and inhuman. It was said there were two passages in the bill which ought to create matters of alarm to every man, who valued his health, his property, or his life. This was where the bill enacts, that any person suspected of the crimes therein set forth, shall be sent to the common goal; and where again it is added, or any other place specially appointed for that purpose, by warrant under his Majesty's Sign Manual. Here, said they, any person suspected of High Treason, or Piracy, though he had never been beyond the bounds of his own parish, may be apprehended, committed, and confined, as long as the present bill shall remain in force, without any remedy or redress whatever; and what is still worse, he may not only be confined, but he may be sent to the Coast of Africa, or the East-Indies, and be so well disposed of, that he may never see the light. A warm climate, a loathsome dungeon, and bad treatment, may effect more in thirty days, at Senegambia, or Bombay, than twice that number of years is able to effect within the walls of the Bastille. Lastly, it was observed, that that House, and the nation at large, had just right to be alarmed at this attempt to establish a power equally arbitrary and uncontrollable with the Roman Dictatorship. That there was no occasion for trusting such a power at any time, much less at present; but allowing that a power similar to that which the title and preamble of the Bill purposed was necessary, there could be none for taking up persons indiscriminately in the first instance, and banishing them at pleasure in the second.

In support of the Bill, it was said, that it was not directed to the punishment of any, but those who had, or should be charged with, or suspected of crimes in America, or on the High Seas, or of Piracy. As for other species of Treason, which had been already declared to be so by Statute, or the common Law, persons were always liable to be taken up for them, as well before as after the passing of this Act; that therefore none but the guilty had any thing to fear from its operation; and it was presumed, that no person wished they should escape punishment. If any real objections were to be made, the Committee was the proper place to urge them; them; not on the second Reading, when it was always understood the principle, not the clauses of the Bill, was to be debated. On this ground, they cheerfully joined issue with their adversaries; but as no person controverted the principle of the Bill, the commitment of it must be agreed to as a matter of course. To this was added, that the operation of the Bill was meant to answer a temporary purpose, to strengthen the hands of Government, against its foreign and domestic foes; that it was intended to be of a very short continuance, no longer than the present year, or until the first day of the next Session of Parliament. That on the whole, the advisers of the present measure had nothing in contemplation but the good of their country; they wished for no improper power, and trusted, if they had it, they would not employ it to unconstitutional or oppressive purposes.

Thursday, Feb. 13.

The House went into the order of the day for going into a Committee for empowering his Majesty to secure and detain Persons charged with or suspected of High Treason in North-America of the High Seas, or of Piracy; and after some time spent therein, the House being refused, the Chairman acquainted, that the Committee had gone through the Bill, and made several Amendments, which he would report when the House should be pleased to receive the same.

Sir Grey Cooper moved an Amendment to remove the Ambiguity of the Clause relative to the operation of the Bill, which was agreed to. Several Amendments were moved in the Course of the Evening, but no Division, but on one, in which Administration counted 125, and Opposition but 25.

Friday, Feb. 14.

The above Amendments made on the Bill for empowering his Majesty to secure and detain Persons charged with, or suspected of committing High Treason in America, or on the high Seas, or of Piracy, were reported by Sir Charles Whitworth, and agreed to.

On a motion of Mr. Powys, Member for the County of Northampton, to insert a clause in the said Bill on the report, for providing, "that no Person should be apprehended or detained unless he was charged with having resided in America"—this Clause was strongly opposed by Mr. Cornwall and Sir Grey Cooper, and as warmly supported by Mr. Fox, Mr. Popham, and Mr. Temple Luttrell.

It was urged against this Clause, that if it were agreed to, it would totally defeat the Intention of the Bill. The Bill was intended to deprive America of every species of assistance from this country. Intelligence might be given them; Arms, and all kind of military stores might be purchased in foreign countries, and sent to them in foreign bottoms; in which case, the Persons who might undertake the delivery of the stores, being indemnified on the spot, would cheerfully engage in a commerce, which insured to them high profits, without a possibility of a risque. In short, there were innumerable methods that might be put in practice to serve the cause of the Rebels, without venturing to appear publicly. But, if the present clause were agreed to, it would be in the power of the factious, the interested, and disaffected, to serve the cause of America, without incurring any punishment whatever. If always resident in England, or to take the clause negatively, if it could not be proved that they resided some part of their lives in America, they might, at least in the first Instance, as to apprehension, be as rank Rebels as they pleased, with impunity.

To this it was answered, that they were glad to hear the Patrons of the Bill at length venture to speak out. When the Bill was first brought in, it was proclaimed and avowed from every ministerial corner of the House to be a local Bill to all intents and purposes; the very title said so; the very preamble confirmed the assertion; nay, further, above one half of the first enacting clause corroborated it, and vouched for the assertion in so many words. When the test, however, is put, when subterfuge, evasion, round naked general assertions will no longer serve to conceal the latent views and object of its framers and supporters; the mask is suddenly, though reluctantly drawn aside. It is not a Bill for punishing persons guilty of Rebellion in America, but in Great Britain. Arms, Intelligence, and Stores, may have been sent to the Rebels. Correspondences may have been kept up with the rebellious and disaffected in America by persons in Great Britain, who never saw America, nor perhaps crossed the narrow Seas, and these Persons who, in the early stages of the commotions in that country, may have acted as Agents and Factors, who may have had dealings with them in the way of business, or who may from principle have approved of what they imagined to be a justifiable resistance to a legal and rightful authority unconstitutionally and wrongfully exerted, are through the means of the present Bill including a fiction in law, policy, and fact, conveyed over to America, for the purpose of convicting them by an ex post facto Law, of acts perfectly innocent at the time, but made, by a curious retrospective mode of ingenious construction, Treason in twelve or twenty-four months subsequent to the time of their being committed. But this is not all; the leading patrons and friends of the Bill differ from each other, and avail themselves of that difference, to combat the objections made to it. One great law authority says, the Bill is confined to America; another, that it is meant to extend to every part of his Majesty's Dominions; a third, that the high Seas do not mean the narrow Seas, and vice versa; a fourth, that Piracy is robbery at Sea, or acting under an unlawful commission; and another, that Piracy includes several other matters besides a mere robbery or plunder at Sea. How then can Ministers pretend to say, that the Bill is plain, the offences defined, and the grounds of punishment specific, when no two of the great Oracles of the law are agreed in the Interpretation of a clause which does not consist of above a dozen lines?

The Lawyers in behalf of the bill, either deserted their posts, or remained silent, and the whole defence of the bill, and the reconciling those manifest contradictions, fell to the lot of two gentlemen (Mr. Cornwall and Sir Grey Cooper). Those Gentlemen asserted, that the Bill was as intelligible as a Horn-Book, and on their words the clause offered by Mr. Powys was rejected, and the Bill ordered to be engrossed, by a Majority of four to one.

While these points were debating, notice was given, that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, attended by the City Remembrancer, were in waiting. The gallery doors were ordered to be locked, and no strangers admitted; then the Sheriffs being called in, presented the following Petition from the City of London against the American High Treason Bill, which was ordered to lie on the table till the third reading of the said Bill.

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled,

The humble Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, Sheweth,

"That your petitioners have seen a Bill depending in this honourable house, to empower his Majesty to secure and detain persons charged with, or suspected of the crime of High Treason committed in North America, or on the High Seas, or the crime of piracy.

"That if the said Bill should pass into a law, your petitioners are apprehensive it will create the greatest uneasiness in the minds of many of his Majesty's good subjects, and tend to excite the most alarming disturbances: All persons indiscriminately being liable upon the ground of suspicion alone, without any oath made, and without convening the parties, or hearing what they can alledge in their own justification, to be committed to a remote Prison in any corner of the realm, there to remain without bail or mainprize.

"That the habeas corpus, which is the great security of the liberties of the people, will be suspended.

"That your petitioners are deeply affected with what they conceive will be the dangerous consequences of such a law, as from little motives of resentment, and various other inducements, there may be persons competent to commit, who may be tempted to exercise that power in its utmost latitude and extent.

"That measures so violent and unconstitutional; so subversive of the sacred and fundamental rights of the people, and subjecting them to the most cruel oppression and bondage, will, in the judgment of your petitioners, be introductive of every species of mischief and confusion; and thereby precipitate the impending ruin of this Country.

"Your petitioners therefore earnestly beseech this Honourable House, That the said Bill may not pass into a law, or at least to take such care, as in their Wisdom may seem meet, to prevent it from being extended in its operation or construction to any of his Majesty's subjects resident in these kingdoms."

Monday, Feb. 17.

The order of the day was read for the third reading of the bill to enable his Majesty to secure persons charged or suspected of high treason.

son committed in America, &c. After which Mr. Dunning got up and proposed the following amendment; "That the Act should extend only to those persons actually in America at the time the offence with which they are charged was committed." His chief reasons were, that this was agreed to be the meaning of the Act, and therefore why not render it clear, so as to preclude all ambiguity? He proved, there would otherwise be a reasonable doubt about it, and that not only the law itself might be doubtful, but that the lawyers on both sides of the House had differed in their opinions upon it.

Mr. Rigby objected to the Act not being sufficiently extensive, rather than to its taking too great a latitude. He entered into the reasons of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, in the years 1745 and 1746, and endeavoured to shew there was not less occasion for it in the present conjuncture.

Mr. Fox did not agree altogether with Mr. Dunning, and thought the circumstance of suspicion alone being a ground of imprisonment, was sufficient to render the bill obnoxious to every Englishman. He contrasted the present civil war in America with the rebellion in 1745, and shewed that the latter was founded in no principle but that of subverting our civil and religious establishment. He declared it his firm opinion that the Americans were assisted by foreign powers, and that a foreign war, sooner or later, must be the consequence. He agreed his Majesty's troops had not been defeated, but that they had failed of the language success expected was most certain. He expressed his wish that the Americans might not be extirpated.

Mr. Wilmot lamented the present horrid situation of America; said, he thought this war might have been prevented on the outset, without any derogation of the honour, dignity, or even interest of Great Britain: but that whatever were the causes, the sword was now drawn by America, and that therefore whilst that sword remained unsheathed, he sincerely wished success to his own country. That he felt upon the occasion as he should do if a dagger was held to his father's breast; that in that moment he should forget his blame, defend him from its attack, and reflect on the greater blame of the person who held it. That the situation we are in towards America could not have been foreseen, and therefore no provision was made for it by the laws at present in force. That this bill answered the purpose, and being freed from the objections to it, had his hearty concurrence.

The Attorney-General was by this time come in, and answered, very fully, every part of the arguments before alledged, but was not very anxious about the success of the clause, as he seemed to think it immaterial either the one way or the other.

Colonel Luttrell, Mr. Cornwall, Mr. James Luttrell, Mr. Serjeant Adair, Mr. T. Townsend, Lord North, Mr. Viner, Mr. Adams, General Conway, Mr. Solicitor General, and Mr. Wilkes, likewise spoke; but their arguments, mease,

ments were of a similar nature to those above recited.

The question being put, that this bill do now pass, the house divided, ayes 112, noes 35.

Tuesday, Feb. 18.

The House received the report from the Committee on the merits of the Shattsbury election, that they had finished hearing Counsel and examining evidence, when Mr. Rous, the sitting Member, was declared duly elected by a very small majority.

Friday, February 21.

The House went into a committee of supply, and came to the following resolution :

That a Sum not exceeding 1,200,000*l.* 12*s.* three farthings for extraordinary service for land forces between the 31st of Jan 1776, and 1st of February 1777 be granted.

A very spirited conversation arose in the committee on this resolution for voting. The Speakers were Lords North, Barrington, Germaine, and Newhaven, Mess. Barre, Burrell, Townshend, and Sir William Lemon.

Among a variety of objections made to the accounts, these following were the most remarkable, to which we shall likewise subjoin the answers or explanations.

An Item of 44,000*l.* advanced to Colonel Faucit without specification.

Answer—It was levy-money paid to the German Princes; it was not to be sure in the treaty, but it had been customary in former ones, and though it had been forgot by the Landgrave of Hesse and Duke of Brunswick, they appealed to the treaty of 1755 as a ruling precedent acceded to by the spirit of the treaty.

The monstrous charge for horses was objected to, particularly the price.

It was answered, that the dragoons horses were taken to answer the purpose, that they were always recruited at the rate of sixteen pounds a horse, which was the price charged in the account.

The pork and other kind of fresh provision sent from Ireland, and the bread sent from this country, were damaged, useless, and unwholesome.

A necessity occasioned the former, and what caused the latter was, that the biscuit was sent or packed in bags, and not in casks, which was provided against in future.

Contracts for rum were objected to as shamefully exorbitant, and above market price by at least one third; rum being charged from 3*s.* 9*d.* to 5*s.* 5*d.* free of duty.

A. Good Jamaica rum is worth 4*s.* 4*d.* per gallon, Freight 6*d.* and Lackage or Leakage 6*d.* a gallon more, which tallies with the highest price stated in the account.

It was objected, that the nation in the very trifling article of surgeons mates had been put to a monstrous expence; formerly there were but three to a regiment, now the establishment was raised to nine.

A. That was when the battalion was in garrison, or together; in the places alluded to (the West Indies) the regiments are cantoned in single companies.

The immense expence of the Transport service, and the great advance of Freight, was stated as a waste of public money.

A. The Freight was 10*s.* per ton, it rose gradually to 12*s.* 6*d.* the chief reason was, being obliged to go armed for fear of the American Privateers, and to ship an additional number of hands to fight, as well as navigate the transport vessels.

Contracts and contractors furnished a great part of the conversation of the evening, and their influence in Parliament and on administration was much lamented.

A. Contracts, if badly or improperly performed, the loss would fall on the contractors; and as for the influence of the contractors in Parliament or on Administration, it could signify very little, because contracts were not confined to Members, but were indiscriminately entered into with those who executed the best and on the most reasonable terms.

There were several other matters relative to the expence of negroes in the Ceded Islands, Hospitals, exchange of money, &c.—The resolution was ordered to be reported.

COME buy the Gospel at my hands,
Crys Jack the swadling preacher;
Tho' without cassock, gown and bands,
Few rank with me as teacher.
I from no Pope my license hold,
No devil, monk, or friar:
Choice are my goods, as e'er were sold,
Else—Westly is a liar.

II.

Come—lumping pennyworths I sell,
Beyond most pulpit venders:
My keys ope heav'n, and shut up hell,
Beyond all vain pretenders.
Ye high and low, ye rich and poor,
Your sixpence or your penny,
Shall still find entrance at my door,
Ev'n farthings from the many.

III.

The more you give, you'll have the more,
At least for one fold seven:
Giving thus adds unto your store,
Your cash-account—in heaven.
Let ev'ry virgin come to me,
I ne'er will disappoint her:
Wedded—to good works she shall be,
With Paradise her jointure.

IV.

Ye old maids too, that always pray
For what ye have not got yet;
King Solomon shall guide our way
To raptures tasted not yet.
These Barracks heretofore display'd
But crimson'd sons of story;
Shooting and ripping up—their trade:
Not thus I pant for glory.

V.

For beat of drum, and trumpet's sound,
That rouse the coward's qualms, Sirs;

My signal makes all heav'n rebound,
Strong lungs and—singing psalms, Sirs.
Your slated preachers of the town,
Are lying prophets all, Sirs ;
Who, not for martyrdom's blest crown,
But for their wages bawl, Sirs.

VI.

Save faith in me, I claim no due,
Upon this side the grave, Sirs ;
No tribute I demand from you,
But—your lost souls to save, Sirs.
“ Well said ! ” (a titt'ring wag rejoins)
“ Truth's truth, as it behoves it ;
“ The Gospel pearl is—good hard coin,
“ This pewee-plate full proves it.”

Extract from a poetical Epistle to Dr. Andrews, late Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, on his directing such Books as should be read for admittance into the University.

By MICHAEL CLANCY, M. D.

ANDREWS ! those antique books you name,
Are now no road to wealth or fame ;
Their date is past, and men no more
O'er musty, fruitless authors pore :
True Turks in grain, as if their Creed
Persuaded, 'twere a crime to read.

Knowledge, first mark and pledge of love,
Transmitted by the mystic Dove,
To strengthen Truth divinely given,
In cloven Tongues came down from Heaven !
But at this day a scurvy pack
Of evil beasts have sent it back ;
It is with bright Astrea gone,
And to primæval mansions flown.

Learning, by modern art is spread
Without the labour of the head ;
Conceit gives Learning all at once,
And makes a Scholar of a Dunce.
An Ass extols his friend the Drone,
And says his peer was never known ;
The Drone, proclaims the braying Ass,
Does sweet Corelli's notes surpass ;
The Blockhead says his brother Block
Has Newton's sense, and thinks like Locke :
The Block bestows him nobler parts
Than Montesquieu's or fam'd Descartes :
And thus, in Nature's full defiance,
Each Fool has wit, each Dolt has science.

Then what avails that classic tribe,
Whose strict perusal you prescribe ;
They bar the main design of thriving,
At which all mortal men are driving.
You shew a false, misleading clue ;
But—'tis your office speaks, not you ;
Who know 'tis madness to encumber
The brain with such pedantic lumber :
And that the method you are carving,
Directly leads to downright starving ;
As some advantage may arise
From ev'ry other enterprise.

The traveller relentless goes
Through the cold length of Alpine snows ;
Sure to arrive, and least his eyes
With scenes of beauty, and surprize :
Where Virtue rais'd the Roman name
To glory and immortal fame ;
To trace where Clelia stemm'd the flood,
Where Cæsar resolutely stood :

Where Fabius conquered by delay,
And Cæsar made the world obey.
Or tread where Brutus trod before,
Or calmly rest on Baia's shore
Each charming view, each awful sight,
Rewards his labours with delight.

The mariner undaunted steers,
Nor rocks, nor gulfs, nor quicksands fears ;
Let Boreas rage, and Neptune too,
He holds his destin'd port in view ;
His staple cargo will repay
The toils and dangers of the sea :
But—Where's that port, that mart to vend,
The paltry ware you recommend ?
Our children ask us bread, and none,
(Or Scripture errs) will give a stone.
Perhaps, like holy John, you look
To fill their stomachs with a Book,
Which, like th' Apostle's can produce
None other but a bitter juice.

Suppose some hapless youth, full fraught
With all that GREECE and ROME have taught,
Sure that success should issue forth
From Learning's strong, intrinsic worth ;
Then launch him into life—he'll find
He tugs an oar 'gainst wave and wind.

Learning, from vulgar gain debarr'd,
Like Virtue, is its own reward ;
At—'s wears a thread-bare coat ;
Worth thousands, and not worth a groat :
There's Greek, in tatter'd spirit disguis'd,
Despising fools, by fools despis'd ;
And Latin, such as Terence knew,
In stockings patch'd, and heeleless shoe :
There Merit stalks in poor disguise,
Unheeded, impotently wise ;
Yet knows what Bodley's volumes hold
What prophets, priests, or sages told ;
Knows Pindus and the sacred Nine,
Knows ev'ry thing, but—where to dine.

Learning, like Beauty in distress,
Will ever fail of due success ;
If rags debate the brightest maid,
She sinks to Drury's common trade ;
And learned want, in mean attire,
May sell its scraps for sordid hire.

Learning ! henceforth abscond your head,
And Science tremble in the shade.
Where's Harley now, with gen'rous strife,
To usher Merit into life ?

Somerset's no more the prop of state,
Supports those Arts which made him great ;
Stanhope—withdrawn, to crown his days,
With height of fame, and learned ease :—
With those each gentle Art retir'd,
And Wit, and Sense, and Taste expir'd.

Our later Worthies disavow
The use of things they cannot know :
In innate dulness meanly glide,
And catch the flow of Fortune's tide ;
They learn Preferment's Road to find,
Without one grace of Heart or Mind ;
Those rules of virtue Learning mentions
Are quite averse to their intentions ;
And therefore warily disclaim
Their chief reproach, and lasting shame.

TO COLLIN MOUNTAIN.

FAIR Collin, worthy to be seen,
Fair Collin Mountain, well I ween,
D d 2

Thy

Thy peaky top, and aspect bland,
Delight and charm me where I stand.
One of the chief of Irish hills,
Thou feedest many linen mills,
By streams which, from thy airy crown,
To joyous Lagan prattle down.

But one of a peculiar note,
Arises off thy topmost grot,
Whose salutary waters clear
Invite the people, far and near,
To bathe, or drink; and many tell
Of the great use of Collin well.

When on thy top the stranger sits,
What ravishment the view admits,
Each distant scene to single out,
And gaze, and gaze, and look about !
Thy peaky summit guides the swain,
At early dawn, to seek the plain,
If smiling with the growing light,
It beautifully strike the sight;
Or if a purple cloud impend,
And slowly to the orient bend,
The shepherd, having said his prayers,
May go about his daily cares :
But if black vapours, down thy side,
Bound to the west, thy beauties hide,
I would advise the simple swain,
Within his cottage to remain.

Collin, I cannot speak the joy,
Thou gav'st me when I was a boy.

When Winter would begin his sway,
How often, at the peep of day,
With hearty haste, and right good will,
Have I gone up my native * hill,
To see if Winter yet had shed
His welcome snows upon thy head !
Then, if he had, how would I bound,
And leap and skip on the ground,
With joy the springes to prepare,
And sit the bow with timely care;
Full sure, from hence, the storms would blow,
And all would soon be white with snow !
That time is past, and past the joy,
The sylvan tenants to annoy;
They now, for me, may pick their food,
I would not hurt them if I could;
Now other views my soul incite,
God gives a Muse for my delight,
I take her, author of my days,
And consecrate her to thy praise.

Collin, I wish that thou could'st shew,
How much we do this Being owe,
I wish thou would'st this declare,
And leap unwieldy in the air,
Like as the mountains leapt of old,
When the Almighty nigh was told.

Thou standest still it rests on me,
To speak both for myself and thee :
For me, because abounding grace
Let not the ways of sin take place;
For thee, because the same blest skill
Made into such a handsome hill.

Right fair thou art, and fair wilt be,
When I no more thy top shall see;
Long have the snows thy peak upon
Blown; and will blow when I am gone!

N O T E.

* Several miles from Collin: which I mention, lest the reader should mistake the one for the other.

Perhaps a year, perhaps a day,
And, Collin, I must go away
To that far country, from whose bourn
No traveller did yet return !
Thou standest till the last command
Shall say, Thou shalt no longer stand.
Till then thou shalt endure the storm,
And lift aloft thy pleasing form :
Perhaps, thou mayest doubly please,
Both in thy site, and in my lays,
Like as Socrates, great eater made
By Flaccus his immortal aid.

WEALTH and WISDOM.

AS Dives once and Sophus walk'd,
And much on many matters talk'd,
Between 'em rose a brisk debate,
'bout wealth and wisdom's higher rate :
Dives with homespun eloquence,
Argu'd for wealth's preminence;
For wealth, quoth he, doth stout maintain
The body—sense but feeds the brain—
Wealth honour brings, and high command,
And makes men lords of sea and land;
Yea more—effects prodigious things—
Makes numskulls, nobles—blockheads, kings :
When all the wisdom of the schools,
Wou'd make 'em, wanting it—but fools.

There, Sophus, rich Ignarus see,
Who from a bull's-foot, scarce knows B,
In gaudy, silken garment dress'd,
By all the great folk, how caref'd ;
While poor Scholastes they avoid,
Tho' wisdom always was his pride ;
Tho' he these thirty years and more,
Sage authors has been poring o'er,
Since wealth her soft'ning smiles denies,
He'll ne'er be great—tho' e'er so wise.—

This sure's sufficient evidence,
That wealth deserves the preference.
Sophus replies,—ah ! didst thou know
The pleasures that from wisdom flow :
Could'st thou but see what charms delight
The rapturous gaze of mental sight ;—
Thou would'st not wrongly thus contend,
Nor more than wisdom, wealth commend ;
Nay, wealth as dross, thou would'st despise,
Compar'd to being learn'd and wise.

I grant in these degenerate days,
Wealth too much wisdom overflows;
And pray is not a pretty thing,
A lordly dunce—or silly king ?
Brighten our times ! thine, Solomon,
Illum'd a more auspicious sun,
O may it soon arise again,
To gild each modern monarch's reign !

What Dives, tho' Ignarus be,
Caref'd by purse-proud fools—like thee ?
Scholastes claims more just respect,
Than all those great that him neglect ;
Yea, boasts alone more inward merit,
Than all their empty souls inherit :
But you to outwards still confin'd,
Reject the merits of the mind ;
Gold's the attractive pow'r that draws,
Your admiration and applause ;
On it is founded all your pleasure,
In it you boast your only treasure;

Yet know such treasure's never sure,
Such pleasure's ever insecure,
Not so celestial wisdom's joy,
It, time or chance can ne'er destroy,

'Tis the rich treasure of the heart,
That never, never will depart :
The source, when worldly wealth takes wings,
From whence alone true comfort springs.

PHILOSOPHUS.

HISTORICAL CHRONICLE.

Tuesday, Feb. 4.

A Man who calls himself James Hill, otherwise John the Painter, was brought to the Public Office in Bow-Street, from Odiham Gaol, in Hampshire, by two of the King's Messengers, being suspected of setting fire to the Dock-Yard at Portsmouth. He was examined before Sir John Fielding and several of the Lords of the Admiralty, who desired him to disclose all he knew of the affair, and discover his accomplices, so as they might be brought to justice, and several questions were asked him, but he refused to give any answer. Mr. Weston, one of the Rope-makers in his Majesty's Dock-Yard at Portsmouth, deposed that he saw the prisoner in the Ropehouse the day preceding the fire. Two other persons swore to their belief that he was the person whom they saw in the Ropehouse a few hours before the fire broke out. A vessel, containing some spirits of turpentine, a paper with gunpowder, a tinder-box, matches, &c. were found on him when taken, which were produced, as were several pamphlets written by two gentlemen, which he said he should abide by. He was under examination for near three hours, during which time he denied being at Portsmouth or Bristol; he was asked if ever he was in America, to which he refused to give any kind of answer.

Thursday, Feb. 6.

The Bristol Gazette of the above date, says, "The following are the particulars respecting the Painter, otherwise Hill, who was apprehended at Hook, in Hampshire, and committed to Odiham Gaol, on Sunday se'nnight, for breaking into a Linen-Draper's shop at Calne, in Wiltshire, and stealing several things of value: and also strongly suspected to be the person who set fire to the Dock-Yard at Portsmouth, and the shipping and houses in this city. He was pursued from Calne to Hook, which is a circuit of about 60 miles across the country; and when taken, there were found on him several of the articles which he had stolen from Calne, also a pistol loaded with shot, a powder-horn, some shot in a bag, a pistol tinder-box full of tinder, a tobacco-box full of fine tinder, several matches, a bottle of spirits of turpentine, and a large gimblet; also about 28s. in his breeches pockets, and on a second search, six guineas and 17s. 6d. were found in the sleeve of his coat. On his being apprehended for the above crime, and answering to the description of the man who set Portsmouth Dock on fire, and also to the person who was seen in this city about the time of the fire here, several persons went from hence to prove the identity of his person. A woman and a boy where he lodged, and also a gunsmith of whom he bought the pistols, knew him to be the person who had been in this city some time previous to the fire; and the former says, that he was employed in making combustible matters and touch-paper, like to that found in Mr. Morgan's warehouse, whilst at his lodgings: There were also persons from Portsmouth to see him in Gaol, who likewise say he was the man that was seen in the Yard on the day the fire happened there, and was suspected of committing the crime. When he was in Bristol he had a scimitar with a silver handle, which he used to carry with him; but it was not now found on him. He bought two pistols of the above gunsmith, one of which was found loaded with shot near the house where he committed the robbery. He is about 30 years of age, by his dialect supposed to be a Scotchman, though he refused to acknowledge where he came from, and says only he is a native of Europe, and persisted in his innocence respecting the above robbery, as also of his ever being in Bristol, till confronted by different persons who knew him. He appeared to be a shrewd fellow, and it seems to be the general opinion that he was really concerned in setting fire to the Dock-Yard at Portsmouth, and the shipping and house in this City.

Fri. Feb. 7.] John Hill, otherwise John the Painter, went through a second examination, before Sir John Fielding, and several Lords of the Admiralty, relative to the late fire at Portsmouth. Mrs. Boxley, an inhabitant at Portsmouth, being sworn, deposed, that about the first of December last, the prisoner came and took a lodging in a three pair of stairs room in her house; that during his being there, she often smelt a disagreeable smell of gun-powder, &c. that on the 6th of December, the fumes of some combustibles were so strong, she thought the house was on fire; on which she ran up stairs, and on entering the prisoner's apartments, she found it in a cloud of smoke, and he sitting at the end of the bed with a lighted candle in his hand; a tin canister, in which were several small holes, and many papers of materials, as she supposed he was making use of, lay on a table by him; that she flung open the window, in order to discharge the smoke, and desired him to quit her house immediately, which he did, taking all his implements along with him; that the next morning she heard that a fire had happened in the rope-house in his Majesty's dock yard, and that a canister was found which contained the combustible matter; on which she went and saw the canister, which she said to the best of her knowledge was the same she saw the day before in the prisoner's room. Mr. Golden, a painter at Tichfield, swore to his person, with whom he worked in the summer, and that he was called John the Painter. The prisoner very strongly denied having any knowledge of the two witnesses.

Monday. 10.] John Hill, the painter, underwent a private examination before Sir John Fielding, in Bow-Street, and some gentlemen from the Admiralty.

mirality. He was asked, was you ever at Southampton? I don't chuse to make any answer to that question. Was you ever at Titchfield? No. Did you paint a gentleman's house there? (mentioning the name). I know nothing of the gentleman. Did you never hold a correspondence with an Aid de Camp to Mr. Washington? I do not know Mr. Washington. Do you know a man called General Washington? I have heard of General Washington. Then you know General Washington, but you don't know Mr. Washington? I don't chuse to answer that question. I am here personally to suffer upon proof of any crime brought against me, but I don't understand the law. I am poor, and have nobody to advise with. If you want Counsel you shall have it. Is there any body, or any Counsel in particular, you could wish to advise you? Yes, who is it? The best.—Two or three more questions, of very little importance, were asked him; but a gentleman from the Admiralty not arriving in town, as was expected, Hill was remanded to Clerkenwell Prison.

This morning about three a fire broke out at Princes-street coffee-house, in Princes-street, Leicester-Fields, which entirely consumed the same, with all the furniture and effects, and greatly damaged the two adjoining houses, the family escaped backwards, so that happily no lives were lost. Two young men escaped in their shirts, not having time to put on their cloaths.

Same day, about one o'clock in the morning, a fire happened at Greenwich in Kent. It began, as is supposed, in the shop of a linen-draper opposite to the church, and burnt so fiercely, that by two o'clock the house fell in, and every thing perished, except some deeds and papers, which were thrown into the street on the first alarm: the linen-draper, with five small children, his apprentice and servants, narrowly escaped through the flames in their shirts and shifts into the garden: in a few minutes afterwards the house fell in, and it being very old, and mostly built of wood, the flames were so terrible, that no person could approach to save the least article; so that an unfortunate family, who before were in good circumstances, are reduced to poverty, the shop goods and furniture not being insured for half their value. The house of Mr. Wilson, glazier, is also burnt down; and the houses of Mr. Harris, oil-man, and Mr. King, broker, are greatly damaged. The first person who discovered the fire was a defecer in the watch-house; but every body being in bed, and the watchman off his stand, it was a long time before the prisoner could alarm any one; and a fisherman's boy rung the shop-bell, which alarmed the apprentice, otherwise the whole family must inevitably have perished.

Tuesday, Feb. 11.

The Barons of the Exchequer gave their opinion on a motion made last Term, for a new trial in the great cause between Sir James Lowther, Bart, and his Grace the Duke of Portland, when that long contest was finally determined in favour of the Duke of Portland.

Monday, Feb. 17.

James Hill, alias John the Painter, was again brought up to Bow-street, and was under a long examination before Sir John Fielding, in the presence of Lord Sandwich, Lord North's son, and several other noblemen and persons of distinction, when many persons gave testimony of seeing him at Exeter, Portsmouth, and other parts of the country, some considerable time before the attempting setting fire to Portsmouth Dock; and some presumptive evidence was brought to corroborate the suspicion that the prisoner was the incendiary. He refused giving any satisfactory answer.

Thursday, Feb. 18.

This night's Gazette contains his Majesty's order in Council, dated Feb. 17, for continuing, from the 28th of inst. February, to the 30th of April, the bounties of five pounds for every able seaman, and two pounds ten shillings for every ordinary seaman, who shall enter into his Majesty's naval service: Also a reward of two pounds for every able, and thirty shillings for every ordinary seaman, to be paid to any person who shall discover any seamen who secrete themselves, so that they may be taken for his Majesty's service by any of his sea officers employed for raising men.

Also his Majesty's order in Council, dated Feb. 17, to prohibit for the space of three months, from the 23d inst. the transportation of gunpowder, saltpetre, or any sort of arms.

Saturday, Feb. 22.

John the Painter was this day examined before Sir John Fielding. Many circumstances came out that seem to leave scarce a doubt of his being the incendiary at Bristol and Portsmouth; he is to be sent to Winchester to take his trial at the ensuing Assizes. It is found that he has been in France, and came from thence by a passport under the name of John Atkins. He was brought to confess that he had received money from Mr. Silas Deane.

Monday, 24.] Was executed Peter Tolosa, a Spaniard, for the wilful murder of Mary Catherine Sophia Durzey, a young French woman, with whom he had lived some time; and on some difference had accused her before a magistrate of taking his money; and on her way to prison he followed, and stabbed her with a long bladed knife a little above the collar bone, of which wound she instantly died. He was attended to the place of execution by the under sheriff. About twelve o'clock his body was brought back to Surgeons-hall for dissection.

Sligo, Feb. 21.

BY the last accounts from Killybegs, we learn, that a King's ship had arrived there a few days ago, mounting 16 carriage guns besides swivels, which put the inhabitants of that place into such consternation, that there was not a man or boy from the age of 15 to 50 to be seen within five miles of the sea coast, for fear of being pressed.

Waterford, Feb. 28. The Press for seamen still continues very warm here. Wednesday an homeward bound Guineaman had 25 of her hands pressed at Passage, and several other vessels have been lately served in the like manner.

At the commission of Oyer and Terminer, the following persons were capitally convicted, viz. John Kinshelagh and Arthur Carr, for burglariously breaking into the house of the hon. Lord Amiens in Marlboro'-street.—Joseph Green, Char. Mitchell, Adam Ray, and Andrew M'Connick, for robbing and cutting Mr. Lowry.—John M'Gowan and James Mathews, for robbing Mr. Burrows in Linen-hall-street.—Patrick O'Brien and John Scanlan, for robbing Counsellor Power; several other persons were tried and convicted of petty crimes and received sentence accordingly, and others acquitted, after which the Court adjourned to the fifth day of July next. At this commission there were upwards of 70 prisoners, and persons out upon bail tried.—It can be no additional encomium to the character of Lord Chief Justice Patterson to say, that he was counsel for the friendless criminals, as well as a strict protector of the public safety: After his Lordship had gone through entering the usual rules in the Crown Books, he was pleased to address Mr. Sheriff Alexander, and in a very polite speech, requested the Sheriff would accept of the thanks of the Court for his constant attendance during the commission; his uncommon perseverance and successful endeavours in causing several witnesses to come in and prosecute many of the prisoners who were capitally convicted; and for the activity and vigilance used by the Sheriff in apprehending a number of those offenders who were ordered for execution. His Lordship added, that if other magistrates exerted themselves in a similar manner, the news-papers would not be crowded with accounts of such frequent robberies as there are at present; and concluded with saying, he hoped that the citizens would make a proper acknowledgment to Mr. Sheriff Alexander, for his laudable endeavours to promote security and safety to the inhabitants of this extensive metropolis.

March 4.] Robert Potter was tried and found guilty at the Quarter Sessions at the Tholsel, for the robbery of counsellor Pierion's house in Cuske-street, and received sentence to be executed on Saturday se'nnight.

6th.] On Thursday his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant went, at noon, to our University, escorted by a squadron of horse and other attendants; he was received at the entrance of the old Hall by the Provost and Fellows, and the different professors, the doctors being dressed in their scarlet gowns; upon his entrance the Rev. doctor Kearney, made an elegant and suitable oration, after this he went in procession to the Printing-Office where another Oration was made by Mr. Hutchinson (youngest son to the Provost) after being entertained here some time with a view of the Artifice, his Lordship was conducted to the Anatomy and Philosophical Rooms where he was addressed by the Hon Dr. Decourcy, (son to Lord Kinsale) and the Hon. Mr. Jones, (son to Lord Ranelagh) from thence he went to the Library, where an excellent Oration was made by Dr. Leland, the Librarian Doctor and Professor: His Excellency afterwards dined in the new hall, with the Provost, Fellows, and numbers of the nobility and gentry. The elegance of the entertainment cannot be described, and is imagined to stand the college in no less than 700l.

At the commission of Oyer and Terminer, John Ball, a revenue officer, was tried and found guilty for putting the wife of Arthur Guiness, Esq; in dread and fear of her life, by presenting a pistol to her breast; he received sentence to pay a fine of 10l. and one month's imprisonment.

John Farrel, a Taylor, was tried and found guilty for uttering base metal called halfpence, for which he received sentence to pay a fine of 50l. and to be imprisoned six months.

Two persons were tried and found guilty for stealing several articles of brass metal, and received sentence to be transported for seven years. And Michael Keating was tried and found guilty of forging the corporation stamp on plate.

The notorious Sarah Thornbury, the shop-lifter, who was convicted two years ago for robbing the shop of Mr. Rice, in Crampton-court, and Mr. Gogan, in Dame-street, and her sentence respited several times, in consideration of her pregnancy, pleaded his Majesty's pardon in the court of king's bench, and was discharged.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman at Liverpool to a merchant in this city.

"I have been on board the large prize brought in here by the four sailors, one of whom gave me the following account: She is a ship of 400 tons, freighted from Rhode Island with tobacco and slaves, bound to Nantz. Hands being scarce, these four were taken out of confinement where they had been detained as prisoners of war, and on receiving a month's pay they engaged to go; before they sailed, one Stone, whose friends live in Dublin, proposed to the other three, that if they found an opportunity, when near the coast, to seize the vessel. When they were in the Bay of Biscay, the captain and merchant's son, who was supercargo on board, being asleep, and half the crew under hatches, Stone and another went softly into the cabin, took a case of pistols from the bed's-head where the captain lay, (knowing there were no other fire arms on board) and having first tied the captain and the hands below with cords which they had ready, threatening if they spoke a word to blow their brains out, they went on deck where their other two companions were provided with iron bars, and attacked the hands there, two of whom being absent, the others immediately submitted, and after properly securing them, these four brave fellows worked the ship night and day till they put her under the protection of a man of war here. As an encouragement, his Majesty has forgiven the salvage. It is computed they will share near 4000l. a man. A messenger is arrived to bring the captain and supercargo to London; the latter a polite genteel young gentleman, formerly greatly affected, as the whole cargo belonged to his father, who is a native of Rhode Island."

A summary Account of the Life of John the Painter, alias James Hill, alias James Hind, alias James Aetzen, alias James Aitken, tried at Winchester Assize, March 6, 1777, for setting fire to the Rope-House in Portsmouth Dock-Yard, Dec. 7, 1776, (see his Trial at large, p. 243), and who was executed March 10, 1777.

(With an accurate Likeness.)

THE real name of this unhappy man, and resolute incendiary, was James Aitken; he was the only son of David Aitken, a whitesmith *, in the Cow-gate, Edinburgh, and his mother is still living there. He was born at Edinburgh, the 28th of September, 1752, had the advantage of a liberal education at Herriot's hospital, and was brought up in the Kirk of Scotland. He was bound apprentice to a painter in Edinburgh, and served his whole time to his master's satisfaction. From his youth, by reading history, and the various exploits of brave men, he had the desire of accomplishing some great achievement himself: Voltaire was his favourite author, and anti-monarchial writers.

As soon as his apprenticeship was expired, his thoughts were for a commission in the army; but losing his father by death, and his mother and other friends not being able to serve him in this particular, he set off for London to seek his fortune; there, by vice, he soon spent all he had; and to supply his wants he determined to rob. On Finchley Common he began his felonies, and the first night committed several robberies with great success. By his connexion with bad companions and prostitutes, he was again soon reduced to want, which he supplied with highway robberies, private thefts and shop-lifting. At last, fearing detection, he, in 1773, indented himself to the captain of a Virginia ship for a passage to that province in America, and was consigned over to a Mr. Graham, of James Town, to whom he was to pay twenty-four pounds currency, or serve it out in labour. He soon quitted that person's service, and went to Maryland, Philadelphia, Amboy, and New-York, occasionally working as a painter. From the last place he removed to Boston, and was active in sinking the East India Company's tea; but on hearing of the English armaments coming to Boston, he took a passage to North Carolina, and from thence worked his passage in a ship to Liverpool, in May 1775.

April, 1777.

There he enlisted for a soldier, and received twenty-six shillings, but soon deserted, and to supply his returning wants, took to robbing and house-breaking again. He visited Shrewsbury, Birmingham, and Coventry; at which last place he again enlisted with a recruiting party, and received half a guinea, but at three o'clock the next morning he marched off, leaving his comrades asleep. He took the route for London, robbing as he went, and thus supported himself for four months in London. Then he went to Cambridge and to Colchester, where he enlisted a third time in the 13th regiment *, thinking that the change of clothes would prevent his being known and apprehended for the innumerable robberies he had committed. He deserted from this regiment in August 1776, and made for London, from thence to Chichester, Portsmouth, Southampton, Rumsey, Winchester, and Basingstoke, robbing as he went, and near the last place he committed a rape upon a poor girl who was watching some sheep. From this he directed his wicked steps to Oxford, and from a conversation one night there on the American war, and the importance of the fleet and dock-yards, he first embraced and formed the design of destroying them, considering it as an heroic enterprize, as what would entitle him to the first rank in America, and make him become the admiration of the world—like the incendiary Erostratus, who, to become immortal in history, set fire to the famous temple of Diana, at Ephesus.

With these flattering prospects, he set off for Portsmouth to inform himself of all the stores, situation, &c. and hence, to prevent suspicions, he entered into the employ of a painter at Eitchfield. After fully acquainting himself with that yard, he went to Plymouth, Chatham, Woolwich, and Deptford, and surveyed every thing material to his intended project. He first designed to go and lay his plans before the American Congress, but the hazard and difficulty of getting a passage prevented. Then he resolved to go to Mr. Silas Deane, at Paris, and accordingly went to Dover, and hired a small sailing boat to take him to Calais. He arrived at Paris, and with some difficulty, at first obtained a private

N O T E.

* According to this other confession, “in October 1775 he enlisted as a soldier at Gravesend, by the name of James Boswell, and in Dec. 1775, he enlisted at Chard in Somersetshire, into the 13th regiment, but deserted a few days afterwards.”

interview. To make himself the more important to him, he said he had a plantation in America, which he feared would be wasted by the British army, and at length opened his scheme, produced his plans, and assured him of the facility of setting all the yards on fire, if attempted by an active person; adding, he would undertake it himself, if he was assured of being properly rewarded. Mr. Deane looked upon the enterprize as bordering on madness, and started a number of difficulties: the consequences of a detection would be fatal, and if it should appear that America was privy to it, 'twould much injure their cause. In a second interview, Mr. Deane still looked upon it as a desperate scheme, and discouraged it, but said if he dared to attempt it, he might rely on his assistance. On this Aitken shewed him a plan of his machine, and entered into the manner of effecting the design, and desired to know, in case of success (for at present he only wanted a little money to carry him to England) what kind of reward he might expect, intimating his desire of a commission in the American army. Mr. Deane thought his expectations moderate—gave him about three pounds—procured him a passport—enjoined him caution and secrecy, and gave him a direction to one whom he called his friend in London, for further assistance.

With this he set off for Calais, got to Dover and to Canterbury; here he prepared his apparatus, particularly noticed in the trial. From thence he visited Chatham and London, and the 5th day of December he arrived at Portsmouth, to begin his black and mischievous operations. He walked over the town all that night to pitch upon such houses for firing at the same time with the Dock-yard, as would do the most damage, and the next day took one of them for his lodgings. He slept till five o'clock in the morning of Saturday, the day of the fire, when he got up and prepared his combustibles, the smell of which brought up his landlady.

Having perpetrated in part his design at Portsmouth, he hastened to London where he arrived on the Sunday evening following. He presently sought out Dr. Bancroft, the gentleman to whom he was directed by Silas Deane, and according to the account before us, he says, that he told the doctor at once, that “he was the person sent by Mr. Deane from Paris to burn and destroy the dock-yards and shipping belonging to government, that he had set Portsmouth dock on fire, and which was then in flames.” In his other confession, he attests the contrary, declaring that "he did not relate to him the mischief he had done." The doctor disapproving the conversation and slighting him, he went in disgust to Hammer-smith, Oxford, and Hungerford, where he worked ten days as a painter, and then robbed his master of four guineas, and went to Bristol. After making observations on the shipping, &c. there, he set off for Plymouth, and got there the 27th of December. He made several attempts to fire different parts of that dock-yard, but the vigilance of the watchmen prevented him, and he was very near being discovered in the place, over the walls of which he got by a rope ladder.

With vexation he abandoned Plymouth, and hastened to Bristol, where he arrived on the 13th of January, in hope of better success, as he stiled it. And indeed was too successful in some of his attempts, though his trains failed in many of the ships and places where he laid them. For he intended to set the whole town, quays, and shipping in a general blaze. Finding the patrol too vigilant for him to complete his atrocious purposes, he determined to make the best of his way to Paris. In his route he came to Calne, where he broke open a haberdasher's shop and stole to the amount of 20*l*. At Odiham he was taken up by Mr. Dalby the keeper of Andover Bridewell, and was committed on suspicion of breaking open the above shop; but answering the description of John the painter, he was removed to Clerkenwell prison, and notwithstanding his usual reservedness and subtlety, he fell into a trap that was set for him, and to a mere stranger he disclosed his whole proceedings, and put his life into the hands of Baldwin a painter, by whose information, instead of being conveyed to Salisbury for house-breaking, he was carried to Winchester to be tried for setting fire to the dock-yard at Portsmouth.

The Life of David Hume, Esq; written by himself.

I WAS born the 26th of April, 1711, old style, at Edinburgh. I was of a good family, both by father and mother: my father's family is a branch of the Earl of Home's, or Hume's; and my ancestors had been proprietors of the estate, which my brother possesses, for several generations. My mother was daughter of Sir David Falconer, President of the College of Justice: the title of Lord Halkerton came by succession to her brother.

My family, however, was not rich, and, being myself a younger brother, my patrimony, according to the mode of my country, was of course very slender. My father, who passed for a man of parts, died when I was an infant, leaving me, with an elder brother and a sister, under the care of our mother, a woman of singular merit, who, though young and handsome, devoted herself intirely to the rearing and educating of her children. I passed through the ordinary course of education with success, and was seized very early with a passion for literature, which has been the ruling passion of my life, and the great source of my enjoyments. My studious disposition, my sobriety, and my industry, gave my family a notion that the law was a proper profession for me; but I found an insurmountable aversion to every thing but the pursuits of philosophy and general learning; and, while they fancied I was poring upon Voet and Vinnius, Cicero and Virgil were the authors which I was secretly devouring.

My very slender fortune, however, being unsuitable to this plan of life, and my health being a little broken by my ardent application, I was tempted, or rather forced, to make a very feeble trial for entering into a more active scene of life. In 1734, I went to Bristol, with some recommendations to eminent merchants, but in a few months found that scene totally unsuitable to me. I went over to France, with a view of prosecuting my studies in a country retreat; and I there laid that plan of life, which I have steadily and successfully pursued. I resolved to make a very rigid frugality supply my deficiency of fortune, to maintain unimpaired my dependency, and to regard every object as contemptible, except the improvement of my talents for literature.

During my retreat in France, first at Rheims, but chiefly at La Fleche, in Anjou, I composed my Treatise of Human Nature. After passing three years very agreeably in that country, I came over to London in 1737. In the end of 1738, I published my Treatise, and immediately went down to my mother and my brother, who lived at his country-house, and was employing himself very judiciously and successfully in the improvement of his fortune.

Never literary attempt was more unfortunate than my Treatise of Human Nature. It fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction, as even to excite a murmur among the zealots. But, being naturally of a cheerful and sanguine temper, I very soon recovered the blow, and prosecuted with great ardour my studies in the country. In 1742, I printed at Edinburgh the first part of my Essays: the work was favourably received, and soon made me intirely forget my former disappointment. I continued with my mother and brother in the country, and in that time recovered the knowledge of the Greek language, which I had too much neglected in my early youth.

In 1745, I received a letter from the Marquis of Annandale, inviting me to come and live with him in England. I found also, that the friends and family of that young nobleman were desirous of putting him under my care and direction, for the state of his mind and health required it.—I lived with him a twelvemonth.—My appointments during that time made a considerable accession to my small fortune. I then received an invitation from General St. Clair to attend him as a secretary to his expedition, which was at first meant against Canada, but ended in an incursion on the coast of France. Next year, to wit, 1747, I received an invitation from the General to attend him in the same station in his military embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin. I then wore the uniform of an officer, and was introduced at these courts as Aid-de-camp to the General, along with Sir Harry Erskine and Captain Grant, now General Grant.—These two years were almost the only interruptions which my studies have received during the course of my life: I passed them agreeably, and in good company; and my appointments, with my frugality, had made me reach a fortune, which I called independent, though most of my friends were inclined to smile when I said so; in short, I was now master of near a thousand pounds.

Meanwhile, my bookseller, A. Millar, informed me, that my former publications (all but the unfortunate Treatise) were beginning to be the subject of conversation, that the sale of them was gradually increasing, and that new editions were demanded. Answers by Reverends, and Right Reverends, came out two or three in a year; and I found, by Dr. Warburton's railing, that the books were beginning to be esteemed in good company. However, I had fixed a resolution, which I inflexibly maintained, never to reply to any body; and, not being very irascible in my temper, I have easily kept myself clear of all literary squabbles. These symptoms of a rising reputation gave me encouragement, as I was ever more disposed to see the favourable than unfavourable side of things: a turn of mind which it is more happy to possess, than to be born to an estate of ten thousand a year.

In 1751, I removed from the country, to the town, the true scene for a man of letters. In 1752, were published at Edinburgh, where I then lived, my Political Discourses, the only work of mine that was successful on the first publication. It was well received abroad and at home. In the same year was published at London my Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals; which in my opinion (who ought not to judge on that subject) is, of all my writings, historical, philosophical, or literary, incomparably the best. It came unnoticed and unobserved into the world.

In 1752, the Faculty of advocates chose me their librarian, an office from which I received little or no emolument, but which gave me the command of a large library. I then formed the plan of writing the History of England.

Mr. Hume then proceeds to describe the disapprobation and reproach which ensued upon the publication of his History, which discouraged him so much, that had not the war broke out with France, he would have retired to some town in that kingdom, have changed his name, and never more have returned to his native country.

Notwithstanding, continues Mr. Hume, the variety of winds and seasons, to which my writings had been exposed, they had still been making such advances, that the copy-money, given by the booksellers, much exceeded any thing formerly known in England; I was become not only independent, but opulent. I retired to my native country of Scotland, determined never more to set my foot out of it; and retaining the satisfaction of never having preferred a request to one great man, or even making advances of friendship to any of them. As I was now turned of fifty, I thought of passing all the rest of my life in this philosophical manner, when I received, in 1763, an invitation from the Earl of Hertford, with whom I was not in the least acquainted, to attend him on his embassy to Paris, with a near prospect of being appointed secretary to the embassy; and, in the meanwhile, of performing the functions of that office. This offer, however inviting, I at first declined, both because I was reluctant to begin connexions with the great, and because I was afraid that the civilities and gay company of Paris would prove disagreeable to a person of my age and humour: but, on his lordship's repeating the invitation, I accepted of it. I have every reason, both of pleasure and interest, to think myself happy in my connexions with that nobleman, as well as afterwards with his brother, Gen. Conway.

Those, who have not seen the strange effects of modes, will never imagine the reception I met with at Paris, from men and women of all ranks and stations. The more I declined their excessive civilities, the more I was loaded with them. There is, however, a real satisfaction in living at Paris, from the great number of sensible, knowing, knowing, and polite company with which that city abounds above all places in the universe. I thought once of settling there for life.

I was appointed secretary to the embassy; and, in summer, 1765, Lord Hertford left me, being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. I was charge d'affaires till the arrival of the Duke of Richmond, towards the end of the year. In the beginning of 1766 I left Paris, and next summer I returned to Edinburgh in 1769, very opulent (for I possessed a revenue of 1000l. a year), healthy, and though somewhat stricken in years, with the prospect of enjoying long my ease, and of seeing the increase of my reputation.

In spring 1775, I was struck with a disorder in my bowels, which at first gave me no alarm, but has since, as I apprehend it, become mortal and incurable. I now reckon upon a speedy dissolution. I have suffered very little pain from my disorder; and, what is more strange, have, notwithstanding the great decline of my person, never suffered a moment's abatement of my spirits; inasmuch, that, were I to name the period of my life, which I should most chuse to pass over again, I might be tempted to point to this later period. I possess the same ardour as ever in study, and the same gaiety in company. I consider, besides, that a man of sixty-five, by dying, cuts off only a few years of infirmities; and, though I see many symptoms of my literary reputation's breaking out at last with additional lustre, I knew that I could have but few years to enjoy it. It is difficult to be more detached from life than I am at present.

To conclude historically with my own character. I am, or rather was (for that is the style I must now use in speaking of myself, which imboldens me the more to speak my sentiments); I was, I say, a man of mild dispositions, of command of temper, of an open, social, and cheerful humour, capable of attachment, but little susceptible of enmity, and of great moderation in all my passions. Even my love of literary fame, my ruling passion, never soured my temper, notwithstanding my frequent disappointments. My company was not unacceptable to the young and careless, as well as to the studious and literary; and, as I took a particular pleasure in the company of modest women, I had no reason to be displeased with the reception I met with from them. In a word, though most men, any wise eminent, have found reason to complain of calumny, I never was touched, or even attacked, by her baleful tooth; and, though I wantonly exposed myself to the rage of both civil and religious factions, they seemed to be disarmed in my behalf of their wonted fury. My friends never had occasion to vindicate any one circumstance of my character and conduct; not but that the zealots, we may well suppose, would have been glad to invent and propagate any story to my disadvantage, but they could never find any which they thought would wear the face of probability.

Mr. Hume died at Edinburgh, the 25th of August following.

Essays on Politeness.

E S S A Y I.

Of Propriety in Person and Dress.

THE body must be erect, whether we are sitting, standing, or kneeling; the head not inclined to either side, or moved without cause; where there is occasion it must be turned with gravity and decency.

To raise the head with great deliberation, gives an air of pedantic stiffness and self-sufficiency; to sink it between the shoulders, betokens violence; to let it hang upon either side, is the manner of hypocrites; and to turn it frequently without occasion, shews a levity of disposition.

The forehead must not be wrinkled, much less the nose. When we are not speaking, we should avoid gaping or too great a compression of the lips; the countenance should not express melancholy, austerity, or astonishment, neither should it exhibit marks of intemperate joy, or a want of reserve, but be modestly gay, cheerful, and composed.

Wrinkles on the forehead are marks of anger or old age, and are always displeasing; to wrinkle the nose gives an air of mockery, which should be avoided; gaping, compressing the lips too much, or biting them, are marks of stupidity; a mild and cheerful countenance without affectation, is always becoming; but we should not display too much gaiety in serious matters, neither should we appear too grave in familiar and common affairs.

Do not suffer your eyes to stray here and there, but keep them in general, inclined a little downwards; look at no person obliquely, or with a disdainful and supercilious eye; and when you are speaking to any body, do not fix your eyes upon his face, but rather somewhat lower and toward his breast, especially if the person is of a different sex, and has a title to your respect.

To look at a person obliquely, or with an air of disdain and pride, is expressive of contempt; to look a person full in the face, shews a want of respect, especially from an inferior to a superior.

When

When the hands are not employed, keep them quietly before you, and never behind your back, or in your pockets; and carefully avoid all improper motions of the shoulders, arms or legs.

Some people insensibly contract those habits, which they afterwards find very difficult to leave off; and though we cannot absolutely say that they are rude, they are not however strictly conformable to the rules of good breeding, and we cannot be too careful to get rid of them.

Avoid, as much as possible, rubbing your hands, playing with your hair, or stroaking any part of your face; and never touch those parts of the body that decency covers, before any person.

It is unpolite also to use many gestures with the hands when we are conversing with any body: this is the practice of those triflers who are eloquent only in motions and distortions of the body.

Let not your nails be too long or foul; never gnaw them with the teeth, or cut them before others.

The first of these imperfections makes us resemble a harp-player; the second is the behaviour of a dreamer or absent man; and the third is the greatest rudeness.

When sitting, keep your feet on an equal line; never cross your legs, or let them be too wide asunder; neither extend them too far from your seat; and when you are standing, do not put one foot before the other.

Some young people, when they are sitting, beat the ground with their feet, playing with or shaking them continually, or keep them in some disagreeable position. These are all defects that must be carefully avoided.

Make as little noise as possible in blowing your nose; never touch the inside of the nose if possible before company, and when you cannot avoid it, do it always with your handkerchief; and after blowing your nose, never look at what has come from it. You must always spit in your handkerchief, when at table, or in any decent apartment.

The same caution is to be observed with regard to spitting and sneezing; we should neither endeavour to suppress sneezing, or do it more loudly than is customary, for this would be a mark of insolence; but we should do it as gently as possible, and afterwards bow to the company by way of apology.

We should likewise be as careful as possible not to cough in a loud or shrill manner, and avoid sighing or making any noise in breathing that may be heard by others.

We should avoid coughing as much as we can, especially at table and church.

We should take care, when talking or listening to others, not to make any motion with our bodies, but what is proper; we should not express our thoughts by motions of the head, making signs at every thing we say or hear; nor should we rest our head on either hand, contrary to the rules of good-breeding.

These motions of the head in order to express our thoughts upon what we are told, are still so much the practice of people who pretend to politeness, that habit has made it absolutely necessary to them.

We must carefully abstain from all gestures or playing with the hands; we should handle nothing of our dress without necessity: we must never make a cracking noise with our fingers, by pulling them; nor should we play with them or our feet, as if we were beating a drum. In fine, while we are standing, we should be careful to be firm on our feet.

This rule is generally prescribed to children, but there are many grown persons who still want the same admonition; they fall into the error through habit or inattention.

Propriety and neatness in dress should be observed, without any appearance of affectation or vanity. We should not be over attentive to this article, either in viewing or adjusting it, without necessity.

Propriety comprehends a great part of decorum, and contributes as much as any thing to shew the merit and good sense of a person; for it is impossible, on seeing people ridiculously dressed, not to suppose them ridiculous in themselves. Propriety is a certain consistency between the dress and the person, as decorum in other things is the fitness of words and actions with regard to ourselves and others. But neatness or cleanliness is the second part of decency, and it is the more necessary, as it supplies the want of the other. If the cloaths are clean and neat, especially if the linen is clean, it is not necessary to be richly dressed; merit in this respect may be conspicuous even under the appearance of poverty.

Propriety in dress requires that it should be suited to the shape, condition, and age of the persons. All disproportion should be avoided; it is contrary to propriety, and consists either in an excess of neatness, which is the error of vanity and self-love, or in too much negligence, the fault of lazy and idle persons, who are naturally slovenly and dirty.

It is an essential part of propriety to have the cloaths suited to the size and shape; the contrary is exceedingly disgusting.—We must however observe, that if fashion prescribes prescribes every part of dress to be large, a little person must not follow the full extent of the mode; otherwise, if he wears a very broad brimmed hat, because it is the fashion, the hat alone, in a manner, will be seen to move; and this observation will also hold good in respect to other things. It is not less important to adopt our dress to our station and years. If, for example, a clergyman should resemble a man of the world in his dress, and an old man a youth of twenty, there would be some room to suspect the sanity of their understanding.

Conform to the fashion, and avoid the two extremes of affectation and negligence; be not the first to follow, nor the last to forsake it; retrench the luxury of dress, and reduce it within the bounds of moderation; this will impress an idea of your virtue and good sense.

Fashion is a law to which propriety and decorum require indispensable obedience; to this imperial mistress even reason must give way; we must dress agreeable to her decrees without opposition, unless we are resolved to avoid society. But we must never carry it to excess, either in affectation or negligence, if we wish to avoid being ridiculous. A man, who would obstinately wear a hat remarkably large, while the fashion prescribed one of a very small size, would be pointed at. To avoid all charge of caprice, it is necessary to comply with general custom.

*The English Theatre.
Drury-Lane.*

ON Saturday evening the 1st inst. a young lady named Sherborne, made her first appearance at this Theatre, in the part of Louisa, in The Deserter. She seemed to be under uncommon apprehensions; but being encouraged by a generous audience, and particularly by the clamour of the Gods (who, though not distinguished for justice, are often merciful), she gave some imperfect specimens of taste, judgment and powers, which were received with applause.

Tuesday night, the 11th inst. the Comedy of The Rivals was performed for the benefit of Miss Younge. The Interlude called Margaret of Anjou, was trifling and absurd, beyond any thing we have lately seen; and we wondered Miss Younge should think it worth exhibiting, even for once. The story was as follows;—

A madwoman and her child appear in an enchanted wood, (we use the word enchanted, because otherwise how are we to account for the music) the child goes to sleep very kindly, while its mamma rants and raves like a bedlamite; to afford her lungs some respite, at every climax of her passion, the fiddles strike up, and give us a tune accordant to the mad-woman's phrenzy; at length little Master wakes, his mother grins horribly, and clasps him close; a green-coated brute comes on to rob them; but hearing they were his Queen and Prince, forgets his villain's business, and carries them to a vessel ready just by (although but the moment before we were given to understand they were near St. Alban's); and the interlude concludes.

Thursday, March 20, was performed at this Theatre, for the first time, a new comic opera, called The Milesian, the characters of which were as follow:

M E N.

George Belfield,	—	Mr. Bannister.
Valentine Belfield,	—	Mr. Vernon.
Charles Marlow, his	}	Mr. Dodd. fellow-student,
Capt. Cornelius O'Goliher,	—	Mr. Moody.
Mr. Belfield,	—	Mr. Aickin.
Servants, Mr. Burton, Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Everard.

W O M E N.

Caroline Meanwell,	—	Mrs. Baddely.
Mrs. Belfield,	—	Mrs. Booth.
Miss Belfield,	—	Miss Collet.
Maid-Servant,	—	Mrs. Davies.

The fable of this comic opera is so far Aristotelian, that it is truly simple, the sketch of which is as follows: Mr. Belfield, a gentleman of fortune, has two sons, George and Valentine Belfield; the first a lieutenant of a man of war, the second a student in the Temple. The student has seduced a Miss Meanwell, (a girl otherwise of very good character) to live with him, whom he has, at times, some thoughts of marrying; but is irresolute in his choice. Whilst he is under this doubt, his brother George arrives from sea, along with his captain, Cornelius O'Goliher (the Milesian), who are invited to spend a month at Mr. Belfield's. During this time Mr. Belfield, finding the Captain an honest, good-natured man, he persuades him to prevail on his son Valentine to marry Miss Meanwell, which the Captain (though he never saw either of the parties till that instant) undertakes to compass.

With this view they take a walk together, and stopping by the way at a public house, the Captain, after some conversation, insists upon his marrying the poor creature, as he calls her. Valentine at first refuses, but his servant coming in just at that moment to tell him his friend Charles Marlow had run off with his own sister, the Captain takes advantage of his threatening to kill Marlow, by asking him,

“Whether

"Whether he does not deserve the same usage himself?" This brings him to recollection, and he promises marriage. At an interview, by the chapter of surprises, it turns out thus: Miss Meanwell is the Captain's own daughter, and with their marriage, and that of Charles Marlow's with that of Valentine's sister, the piece concludes.

Such is the outline of this strange far-rago, which is totally deficient in character, observation, wit, dialogue, or humour; nay, even of the mechanical knowledge of stage effect. The music, however, in several of the airs is pretty, and gave the piece that reception, that many a dull fellow gets in company from being able to sing a good song.

Covent-Garden.

ON Monday the 3d instant, Mrs. Barry made her first appearance here after Mr. Barry's death. She spoke an address to the audience previous to the play. We are extremely sorry to disapprove of Mrs. Barry's conduct in any thing. But she was certainly ill-advised in addressing the audience at all, and particularly in a flowery metaphorical language. Her superior talents are her protection; and it is the interest of all men of sense and real taste to give her every encouragement and support which she can well wish. She played the part of Lady Randolph, in the tragedy of Douglas, with uncommon feeling and interest. Those passages which were most analogous to her own distressed situation, she spoke with less clearness and spirit than usual, but with so much real anguish as to draw more tears than we have ever seen shed at any performance on the theatre.

Opera-House.

ON Saturday the 15th inst. was performed at this theatre a new serious opera called Telemaco, the music entirely new, by Signor Tomaso Trajetta.

The fable of this opera is taken from the well-known and beautiful epic poem, entitled Telemachus, and written by the celebrated Archbishop of Cambray. The few alterations which have been made, reflect no honour on the genius or judgment of the author, who indeed throughout the opera, discovers neither the invention nor fire of a poet; but the music made amends to the real lovers of that divine art, for the want of talents in the writer of the opera. The recitative, airs, and choruses, were in an original, manly, expressive style, that seemed to astonish and frighten the audience, some of whom have lately been accustomed to the feeble strains of Gauzzini, or the soporific Scotch compilations of Dibdin, Linley, &c. Trajetta seems to be animated with the genius of a Handel, and, to the honour of Italy, he is there esteemed the best composer of the present age. The scenes, decorations, dances, &c. were in the usual paltry manner, strongly marked with the effects of that economical spirit for which Mr. Yates seems to wish to immortalize himself.

Oratorios.

ON Wednesday the 12th inst. in the Oratorio of L' Allegro Il Penseroso, was introduced The Song of Moses, set to music by young Linley, who has mistaken a middling talent for playing on the fiddle, for that of writing music, and the impulse of conceit for that of genius; of which the composition of this evening discovered not the least share.

Foot's Theatre, Hay-Market.

Tuesday evening the 10th inst. the well known George Alexander Stevens exhibited his Lecture upon Heads. When Mr. Stevens first produced his Lecture, we conceived so high an opinion of his wit and genius, that our imaginations could hardly set bounds to the various entertaining, moral, and even philosophical uses to which it might be applied. We considered it then as a Coup d'Essai, which private motives had driven him hastily upon; and which the same reasons obliged him to repeat, until the profits of it should give him leisure. Mr. Stevens, by means of his Lecture upon Heads, has been brought into easy, or rather affluent circumstances. He has been at perfect leisure to revise, correct, and greatly improve his Lecture. No man can be more capable than he is, of rendering it as free from faults, and as perfect as it is capable of being rendered.

With this opinion of Mr. Stevens, and of the capability of his plan, we were greatly disappointed when we heard the old Lecture almost verbatim, and could observe hardly any alterations, except in the fashions of the head-dresses, for which we are not indebted to him. Mr. Stevens is grown rich, and therefore lazy. His advertisement declares this to be the last season of its ever being exhibited in London. We are almost tempted to wish he had continued poor, until he had brought his first plan to some degree of perfection.

The whole Trial of Doctor Dodd, at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, on Saturday the 22d of February, as taken by Mr. Joseph Gurney, and published by the Authority of the Court.

(Concluded from our last, p. 192.)

Mr. Justice Gould.

I Have had abundance of application from the Grand Jury upon the circuit; they came to me, I remember, at Lancaster, particularly three or four instances; they said, here are such persons committed, and without the evidence of one or other it will be impossible to find the bill; then upon reading the depositions and informations, I have ordered that man to be admitted an evidence.

Mr. Davenport.—My Lord, with respect to the carrying of Robertson before the Grand Jury; the mode of bringing him thither has created this confusion; an application in consequence of our advice was made to this Court, not as it is misunderstood, to admit him, for that was not our advice, but merely to acquaint the Court that that was the intention of the prosecutor; we conceiving, and if we are wrong, the criminal law in this respect, I hope, will be set upon a more certain footing, that the prosecutor had a right to adduce what witness he pleased; and that the law only could reject him upon the foot of an accomplice; that I conceive to be the law, and stand here to learn if it be not; taking that to be so, and that it is our error, if there be one, for I would wish in the hearing of such an audience as this, that the innocent officer should not be reflected upon, nor the parties who are concerned in this prosecution, for they are at least as innocent and irreproachable, I will venture to say, as any man that would venture to traduce them. What have they done to produce not only such appellations, but it is publicly given out in the papers, that they had surreptitiously obtained the order of this Court: my Lords, out of decency and out of respect, and as a lawyer, I conceive that nothing but decency and respect could have made it necessary for them to apply to the Court, I take it to be the common practice, and I shall be corrected if I am wrong, that for all prisoners in this gaol, necessary to be carried to Hicks's-hall before the justices, there is an order of course at the sessions upon a 2s. fee; to send down their officer, their deputy, the lowest, the meanest man they have amongst them, to fetch that prisoner from the keeper of Newgate, to give his testimony, and to bring him back.

Mr. Justice Gould.—Is that so? for I asked that question of Mr. Akerman, who has been gaoler here, as he informed me, twenty-two or twenty-three years, and he says positively, that there never was such a thing done when a man was in Newgate, without an order of this Court, that it was so in all his experience.

Mr. Davenport.—Did he inform your Lordships that there ever had been such an order from this Court?

Mr. Justice Gould.—I take that for granted.

Mr. Justice Willes.—The Justices at Hicks's-hall could have no power to send such an order for Mr. Robertson, because he is a London commitment.

Mr. Manley.—I speak with respect to the practice; when we came to the Quarter Sessions we waited about an hour and half for bringing up this prisoner; we were told that we might wait till eternity, that he never could be brought before the Grand Jury upon the order of this Court, that it belonged to that Court, and without we paid for that order we might wait for ever; I paid for that order, and he was brought up.

Mr. Colepeper.—I do not remember that any justice at Hicks's-hall ever gave an order to bring an evidence before the Grand Jury: I am sure they never made an order to bring a prisoner from hence to be carried before the Grand Jury. We never made an order to bring any body before the Grand Jury; we make an order to bring them before us in a matter before us for trial.

Mr. Justice Willes.—Certainly this order was of no validity, in fact it was only obtained, not drawn up by the direction of the Court.

Mr. Davenport.—I mentioned what I know to be the practice, whether properly or improperly done is totally beside this argument; I mentioned it as I professed it, merely for the sake of the exculpation of those who took it to be right; and I go farther, that all the counsel at the table, on one side and the other, thought it right. As to the importance of the order, the validity of it, or the authority of those who issued it, I take to be beside this question, because where a bill, which, upon its face on the parchment before your Lordships, appears to be a legal one, and above exception, there is no power in any court to inquire how that bill was obtained; it is, in my judgment, totally immaterial. The fact is, the witness Lewis Robertson was at Hicks's-hall; hall; he was before the Grand Jury; had he been brought there by Mr. Akerman without authority, is it an objection to the witness, or his examination? had he escaped from Mr. Akerman for that purpose, and came back again, is it an objection to his competency, or to their examination of him? or can the Grand Jury reject him, and say, how are you brought here? be it therefore by a wrong in law, or be it by a right in law, the fact is, he was there; and, as I have stated before, if Mr. Akerman the keeper of Newgate, against the duty of his office, if the Quarter Sessions, against the authority they bear, had taken him there, if the prisoner had broke the gaol, and had gone there, still my argument is this, that being there there is no other question, but is he competent or incompetent? My Lords, that is the question here, and will your Lordships now say that the Grand Jury were themselves not indictable, if they had rejected the witness upon that ground? my Lords, I could not have defended a Grand Jury who had rejected a witness offering his testimony, upon any ground of legal incompetency, I should have stood in an awkward situation as counsel for such a Grand Jury; if I am wrong I shall be corrected in that, if I am right, then the Grand Jury did their duty in the examination, your Lordships will do yours in trying the facts upon the parchment, to which there is no objection, at least at present, made; if there be any, I am sure for one, whatever may be in favour of the prisoner, from whatever quarter it comes, I shall be perfectly satisfied; the only fear I ever possessed is, not that a prisoner should escape, but lest it should be my fault to convict him. The witness, having been examined, is now objected to, not as incompetent here, for then the gentlemen are before their time in the objection; when he is brought here it is time enough to argue, that, without your lordships order, he stands at your bar as a witness; I say, that is the time when the objection is to be made: I hope when that time comes, the objection will be answered; I feel myself, in my own judgment, at least, very capable of answering it upon principles of law, upon the received and universal practice in the little experience I have had; then, my lords, if the gentlemen are before their time in the objection, we are so far right, that we are in possession of a bill found by a Grand Jury competent to examine witnesses, competent to find, and competent to return it: from such a Grand Jury this bill comes. My lords, it has been said, that I subscribe to the doctrine, that if there is an outlaw upon the Grand Jury, if there is one that by law is no grand jurymen, that it vitiates the indictment. What is the solid and substantial sense of the objection? for cases may be quoted for ever, lines may be produced out of books, but they will want foundation and sense when they come to be examined; and what is the sense of the objection? that the grand jurymen being no grand jurymen at all, why there was no Grand Jury. What is the law then? I say, that as to objections arising from the incompetency of the Grand Jury, it goes to this solid plain position, and indeed all law is resolvable, when understood, into the plainest positions; it is not the law for this or any other country, if it is not intelligible to every man's capacity; it requires some pains to trace and find out, but when explained it must be intelligible.

Mr. Justice Gould.—Mr. Howarth, you see the counsel for the crown insinuate upon going on with the indictment, found as it is; suppose conviction should follow upon this trial, to be sure the Court will save the question, whether Robertson was improperly and illegally produced before the Grand Jury, for the opinion of all the judges; but it is not for the Court to give advice one way or the other;—the Court give no advice, but the counsel for the prosecutor proceed upon this indictment at their peril.

Mr. Baron Perryn.—Mr. Mansfield, you will take into your consideration, that if you proceed upon this indictment, and the judges afterwards should be of opinion that it ought not to have been proceeded upon, because it was improperly obtained, the consequence will be, that the prisoner can never be tried upon any other indictment for this crime, and therefore this prosecution must be final; whereas if you have any objection in your mind respecting the propriety of proceeding upon this indictment, another indictment may now be preferred before the Grand Jury, and you may now make your application to this Court for the purpose of producing Lewis Robertson as a witness before the Grand Jury; and I will freely own my sentiments that a judge has no right to give his advice, whether a person's testimony is sufficient to convict another; but when the trial comes on, he is then to form his idea of the competency of that evidence; and I will never, while I am a judge, give my opinion what evidence ought to be produced: and the construction put upon what was quoted from Lord Hale is, that what is said by the Court before trial could not be given by way of advice, but only when he is brought brought to trial: it is contrary to the constitution that the opinion of the judge should be taken before the trial; and I should have no difficulty, I own, whatfoever, to pronounce an order for taking Robertson out of the custody of Mr. Akerman, to be produced before the Grand Jury; and my idea of it is, that it would be an order of course, provided he had been in our calendar; and all the litigation of this day has proceeded from too great and an improper lenity to the prisoner at the bar in not putting him upon the footing of other prisoners, by bringing him here six days before the sessions; and whoever was the author of that lenity has produced all this confusion. You will consider whether you will proceed upon this or prefer another bill.

Mr. Howarth.—I have advised with the gentlemen with whom I have the honour to be of counsel for Dr. Dodd. We made this objection to your lordships under the hope that it had some weight and substance in it; I believe all of us are rather the more confirmed in that objection by the arguments of the gentlemen on the other side; and we are willing and desirous, on the part of Dr. Dodd, that the trial should proceed, if your lordships will reserve the question for the opinion of the Twelve Judges.

WILLIAM DODD, Doctor of Laws, was indicted for that he on the 4th of February instant, at St. James's, Westminster, feloniously did falsely make, forge, and counterfeit, and cause and procure to be falsely made, forged, and counterfeited, and willingly act and assist in the false making, forging, and counterfeiting a certain paper writing, partly printed and partly written, purporting to be a bond, and to be signed by the Right Honourable the Earl of Chesterfield, with the name of Chesterfield, and to be sealed and delivered by the said Earl; the tenor of which said false, forged, and counterfeit paper writing, partly printed and partly written, purporting to be a bond, is as followeth, (that is to say)

'Know all men by these presents that I the Right Honourable the Earl of Chesterfield am held and firmly bound to Henry Fletcher, of London, Banker, Esq; in the sum of eight thousand four hundred pounds of good and lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid to the said Henry Fletcher, Esq; or his certain attorney, executors, administrators, or assigns, for which payment to be well and faithfully made I bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators,

'firmly by these presents, sealed with my seal, dated the fourth day of February, in the seventeenth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord George the Third, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland King, defender of the faith and so forth, and in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy seven.

Mr. Mansfield.—May it please your Lordship and Gentlemen of the Jury, this as you have heard already is an indictment against the prisoner at the bar, Dr. Dodd, for the crime of forgery, which in the words of the indictment is forging, and causing or procuring to be forged, and aiding and assisting in forging a false instrument called a bond; there is another charge for forging a receipt, the bond and receipt relating to one another, being two different instruments: the indictment charges him as being a forger of those two instruments, as assisting in forging them, and as publishing them knowing them to be forged; to this indictment Doctor Dodd has pleaded that he is Not guilty; and you are now upon the evidence which shall be brought before you, to decide whether Dr. Dodd is, or is not guilty of either of these crimes so imputed to him. As this prosecution and the transaction which gave occasion to it has been made the subject of very general discourse, and has been so circulated in the papers, that there is scarce any man at all that is acquainted with what passes in this city, but supposes himself to know very much about the crime imputed to Dr. Dodd, and from the stories that have been circulated, from the representations that have been made of it, judgments are very apt to be formed prejudicial to the person upon whose life you are now to determine, it is very much to be lamented that it is impossible to keep transactions of this sort from being thus made the subject of public talk, because from thence prejudices are very apt to arise in the minds of those who perhaps afterwards may sit as you do in judgment upon the matter, and I mention this to you merely for this reason, because I myself, as well as the prosecutor of Dr. Dodd, would be very sorry that he or any man standing in his situation should suffer the least prejudice from any thing that hath been said or heard before the actual trial; and I wish you therefore upon the present occasion so to judge and so to act, as if that which you will now hear from the witnesses was the first relation that had ever reached your ears concerning this matter: suppose it now to be intirely fresh, and that this is the first moment of your lives in which you knew that Dr. Dodd was to be brought to a trial under an accusation of forgery; it would be a great pleasure to me, I am sure it would to those, who for the sake of justice alone carry on this prosecution, to find that the evidence should be such as would in your judgment warrant you to pronounce that Dr. Dodd is not guilty of the crime that is imputed to him. On the other hand, if the evidence should be such as fully and beyond all doubt evinces the guilt imputed to him, then, however you and every man may lament that a gentleman of his function and character should descend to the commission of such a crime, yet uneasy and disgustful as the office is, and sorry as you may be to perform it, you will do your duty and say, that Dr. Dodd is guilty as he is proved to be; I am indeed, gentlemen, very much afraid, that though I sincerely wish it may be in your power to acquit the prisoner, that consistently with a very few plain facts that I have to state to you, it will be utterly impossible for any man who hears the story proved to think him so; it will be enough either to prove him to be the person who forged, or who published the instrument or the receipt, knowing them to be forged; the crime is the same in the judgment of the law, the guilt in point of conscience is the same, the punishment to be inflicted is the same, but I am afraid there will be no doubt but this unfortunate gentleman will be proved to be certainly the author, the forger, and likewise the publisher. The facts by which this will be made out to you are but few; the bond is for a large sum of money, the sum of 4200*l.* purporting to be a bond from Lord Chesterfield to Mr. Fletcher. The receipt is for 4200*l.* paid by Mr. Fletcher as to my Lord Chesterfield, a receipt purporting to be a receipt of my Lord Chesterfield; it is a bond for an annuity of 700*l.* a year, and 4200*l.* was the sum to be raised upon it; the bond apparently is signed by Lord Chesterfield; it is signed by the name of Chesterfield; it is attested by Dr. Dodd; it is attested also by a Mr. Lewis Robertson; now, when it will be proved to you, as it will be most clearly by Lord Chesterfield himself as well as by others, who are perfectly well acquainted with Lord Chesterfield's manner of writing, that this is not his bond, that he never signed it, it will thus be made out clearly to have been signed by somebody else, to have been forged by somebody; the same observation is to be made with regard to the receipt, for then when it is proved, as it will be, not to be the bond, not to be the receipt of Lord Chesterfield, but to have been forged by somebody; it will then in the next place be proved to you beyond a doubt, that the hand-writing of the person who wrote the name of William Dodd, the name of the prisoner now standing before you, was written by himself, as his hand-writing is extremely well known, and that hand writing will be very clearly proved; now, gentlemen, if the case rested there, unless it was in the power (which for one I wish it might be) of the prisoner at the bar to shew to you that this was not his hand-writing, or that my Lord Chesterfield's signing was really my Lord Chesterfield's, why there would be clear and decisive evidence against him as the forger of this bond; in general so strong evidence as that cannot possibly be obtained to prove a forgery; because, in general hands are disguised, feigned names are used, and it is difficult to make out the signature; but here it will be proved, that the name William Dodd is really and truly the hand-writing of the prisoner. Then if a bond is proved to be forged, if the hand-writing of a man charged as the forger, is proved to be to it as the witness, and he cannot explain it, why, then there is clear and full proof that it is forged by him; and if the case stopt at that point, I am afraid it would be utterly impossible for the prisoner to make out his innocence; but as there are various other circumstances in this case, it is necessary for me to relate them to you.

When this bond first appeared to Mr. Fletcher, or Mr. Peach, who assisted Mr. Fletcher in advancing the money, being signed by the name Chesterfield, with these witnesses names, Dodd and Robertson, affixed to it, it had the effect, that money to the amount of 4200*l.* was advanced. Robertson, I believe, was a broker employed to negotiate this matter. After the money had been obtained, and the bond deposited with Mr. Manly, who acted as attorney for Mr. Fletcher, he observed upon the bond a very remarkable blot; there was no particular effect, I think, in this blot, but it was in the letter e in the word seven, which you will observe in the bond: this was upon the 5th of February, the bond bore date upon the 4th; and upon the 5th of February Mr. Manly seeing this, it struck him as something singular; he spoke to Mr. Fletcher about it, and told him that this bond had a very odd blot in it; there were some strokes both above and below the line of the bond, which had a very singular appearance; though they could not tell for what purpose any thing had been done with a pen, yet there appeared scratches with a pen as if something had been done: Mr. Manly talking to Mr. Fletcher about it, Mr. Fletcher wished that another bond might be prepared, fairly and without any blot, and might be carried to Lord Chesterfield to execute: this produced a meeting between Mr. Manly and my Lord Chesterfield upon the 7th of February: upon the 7th of February, Lord Chesterfield field seeing this bond, said it was a forgery, and not his bond. The next step which was taken was that which was fit; an information was made before the Lord Mayor; and this bond having first appeared to Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Peach in the city of London, Dr. Dodd and Mr. Robertson were both carried before that magistrate; but before they were carried before the Lord Mayor, Mr. Manly went with an officer, together with Robertson, to Dr. Dodd's, and Mr. Manly then acquainted Dr. Dodd with the business on which he came; Mr. Manly told Dr. Dodd that he was very sorry to attend him upon such an occasion; that it was upon a charge of forgery against him, the forging a bond of Lord Chesterfield's. Dr. Dodd appeared, as any one naturally would with such a charge brought against him, very much shocked. He was asked, what it was that could induce him to do this deed? and Dr. Dodd, struck and overwhelmed with a charge so brought upon him, and Robertson being present, whose name appears upon the bond, Dr. Dodd said, that it was urgent necessity had pressed him to it. He then gave some reasons, some tradesmen's bills, I think, that he had to pay; that he meant no injury to Lord Chesterfield or any one, that he meant to pay the money back, and had resources by which he should be able to do it; but he did not deny it, he did not pretend to deny it, he did not insinuate that he was innocent of the charge, but only, as I tell you, gave some reasons, by way of palliating the crime, for his having committed it: when carried before the magistrate, and again charged with this crime, Dr. Dodd did not then deny it; but he applied for mercy, said that he was very willing to make every reparation in his power; that he had a regard for Lord Chesterfield, and applying to Lord Chesterfield's compassion and tenderness, hoped there might be no prosecution; but neither then, nor when Mr. Manly first charged him, did he at all deny the crime, but, you see, held language and conversation which did in the most express terms admit his guilt. This is in general the amount of the proofs against Dr. Dodd, depending, you see, not merely upon Lord Chesterfield, but upon those acquainted with his hand and those acquainted with Dr. Dodd's, and upon those who were present at those confessions: besides this, we shall be able to explain to you how this matter began and was transacted: Mr. Robertson was, as I have told you, a broker, and appears to have been the agent of Dr. Dodd in this business: but I must, in justice to Mr. Robertson, say, that being himself perfectly satisfied by the representations of Dr. Dodd, that it was the bond of Lord Chesterfield; and I have the more reason to say this, because at the first interview, in the presence of Mr. Manly, when he charged Dr. Dodd, Mr. Robertson called out upon Dr. Dodd to say whether he was not perfectly innocent; and it is justice to Dr. Dodd, as well as Mr. Robertson, to say, that upon that occasion he did, and in the most emphatic expressive terms, acquit Mr. Robertson of his being in any wise criminal, of his being at all acquainted with the forgery or having any thing to do with it: this he did more than once in terms very explicit, which did convince every one that had any thing to do with this affair, and were concerned in this prosecution, that though Robertson was certainly blameable in suffering his name to appear as a witness to an instrument which he did not see executed by Lord Chesterfield, which it purports that he did, yet that he was himself imposed upon, that he bore no part at all in the forgery: Mr. Robertson will tell you, that from Dr. Dodd he received the bond, that at his instance he negotiated it; and that Dr. Dodd had the money produced from this bond we know, because by Dr. Dodd that money that he had received upon the bond was refunded, except a small sum he had made use of; 3000*l.* was advanced in notes upon the house of Raymond and Co. of which Mr. Fletcher was a partner, the other in Banknotes; there was something Robertson had as the brokerage, the rest went to Dr. Dodd; and Robertson will give you an account of this, and will explain to you how the transaction began. This is in general the nature of the evidence we have to lay before you; and after what I have stated to you with regard to Robertson, I am sure every body will go before me in considering that it was not false clemency in the prosecutor, or any improper motive whatever that made him, or those that advised him, think that it was fit and proper to use the testimony of Robertson upon this occasion, though without that it is so extremely strong, you will see, upon Dr. Dodd, that it will be almost impossible, I think, for him to answer it: there are matters of smaller consequence and less moment that will appear in the cause, which it is not necessary for me to trouble you with. Dr. Dodd, you see, is charged as the forger, and as the publisher, that is, the person who uses, who delivers this instrument, knowing it to be forged; and if he be proved to be guilty of either, the crime is equally enormous, in the judgment of the law, and the punishment is the same. Mr. Robertson is guilty of a behaviour

behaviour which no one can but blame, in having suffered his name to stand upon this bond which he had never seen executed, and in saying, as I believe he did, that he had seen it executed at the time when it went out of his hand ; but all this was under a perfect persuasion, in consequence of the representations of Dr. Dodd, that the bond was really genuine. When these facts are laid before you, you know very well your duty ; it will be for you to draw the conclusion. If the evidence be such as does irresistibly prove that Dr. Dodd forged or published either of the instruments, knowing them to be forged, then you will pronounce him guilty ; if you see any room upon the evidence to doubt of his being guilty, if you are not perfectly convinced that he is, to be sure you and every one present at this trial will be glad that there should be a reason for you to give a contrary verdict, and for saying that he is innocent.

Mr. Davenport.—Pray, my Lord Chesterfield, has your lordship got a release from Mr. Fletcher ?

The Earl of Chesterfield. I have (produces it.)

Mr. JOHN MANLY sworn.

Did you see that release executed by Mr. Fletcher ?—I did.

[The release from Mr. Fletcher to the Earl of Chesterfield was read in Court ; it appeared that his lordship was thereby released from all actions and all demands by Mr. Fletcher upon his lordship from the beginning of the world to this time.]

(Mr. Manly produced the bond.)

Has that bond been out of your sight since you first had the custody of it ?—Yes ; it has been in Mr. Fletcher's custody as well as mine ; it came into my custody on Tuesday the 4th instant ; it has remained in my custody ever since, except the night after we made the information ; it was left that night, to the best of my remembrance, at Mr. Fletcher's ; that was on Friday the 7th ; it was locked up in Mr. Fletcher's room ; it was locked up in his counting-house to the best of my remembrance with the bills, and he gave it me back again afterwards.

Is that the same bond that you gave to Mr. Fletcher and that you received back from him ?—I believe so.

Mr. HENRY FLETCHER sworn.

Did you deliver the bond you received of Mr. Manly back again to him ?—I did ; it was always in my custody till I delivered it back.

Cross Examination.

Did you intrust it into the hands of any person ?—It was always in the room ; it was never out of my sight.

Mr. John Manly. There is one circumstance that I should mention ; I entrusted my clerk to take a copy of the bond, and it was then out of my sight.

Mr. WILLIAM MANLY sworn.

Was that bond delivered to you by your brother, Mr. John Manly, to copy ?—It was ; I delivered it to him again immediately after I had copied it.

Was it ever out of your custody ?—Never.

The Right Hon. the Earl of CHESTERFIELD sworn.

Is the name Chesterfield in that bond your lordship's hand-writing ?—It is not.

Was the bond ever produced to your lordship till it was produced by Mr. Manly ?—I never saw it till that time.

When was that ?—Tuesday the 7th of February.

Did your lordship ever see or deliver that bond at all ?—Never.

Is the name Chesterfield to that receipt your lordship's hand-writing ?—It is not.

Did you ever see that bond before it was produced by Mr. Manly ?—Never.

Does your lordship know the prisoner William Dodd ?—I do.

Your lordship has known him a long time, I believe ?—I have.

He was your lordship's tutor, I understand ?—He was.

Has your lordship often seen him write ?—I have often.

Has your lordship ever observed enough of his hand-writing to be able to say whether that William Dodd, wrote as a subscribing witness to the bond, is the hand-writing of the prisoner ?—I have.

Does your lordship believe that to be his hand-writing ?—I believe it is.

Can your lordship form any belief whose hand-writing the name Chesterfield is ?—I cannot.

Mr. Howarth. I beg to ask Mr. Manly, whether he delivered the bond the first time into the hands of Mr. Fletcher, or left it at Mr. Fletcher's house ?—I delivered it to himself, to the best of my remembrance ; it was not left at the house for him.

Mr. ALBERT INNIS sworn.

Are you acquainted with Lord Chesterfield's hand-writing ?—I am.

Is the name of Chesterfield to that bond his lordship's hand-writing ?—No, it is not.

Look at the receipt ; is the name Chesterfield to that his lordship's hand-writing ?—Neither is this his hand-writing.

Mr.

Mr. SAMUEL LEACROT sworn.

Have you seen Dr. Dodd write?—I don't recollect Dr. Dodd's hand writing.

Mr. JAMES NEALE sworn.

Have you seen Dr. Dodd write?—I have.

Look at the name William Dodd in that bond, and tell the Court whether from the knowledge you have of his hand-writing you believe that to be his or not?—From the similarity of what I have seen Dr. Dodd write, I am inclined to believe it it.

Look at the other name William Dodd subscribed to the receipt; is that in your opinion Dr. Dodd's hand-writing?—In my opinion it is; as treasurer of a public charity, of which the doctor was the founder, I have frequently seen him subscribe his name: the charity is for the relief of persons confined for small debts.

And from the knowledge you have of his hand-writing, you are inclined to think that is his hand-writing?—I am.

Mr. JEFFREY OAKES sworn.

I am steward to my Lord Chesterfield; I have frequently seen his lordship write.

Look at that name Chesterfield to the bond and to the receipt, and tell the Court whether you think that is his lordship's hand-writing?—No; I never saw Lord Chesterfield write such a hand in my life.

[The bond and the receipt were read in Court, and compared with the statement of them in the record, with which they literally tallied.]

Council for the Crown. Mr. Manly, you will now be pleased to inform the Court what you know of this transaction?—On Tuesday the 4th of this instant February, the bond that has been produced, with a warrant of attorney and a letter which is in my possession, were left at my chambers when I was not at home, as I was told, by Mr. Peach, who is a Silk-merchant in Bread-street; he came with the Broker, Lewis Robertson, as I was informed, and left them there for me to look at; I found them on my desk when I came home: I was informed that the sum of money had been paid: this was all the information I then had; they were left for me to look at to see if all was right.

Court. Were they left on behalf of any particular client?—Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Peach are both my clients; I perused the bond, I believe, first: I observed in the condition of the bond a very remarkable blot in the letter e in the word seven, before seven hundred pounds; it was a blot of a remarkable nature; it did not appear to me to be the effect of chance, but the act of a pen, dotted in hair-strokes in a particular manner, as if done by design.

Does that appear in that bond now?—It does.

(The bond is shewn to the Jury.)

Mr. Manly. The letter (e) is totally obliterated: I thought it a remarkable circumstance, and yet I could see no end it could answer to give me any reason or cause to suspect it was a forgery; however I thought it so remarkable as to be necessary to let Mr. Fletcher know it; accordingly I sent to Mr. Fletcher, and he came to me on the Wednesday evening.

That was next day?—I shewed Mr. Fletcher the bond, and the blot, I asked him what he thought of it? he said it was something very remarkable; I said it was; he said, I think it is best to write over a clean bond, and I will get you to wait upon Lord Chesterfield with it.

Council for the Prosecutor. Tell the Court and the gentlemen of the jury, when it was you first saw Dr. Dodd?—Shall I mention what passed with Lord Chesterfield first?

Court. I think it will save time to let Mr. Manly tell his story.

You went to Lord Chesterfield?—I did.

Counsel for the Prisoner. Mr. Manly knows very well what is evidence, and therefore I desire he will not enter into any other particulars.

Court. He is going to give evidence of what he has referred to already, and therefore he may go on without interruption.

Mr. Manly. On Thursday the 6th of February, I went to Lord Chesterfield's; not meeting with his lordship at home, I took the liberty of writing a note to his lordship, acquainting his lordship with my visit, and the business, and that I should call the next morning at ten; accordingly soon after ten on the Friday morning, I went to Lord Chesterfield's and saw his lordship; his lordship was above stairs, when I came to the room door, his lordship met me, saying, you have called about the bond; I said I had; his lordship answered, he had burnt the bond, which surprized me a little; afterwards his lordship explained to me that he had given a bond for 500l. which he burnt when he came to age; before that explanation it was a mystery; I told his lordship, I did not understand that; I immediately introduced the bond in question to his lordship; Mr. Innis, the gentleman who has been examined, was present with his lordship; my Lord Chesterfield immediately disowned the bond.

Counsel for the Prisoner. This is, my Lord, what passed in conversation with Mr. Manly and other persons in the absence of Dr. Dodd, your lordship knows it it is not admissible evidence against the prisoner.

Court. Lord Chesterfield has been already examined as an evidence. They may ask the question of Lord Chesterfield, whether, when the bond was offered by Mr. Manly, he disowned it : this is in the course of the narrative ; I shall not sum this up to the jury ; but when they bring Dr. Dodd present it will be evidence.

Mr. Manly. After I left his lordship, I went into the city to Mr. Fletcher, and told him his lordship said it was not his bond, and consulted him what steps he would take about it ; Mr. Fletcher, myself, and Mr. Innis went to Guildhall to see if the Lord Mayor was there ; Lord Chesterfield said, he supposed Dr. Dodd was gone off, that is the reason I did not apply to him.

Court. That is not evidence most certainly.

Mr. Manly. We preferred an information respecting our suspicions and belief of this forgery, in order to get a warrant against the broker Robertson, and Dr. Dodd ; upon the information being taken, my Lord Mayor granted a warrant or warrants against them both ; before the warrant, I believe, was signed by his lordship, Robertson the broker came into Sir Charles Raymond's shop ; Mr. Fletcher came to me, when I was at the Lord Mayor's house, in Birchin-lane, which is almost next door to Mr. Fletcher's, to acquaint me that Mr. Fletcher desired I would go into the back-room to Mr. Robertson, to talk with him in the counting house.

Court. What passed between you and Mr. Robertson does not go to affect the prisoner at the bar.—Robertson was taken into custody ; when he was taken into custody, he, Mr. Innis, myself, and my Lord Mayor's two officers went to Dr. Dodd's house in Argyll-street ; Mr. Robertson and I and one of the Lord Mayor's men in one coach.

Court. Is Argyll-street in the city of London or the county of Middlesex ?—In the county of Middlesex ; we were admitted into the house, and Dr. Dodd soon after came down stairs to us ; when we were in the parlour together, Mr. Innis, myself, Dr. Dodd, and the officers, and Robertson, I then opened the occasion of our attending him ; I told him I was very sorry to attend him upon such an unhappy occasion, it was upon a charge of forgery against him, and Robertson was then in custody for forging Lord Chesterfield's bond ; the Doctor seemed very much struck, and was silent some time ; I told him the broker laid the whole charge to him ; and asked the Doctor what could induce him to do such an act ; the Doctor said, urgent necessity.

Court. Previous to the time when the Doctor said that urgent necessity induced him to act thus, had any promises been made to him of any favour respecting a prosecution ?—None at that time ; he said urgent necessity ; he was pressed to pay some tradesmen's bills ; that he meant no injury to Lord Chesterfield, or any one, as he meant to pay the money back in three months.

Court. You are referring to a memorandum, when did you take it ?—They are short minutes I made immediately afterwards ; he said he meant to return the money in three months time, and had certain resources to enable him to do it.

Court. At the time you had this conversation with the prisoner, did you shew him the bond that you apprehended to be a forged instrument ?—I think I did not ; the broker here interrupted him, and said, Doctor Dodd, I desire you will declare my innocence before all present, Doctor Dodd replied, I do, I do, I think those were his very words ; he very readily did it, without the least hesitation : I then said it was a very unhappy affair, and asked the Doctor, if he had the money to return.

Court. Had the money been advanced by Fletcher upon that security ?—The money had been paid upon the Tuesday, and I understood it had been paid, upon my brother or clerk's saying it was well executed ; when I asked him if he had the money to return, as that would be the only means of saving him, he answered he had ; I then desired him immediately to give it to me ; he desired to go up stairs to fetch it, but my Lord Mayor's officer refused to let him go ; upon which I desired leave of the officer to entrust him with me up stairs, accordingly we went up stairs ; Dr. Dodd immediately returned me six notes of 500*l.* each of Sir Charles Raymond and Co. these notes made 3000*l.* Dr. Dodd took these notes out of a pigeon-hole in the bureau, or some desk of that sort ; I asked him where the remainder was ? he then produced his banker's book, and to the best of my remembrance there appeared the sum of 900*l.* on the debtor's side of the banker's book ; I asked him what he could draw for, whether he had that money at the banker's ? he said he could not draw for all that, for he had had occasion to make use of part of the money, but he could draw for five or six hundred pounds ; accordingly he drew a draught addressed to the acting partner of the Banking Company in St. James's-street, in favour of Mr. Fletcher or bearer for 500*l.*

(that 500*l.* I received) immediately after Dr. Dodd had given me that draught, we came down stairs, Mr. Robertson the broker then gave me a draught for 100*l.* which he said he had received for half the commission.

Was that in the presence of Dr. Dodd?—Yes; that draught was given to Mr. Fletcher, and I understand it was paid; after I had received the 500*l.* draught of the Doctor, I went to the Crown and Rolls in Chancery-lane, and sent for Mr. Fletcher to come to me.

Where did you leave Dr. Dodd?—I left Dr. Dodd coming out of his own house with Mr. Robertson in custody with the officers; they were to go to some tavern or coffee-house in the neighbourhood till I returned; Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Corry, my Lord Chesterfield's solicitor, soon after called upon me there; we then went back to my Lord Chesterfield's, and there we learnt that Dr. Dodd was at the York Coffee-house in St. James's-street; we went there, and there we found Dr. Dodd and the officers and Robertson: we ordered a room up stairs, and when we were all up stairs together in presence of all the gentlemen, I asked Dr. Dodd if he could give any security for the remainder of the money; he immediately said he would give any security in his power, he was ready to make any restitution he could; I asked him if he would give a judgment upon his goods, he said he would, or any thing else; he was, in fact, desirous of doing it; he then executed a warrant of attorney to confess judgment as a security for the remaining 600*l.* and I believe that was attested by Mr. Corry and myself; after he had given this judgment he said, I think I can draw for 200*l.* more upon my banker; I said, if you can it will be much better; the Doctor instantly drew a draught for 200*l.* which reduced it to 400*l.* that draught of 200*l.* was paid the next morning, as I am informed, and have no doubt, there then remained 400*l.* and the judgment was the next day entered for the 400*l.* and execution taken out.

Court. I suppose there were goods enough to answer that?—There is a distress for rent and another execution, but I am told there is enough.

Did you afterwards, or when, go before the Lord Mayor?—The next day, Saturday; Lord Chesterfield called upon Mr. Fletcher at Sir Charles Raymond's house; I had a message to come there, and a message was sent to the Lord Mayor to know his lordship's pleasure when he would be attended upon that business; an answer came back that the prisoners were then before my Lord Mayor, which we did not know of; we then went before my Lord Mayor, and were sworn to give evidence.

Was Lord Chesterfield there?—Yes; my Lord Chesterfield, Mr. Fletcher, Mr. Innis, and myself; the Lord Mayor bound over Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Peach to prosecute, and the rest, as I understood it, only to give evidence, the recognizance was taken different.

Was the bond produced before my Lord Mayor?—It was.

Were there many witnesses examined before my Lord Mayor?—Mr. Fletcher, Mr. Peach, Mr. Innis, myself, and I believe my Lord Chesterfield.

Was the bond read?—I don't know; it was laid on the table: the information that was given was read to the prisoner. The Lord Mayor laid the bond before them and asked them many questions.

Cross Examination.

Do you know whether the examination before my Lord Mayor was reduced into writing?—I did not see that it was; Dr. Dodd, when called upon his defence, I did not take it down, but the substance of it was, that he was pressed to pay some tradesmen's bills; he meant no injury to any one, and meant to restore the money.

When the bond was produced, and Dr. Dodd charged with forging of it, he admitted the fact, did he?—He did.

What time of the day was it when you first went to Dr. Dodd's house?—I believe between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, I think near four.

When the Doctor was first charged with the crime, before any offer or act towards restitution was done upon the part of Dr. Dodd, it was I think that you said, that was the way to save him?—Returning the money would be the means I told him I thought of saving him.

I need not ask your import of these words, saving him from the consequences of any prosecution?—Yes; I so made use of these words.

Council for the Crown. You said this subsequent to Dr. Dodd's confession?—Yes.

Was any thing said before my Lord Mayor by Dr. Dodd about Robertson?—Dr. Dodd very readily admitted before my Lord Mayor that Robertson was innocent.

Mr. ALBERT INNIS sworn.

Did you go with Mr. Manly to Dr. Dodd's house in Argyll-street or Argyll-buildings?—I did.

When you got to Dr. Dodd's, and were in company with them, do you recollect collect what passed? what the Doctor said, and what Mr. Manly said?

(The witness refers to some minutes.)

Mr. Justice WILLES.—When did you make those minutes?—That evening after the conversation. I arrived in the second coach, when I knocked at the door, Mr. Manly told me in the passage, that Dr. Dodd had confessed every thing.

Counsel for the Crown. You must not relate what was said by any one, except it was spoken in the presence of Dr. Dodd—I was afterwards in the room with Mr. Manly and Dr. Dodd; Mr. Manly asked Dr. Dodd how he came to do such a thing.

What thing?—The forgery of the bond?

COURT. Had Mr. Manly the bond with him?—Yes.

Did Mr. Manly shew him the bond?—Yes.

COURT. Did he speak of forgery to him?—Yes he did; Dr. Dodd said it was urgent necessity, and that he was willing to make recompence as far as it was in his power. Mr. Manly asked him where the money was; Dr. Dodd said, he had 3000*l.* up stairs in his bureau in notes of Sir Charles Raymond's and Co. Those notes were made payable fourteen days after sight to Lord Chesterfield or order, and were signed by Henry Fletcher, one of the partners of the house; Mr. Manly then asked him what more money he had, he said he thought he could draw for 500*l.* more upon his banker, which he did immediately, and gave it to Mr. Manly; we afterwards went before my Lord Mayor.

When you was before the Lord Mayor the last time, was Dr. Dodd there?—Yes.

What did Dr. Dodd say then?—He said to this purpose; 'I cannot tell what to say in such a situation; I had no intention to defraud Lord Chesterfield.'

Are those the words the Doctor said?—As near as I can recollect they are; his words were 'I cannot tell what to say in such a situation: I had no intention to defraud Lord Chesterfield; I hope his Lordship will consider my case; I was pressed extremely for three or four hundred pounds to pay some tradesmen's bills; I meant it as a temporary resource; I should have repaid the money in half a year; I have made satisfaction, and I hope that will be considered; my Lord Chesterfield must have some tenderness towards me;—'

Was Lord Chesterfield then present?—His Lordship was.

—he knows I love him; he knows I 'regard his honour as dearly as my own; I hope he will, according to the mercy that is in his heart, shew clemency to me; there is nobody wishes to prosecute; pray, my Lord Mayor, consider that, and dismiss me; Mr. Robertson is certainly innocent.'

COURT. Are you sure that the paper you have in your hand is not the Morning Post, for I recollect they are the very words inserted in the Morning Post?—No.

I ask you, for form's sake, when Dr. Dodd said what you have given an account of, whether he was not then charged before the Lord Mayor with forging the bond?—He was.

Cross Examination.

Mr. Innis, if I understood you rightly, you did not go into Dr. Dodd's house, nor see Dr. Dodd till after there had been an interview between Dr. Dodd and Mr. Manly?—I was not there at first; I came in, I suppose, three or four minutes after Mr. Manly; we set out together in two hackney-coaches.

[The six drafts, of 500*l.* each, were produced in Court by Mr. Fletcher.]

Mr. FLETCHER sworn.

Are those the bills, Mr. Manly returned to you?—Yes. They are all signed by me.

Are these the bills that were given for the money raised by this bond?—They are, in part, what I gave to Mr. Peach on that account.

COURT. As the annuity of 700*l.* a year was to take place immediately, how came you to make these bills payable at 14 days sight?—It was the agreement with the Broker.

By that means you got the interest of 3000*l.* for 17 days; hereafter a question might arise against you upon that for usury. Those six notes that have been produced were the notes that you paid for the original purchase of the annuities?—Yes.

Mr. PEACH sworn.

Mr. MANSFIELD. You left that bond, I believe, at Mr. Manly's chambers?—Yes.

From whom did you receive it?—I received it from Lewis Robertson.

COURT. Mr. Fletcher, is it not usual in these kind of transactions to have an attorney of your own to see the instruments executed?—Most certainly.

You did this without an attorney?—I mentioned Mr. Manly's going to see the deed executed: Mr. Robertson said he could not: I agreed to that, upon condition that he brought a letter from my Lord Chesterfield that his Lordship had executed the bond, and desired the money to be paid to Mr. Robertson : he did bring me such a letter ; that letter was left at Mr. Manly's chambers with the others ; Mr Peach carried them (the letter was produced in Court, and identified).

To the Right Hon. the Earl of CHESTERFIELD. Is the name Chesterfield signed to that letter your lordship's writing ?—It is not.

Do you believe that letter to be the hand-writing of the prisoner ?—I don't know whose it is.

LEWIS ROBERTSON sworn.

When did you first see that bond ?—I left this bond with Dr. Dodd upon Monday the 3d of this month in the evening to be executed ; I carried it to Mr. Franco's in Fenchurch-street ; Dr. Dodd dined there on the Monday ; at the same time I carried a letter which Mr. Fletcher directed me to write ; I wrote it in my own hand ; it contained an order for me to receive the money.

Did that bond appear to be executed by my Lord Chesterfield at the time you carried it to Mr. Franco's ?—No ; it was a bond filled up, but not executed.

Look at the letter ; is that the letter ?—It is.

Did you receive again the same bond and letter from Dr. Dodd ?—Yes, at his own house in Argyll-buildings, on Tuesday the 4th.

Was the name of Dodd written to it before you came, or in your presence ?—He wrote William Dodd upon the bond in my presence.

I perceive that your name is to that bond ?—Yes.

At whose desire did you put your name to it ?—I asked Dr. Dodd if the bond had been regularly executed, when he presented it to me, I desired him to put his name as a witness to it.

When the bond was produced to you on Tuesday, was the name of Chesterfield subscribed to it ?—It was, and also to the receipt for the money.

For what purpose did you receive the bond of Dr. Dodd ?—To receive the sum of 4200l.

COURT. You did not subscribe your name to any other bond ?—Only to that bond and that receipt.

And it was given to you to subscribe by the Doctor ?—The Doctor did not ask me to subscribe it ; he put his own name to it ; then I said, Doctor, as you have seen this regularly executed I may put my name to it ? He said, yes.

Can you recollect whether there was that blot upon the word seven at the time you subscribed your name ?—I don't remember the blot.

Did you receive the money in consequence of it ?—I did, and carried it to Dr. Dodd.

COURT. Have you had other transactions of this nature, in negotiating the sale or loan of annuities besides this ?—Yes ; I have done business of this kind.

Is it your practice, in transacting that business, to subscribe your name as a witness to the execution of an instrument which you have not seen executed ?—No ; it is not always the case, but I have done it.

Then you deceive the persons who place confidence in you ; did you ever do it in any other instance ?—Yes : I have.

COURT. You have experienced that it is a very dangerous thing. Look at those six notes ; are they part of the 4200l. you received of Mr. Fletcher ?—These are the notes ; they are at 14 days sight.

Are they accepted ?—No.

COURT. Two of them I see are indorsed, Chesterfield ; my Lord Chesterfield will inspect them, and say whether they are indorsed by his lordship.

Lord CHESTERFIELD. They are not.

COURT. Dr. Dodd, this is the time for you to make your defence to what the witnesses have said in support of the charge against you ; it is not the province of the counsel to open the case of a criminal in your situation, but you may contradict any thing that has been given in evidence against you ; and afterwards by counsel may examine any witness in support of the case you have to state to the Court ; I shall with great patience hear your witnesses ; and also hear any thing you have to urge in your defence.

PRISONER'S DEFENCE.

My lords and gentlemen of the jury. Upon the evidence which has been this day produced against me, I find it very difficult for me to address your lordships ; there is no man in the world, who has a deeper sense of the heinous nature of the crime for which I stand indicted than myself ; I view it, my lords, in all its extent of malignancy towards a commercial state like ours ; but, my lords, I humbly apprehend, though no lawyer, that the moral turpitude and malignity of the crime always, both in the eye of law, of reason, and of religion, consists in the intention. I am informed, my lords, that the act of parliament on this head runs perpetually in this stile, with an intention to defraud. Such an intention, my lords, and gentlemen of the jury, I believe, has not hair of their beards, and other parts of their bodies, is pulled up, from time to time, with tweezers, whenever any appears, except that on their eye-brows and eye-lids, at least, such was their practice, when the Spaniards first settled among them.

The Peruvians exceed most nations in the world in quickness of wit, and strength of judgment. Such of them as have had the advantage of masters, since the arrival of the Spaniards, have generally made an extraordinary proficiency. When the Spaniards first appeared among them, they acknowledged one almighty Being, maker of heaven and earth, whom they called Pacha-Camac.

As to the Creolians here, though almost utter strangers to true religion, they are said to be superstitious even to a higher degree, than the Spaniards of Europe. They are very careful to say their rosary often every day, and to provide a religious habit, to die and be buried in; being persuaded, that when clad in a livery so much respected here below, they shall, without any difficulty, be admitted into heaven. They scarce know what it is to pray to God, but address themselves only to the Virgin and the saints.

The most beggarly and meanest of the Europeans become gentlemen, as soon as they find themselves transported among the Indians, blacks, mulattoes, mestizoes, &c. Any good or generous actions performed by them are the effects of their vanity and imaginary nobility.

The Creolians are said to bear a great antipathy to the native Spaniards, of which one reason is supposed to be, because they see those strangers in possession of the prime places of the state. In their outward behaviour they affect great gravity, like European Spaniards, to whom they are not inferior in wit and genius, acuteness, and understanding, but less active and hardy.

Effeminacy and sloth seem to be peculiar to the country, because it is too good; for it is observed, that those who have been bred to labour in Spain, grow idle here in a short time, like the Creolians. They are sober as to wine, but eat a great deal, and after an indecent manner, sometimes all out of the same dish, and without forks.

In matters of love, the Creolians yield to no nation, freely sacrificing to that passion, most of what they have; and though covetous upon all other occasions, they are generous beyond measure to women. There is nothing scandalous here in concubinage; nay, it is a sort of disgrace not to keep a mistress. It is even frequent enough to see married men forsake their wives, to adhere to mulattoes and blacks. Bastards are as much regarded as the lawfully begotten, provided they are owned by the father; and there is no disgrace inherent to that birth.

The clergy, especially the inferior sort, and the friars, if not much belied, exceed the laity in libertinism almost as much as they do in wealth, pride, and laziness. The Jesuits are said to have been richer here than in Mexico, in which their confiscated estates and effects were computed to amount to the immense value of seventy seven millions of piasters, or three hundred and eighty-five millions of French livres.

The Creolian women, though not shut up, as they are in Spain, yet seldom go abroad by day; but at night, it is said, they go a courting, and those who are modest by day, are then the boldest, their faces being covered with their veils. They are, for the most part, sprightly enough, and their complexion good, but not lasting. Those proposals, which a lover would not dare to make in another country, without the indignation of a modest woman, are so far from scandalizing here, that they are reckoned essential to gallantry: instead of taking offence at them, as indicating an ill opinion of their virtue, they return thanks, as for an honour done to them.

Before the appointment of a viceroy at Santa Fé in New Granada, Peru contained the three audiences of Lima, or Los Reyes, Los Charcas, or La Plata, and Quito, but now only the two former, and not even the whole of these; for, according to Don Ulloa, the audience of Los Charcas comprehends Tucuman and Paraguay.

The audience of Lima, or Los Reyes, is bounded on the north by Quito; on the east, by the Cordilleras mountains; on the south, by the audience of Los Charcas; and, on the west, by the Pacific Ocean, being about seven hundred and seventy miles in length, from south to north, but of unequal breadth. The climate and soil are said to vary greatly in this audience, especially the former, and that in the compass of a few miles, in which all the vicissitudes of weather are sometimes experienced in twenty-four hours.

Lima, the capital not only of this audience but of all Peru, is situated in a spacious and delightful valley, not far from the sea, in the latitude of $12^{\circ} 2' 31''$ south. A river of the same name washes the walls, over which there is, or was, a handsome stone bridge; for in the year 1746, on the 28th of October, a dreadful shock of an earthquake almost entirely destroyed this city in the space of three minutes, burying in the ruins those inhabitants, who, endeavouring to save their most precious moveables, had not made sufficient haste into the streets and squares. At the same time, the sea receding to a considerable distance, returned with such violence, that Callao, which was the port of Lima, and all the neighbouring country, were laid under water; men, women and houses being swept away with the torrent; nineteen vessels out of twenty-three were sunk, and the frigate, called St. Firmin, was carried by the force of the waves to a great distance up the country. For the space of four months the concussions continued, with short intervals, and many of them were as violent as the first; so that before the twenty-fourth of the following year, no less than four hundred and fifty souls had been felt, some of them no less dreadful than the first. Above twelve thousand lives perished in the ruins of their own effects and property. It is probable it hath now, in a great measure, recovered its former splendor. However, it is still the capital and great emporium of Peru, and the residence of the viceroy, whose government is triennial; though at the expiration of that term, the sovereign may renew his commission. He enjoys all the pomp and prerogatives of royalty. All officers are appointed, and places filled up by him. For the security of his person, he has two corps of guards, one of horse, and the other of halberdiers. The horse guards consist of one hundred and sixty, under the command of a captain and lieutenant: their uniforms are blue, laced with silver. The halberdiers, in number fifty, are clad in crimson-velvet waistcoats, deeply laced with gold, and do duty in rooms leading to the royal audience chamber. Besides these, there is another guard within the palace, of a hundred men, being a detachment from the garrison of Callao. All are occasionally employed in executing the orders of the viceroy, and enforcing the decrees of the tribunals, after they have received the royal assent; for such the concurrence of the viceroy is esteemed, who, besides assisting at the courts of justice, and councils, gives daily audience to all degrees of persons. The supreme tribunal at Lima, called audiencia, is held in the viceroy's palace, and consists of eight auditors, and a fiscal, for civil affairs. Here is also a chamber of accounts, a board of treasury, a court for the effects of persons dying intestate, and without lawful heirs, a council of commerce, and a tribunal of the inquisition, many convents, chapels and hospitals, with an university, in which are professors of the several sciences, and three subordinate colleges. The inhabitants of this city, as of all the others in Spanish America, consist of Spaniards, Mestizos, Mulattoes, Indians, and Negroes. If Lima was not subject to earthquakes, it would be one of the most desirable places of abode in the world, but, unhappily, the interval between these is never of a length sufficient to obliterate the remembrance of them: however, though frequent and sudden, they never fail to give a short warning of their approach by a rumbling noise in the bowels of the earth, which is instantly followed by dismal howlings of the dogs. The beasts of burthen too, which happen to be passing the streets, stop, and by a natural instinct throw open their legs, the better to secure themselves from falling. Lima is not only the capital of Peru and the seat of the government, but the centre of all the trade carried on throughout South-America, distributing through the provinces the various products and manufactures, both of Asia and Europe, and receiving in return the superfluities of each, to be sent either to Europe, or to other cities and towns on the continent: in particular, all the wealth of the southern provinces, being brought to Lima, is embarked on board the fleet, which sails from Callao to Panama, about the time that the galleons arrive from Europe. The proprietors of the treasure transmit it to the merchants of Lima, who traffic at the fair with this and their own stock. The same fleet, in returning, touches at Paita, where the European merchandizes of value, purchased at Porto-Bello fair, are landed, in order to avoid the delay and danger of sailing to Callao, and sent on droves of mules to Lima; but those of less value are carried thither by sea.

Callao, the port of Lima, lies six miles west of it. The Spaniards have no harbour to compare with this in the South-Sea, for beauty, convenience, and security; the largest vessels may lie with perfect safety in the road of Callao, the water being extremely deep, and the port screened from the winds by the island of St. Laurence, which also breaks the surges rolling from the south-west. Before the last earthquake, neither the garrison nor fortifications were considerable; and the inhabitants did not exceed four or five hundred. We may judge of the importance of this harbour, from what we have said of the commerce of Lima. Two fleets annually sail from hence; one for Arica, near Potosi, about the end of February, which having received the silver on board, returns in the month of March; the other for Panama, in the beginning of May, with all the treasures and merchandize of Potosi, tofi, Chili, and Peru: those of Chili are brought by the Valparaíso fleet. Besides these fleets, two ships sail annually for Acapulco, freighted with gold and silver; and the commodities they bring back are lodged in magazines here, and retailed to all the southern provinces of America.

The other places of any note in this audience are, Cusco, Ariquebá, Guamanaga, Truxillo, Guanchaco, and Sangallo.

Cusco, the capital of the empire of Peru before the arrival of the Spaniards, and the seat of the Incas, stands above three hundred and twenty-six miles from Lima towards the east. It is still a considerable town, containing about fifteen or sixteen thousand Spaniards, Creolians, and Indians. The air is said to be very pure and wholesome, and the neighbouring country very pleasant and fruitful. Here are some manufactures of bays and cotton cloth, and leather; and in the adjacent mountains are gold and silver mines.

Arequiba stands about one hundred leagues to the south of Lima, in the valley of Quiloa, on a fine river, by which it has a communication with the sea, distant about twenty leagues. It is one of the most beautiful and pleasant towns in all Peru, and enjoys a good air; but is very subject to earthquakes. A part of the silver of Potosí and Los Chircas is brought hither to be sent to Callao.

Guamanga is a pretty large town, one hundred and eighty miles from Lima towards the east. Here is the see of a bishop, and an university, with professors of divinity, philosophy, and law. The trade of this town consists chiefly in gilt leather, a species of pavilions for beds, confectionary pastes, marmalades, jellies, preserved quinces, and other articles of luxury. The air is said to be very fine and serene.

Truxillo is one of the principal cities of Peru, standing two hundred and fifty miles from Lima to the north west, and about half a league from the sea, in a sandy soil. The houses are all low, on account of the frequent earthquakes, with which all the sea coast is visited. The inhabitants carry on a prodigious trade in wine, brandy, sugar, flax, and marmalade. Guanchaco is a small port, two leagues from Truxillo, but neither safe nor commodious.

Sangallo is another sea port, about twenty-six leagues to the southward of Lima, which carries on some trade.

The audience of Los Chircas, or La Plata, is equal in the extent of its jurisdiction to that of Lima; but many parts of it are over-run with forests and vast deserts. It is bounded by the audience of Lima on the north; by Paraguay on the east; by Chili and Tucuman on the south; and by the Pacific Ocean on the west, extending from 25 to 17°. 10 south latitude, that is five hundred and seventy miles in a strait line; but taking in the windings of the coast, above six hundred miles; and from east to west, where broadest, about four hundred miles.

The climate is various, the coasts being insufferably hot, while the inland parts are rather upon the other extreme.

The soil is, generally speaking, fruitful, especially in vallies among the mountains, in the inland parts, most of which are well watered. The principal commodities of the country are silver, gold, pimento, commonly called Jamaica Pepper, which produces to the inhabitants a neat return of six hundred thousand pieces of eight annually. Throughout the whole extent of the audience are exceeding rich mines, some near the coast, and others in the inland parts.

The principal towns in this audience are La Plata, Potosí, La Paz, Atocoma, Arica, Ylo, and Santa Cruz de la Sierra.

Counsel for the Crown.

Mr. Serjeant Davy,	Mr. Buller,
Mr. Mansfield	Mr. Fielding.
Mr. Miffing,

Mr. Fielding.

MAY it please your Lordship, and gentlemen of the Jury, this is an indictment against the prisoner at the bar for a crime of so atrocious and uncommon a nature, as to render it impossible to affix any epithet to the crime descriptive of its enormity. This is, gentlemen, the first instance of its existence, and I hope in God it will be the last. The indictment, you have perceived, already turns upon three counts: The prisoner at the bar is first charged for setting fire to a quantity of hemp and ropes particularly specified; the second count is for setting fire to a certain building erected in the Dock-yard, called the Rope-house; the third count is for firing his Majesty's naval stores. Gentlemen, the matter will be more fully opened to you by the learned and experienced gentleman who leads this business, and I doubt not but your verdict will be satisfactory to your country.

Mr. Serjeant Davy.

May it please your Lordship and gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this case for the King in the prosecution of the prisoner at the bar, who is described by the name of James Hill, otherwise James Hinde, otherwise James Aetzen, for setting fire to the Rope-house at Portsmouth Dock, belonging to the Crown, the place where cordage is made to supply the king's navy, and which crime is constituted a capital felony by an Act of Parliament made in the 12th year of his present Majesty, till when it had not entered the imagination of man that such a crime could be committed at all. It will be unnecessary for me to expatiate upon the nature of the offence; that has nothing to do with the prisoner.

soner at the bar, any more than as he was an agent in the commission of it; and it will be necessary for me, therefore, to mention to you only those particulars that we have to lay before you in evidence, by which to affix the crime upon the prisoner, and to submit to you, upon the consideration of those facts, whether he is or is not guilty of the charge in the indictment.

Upon the 7th of December in the afternoon (I believe about 4 o'clock) a dreadful fire broke out in the Rope-house at Portsmouth Dock, which I think was intirely consumed; it is an edifice of very great extent and magnitude indeed (perhaps you have seen it) and is consequently of great value, and it is exceeding lucky for the public that it did not happen at that time to contain so much cordage as at some times it had; that was not the only thing intended to be consumed that day, but fortunately that alone was consumed.—Gentlemen, it is necessary to mention to you that the fire broke out at the easternmost part of the building; as soon as this misfortune had happened, all imaginable enquiry was made, in order to find out the cause of it, but all to no purpose, no fire or candle had been there, none ever used there, particularly in the eastward part of the building; nobody could tell by what means it happened, and all enquiry was fruitless, and it would have passed as an accident, the causes of it unknown to this day, had it not been for a very extraordinary discovery, which was made upon the 15th of January, five or six weeks afterwards, which led to an enquiry, and which enquiry produced the most ample and clear discovery that ever was laid before a Court of Justice.

Upon the 15th of January, in the Hemp-house, which is another very large building, and which contains hemp of an infinite value, belonging to the Crown, there was discovered by Mr. Russell, and two others, in turning over some of the hemp for some purpose, something which shone a little and appeared bright; it appeared upon taking it up, that it was a sort of canister, which one at first sight imagined to be a tea canister; it was a machine which nobody could tell what to make of; upon looking a little further on the same spot, there was found a sort of box, containing combustibles of various kinds; there was oil of turpentine, there was hemp, there was tar; the moment that was seen, it struck them; and there could be no doubt in any mind upon that subject, that whoever placed that machine there, had an intention to set the place on fire; it was alarming, the men were struck with astonishment and wonder, looking at each other and at the instrument in their hands, and upon recollection determined to do the only thing fit to be done, to go to the Commissioner of the Dock and inform him of it, that the proper evidence of this matter might be laid before Government, and fit enquiry made into it; then it was, for the first time, clear and apparent to every one, that the fire, which had happened on the 7th of December in the Rope house, had not been by accident, but design. Now, Gentlemen, let us endeavour to recollect every circumstance of that unhappy day—while it was thought to have been accident, nobody gave themselves the trouble to enquire or to recollect who they had seen, who was there, or who was not there; but from the instant that they resolved that this must have been the work of some devil, or that this was some human contrivance, that this was an act done on purpose, then it was fit to advert back to the subject, and to turn in their minds all the circumstances of that day; among others it occurred (for it was the talk of all the thousands in the Dock in five minutes, I suppose) that a man had been seen upon the day of the fire, lurking very much about the Hemp-house and about the Rope-house; then it occurred, that a man had been locked into the Rope-house, and with some difficulty had got out again; then it occurred, that the person upon whom suspicion then fell, from several vague indefinite circumstances, was one whose surname was not known, but who was called John, and who was by business a painter, who had worked for a Mr. Goulding, a painter at Titchfield, at a gentleman's house in the neighbourhood, and that was the origin of the name given to him of John the Painter.

John the painter then being the man upon whom suspicions strongly fell from several circumstances, none of which concluded directly and positively against him, but all of which led to extreme strong suspicions; and the circumstances that caused these suspicions, were put together in the form of an information, and laid before a magistrate, in order, if possible, to have this John the Painter apprehended and further enquiry to be made. Upon this, there was an advertisement published in the papers, with a reward of 50*l*. for the apprehending John the Painter, describing him as well as they were able, and his person and his dress were very sufficiently described by the people who had seen him before.

A very worthy honourable Gentleman, whom I have in my eye, and who is a very great friend to the public, and in the strict and true sense of the word, a patriot, having seen this advertisement, very actively stirred himself in the business, and was very much the cause of the apprehending of this John the Painter. John the painter was accordingly taken up, I believe, in this county, at Odiham; and you will be pleased to remark, that there were then found upon him, a loaded pistol, a pistol tinder box, some matches, and a bottle of oil of turpentine; he was examined, but he had too much sense, he was too much guarded to make any considerable discovery upon the examination that he underwent before a magistrate, and had it not been for a circumstance, which I am now going to mention to you, it would be an extreme difficult matter to affix the crime upon this person at the bar, however satisfied one might have been in one's own private judgment of his guilt.

It happened that there was one of the same business, a painter, who had been as the prisoner likewise had, a painter in America; for this gentleman (the prisoner) has worked in America; he is an American, not by birth, for by birth he is a Scotchman, but he is an American, there he was settled, from thence he had lately come, and thither he meant to return. One of that business, and who likewise had worked as a painter in America, it was imagined might possibly know this John the painter, and therefore he was sent for to Sir John Fielding's in Bowstreet, upon the 7th of February, in order to be shewn the prisoner, and to inform the magistrate whether he did or did not know him; that man being asked the question answered, that he did not know him, and to the best of his recollection had never seen him in all his life-time; there was an end, therefore, of that business; as that man had worked in the same place, for I think the prisoner had worked at Philadelphia too, it was very likely that he might have known him, but he happened not to know him at all; that person being dismissed from the room, where this examination, though I can hardly call it an examination, where this little matter had passed, and retiring to the other room where the prisoner was, the prisoner having been informed that this person, whose name is Baldwin, was an American and a painter, naturally enough beckoned to him and desired him to sit down by him. Baldwin sitting down by him, a conversation began between these people, touching their trade, and touching America, and Philadelphia, that part of America in which they had lived, the distance of the place, a few names, and some general conversation; the place and occasion would not admit of a long conversation. The prisoner at the bar desired Baldwin to do him the favour of a visit at New Prison, Clerkenwell, where he was going, desired he would be so good as to call upon him, he should be glad to see him. Now, Gentlemen, here let me tell you, for fear I should forget it, that all this was the mere fruit and offspring of accident; this Baldwin was not set upon him, was not desired to obtain any confession from him, nor desired to make any acquaintance with him; but an intimacy passed between these people for several days afterwards, before any body concerned for the prosecution knew any thing of it. It is fit the world should know that. In consequence of this short conversation that passed at Sir John Fielding's, Baldwin went, as desired by the prisoner, to visit him at Clerkenwell, New Prison; when he was there, a conversation passed between them of no very great importance, it was only general, concerning persons and places, some of which both of them knew, some of which only one of them knew. The next day, Baldwin paid him another visit, for the prisoner liked his company, and it was a very lucky circumstance; it was indeed the providence of God that this man placed that fortunate (for fortunate I may call it for the public) confidence in this Baldwin, by which he made the ample discoveries that you will hear by and by. The prisoner told him after various visits, for he visited the prisoner at his own request almost every day for, I believe, near three weeks from that time, and it was not for many days, not until a full discovery was made, that Baldwin communicated the matter to any body, and when he did, he communicated it to an Honourable Person not at all connected with Government; he told him, among other things (I will descend to the particulars by and by, for a very striking reason which you will go with me in observing, when I descend to them) he told him that he had lately come from France, that he had been employed there by a gentleman, whom he was surprised that Baldwin did not know, as he was a man of so much note, and whose name had been so frequently in the news-papers, which was a Mr. Silas Deane; that Mr. Silas Deane was a very honourable gentleman, employed by the Congress in America, as well as another very honourable gentleman, a Dr. Franklin; that Mr. Silas Deane had employed him in the noble business in which he had been engaged; that his employment was to set fire to the several veral Dock-Yards, to destroy the navy of Great Britain; that he had undertaken that work, and that he was to have a pecuniary reward for it; that Mr. Silas Deane was his employer; that this was a noble act, this was a patriotic measure, this was what all patriots would exceedingly applaud, this was the right way to expose Government, this was the way to render Great Britain for ever subject, by bending its neck to the yoke of America, this was the way by which we were to prosper; this great work was to be effected by his hand under the employment of Silas Deane, and that he did not at all doubt but that Dr. Franklin was likewise engaged in the same good work; he told him, he had taken Canterbury in the way from Dover; and now I am going to descend to some particulars, which I shall by and by have an occasion to repeat, in order to shew you it is impossible (I will not change the word) that it is impossible but that Baldwin's account should be perfectly true; he told him, that in his return from Paris to England, he had landed at Dover, and so came through Canterbury; and at Canterbury he had engaged a man to make a tin machine, which you will see by and by, somewhat resembling a tin canister, the purpose of which was, to act the part, if I may so say, of a lantern; that is, that a candle might be enclosed in it, and yet the candle perfectly be hid, so that no eye should see the light; that the man he employed to make this tin canister for him, was an awkward fellow, and set about it in a way that convinced him he was dull, and did not comprehend his meaning; but that his servant, a lad, had a much brighter genius than his master, and very well understood his directions; that he set about the work, and he made a canister for him. Gentlemen, you will remember these particulars; he told him, that he had ordered two more at another shop, but had not time to stay for them; and so left them behind him, but this canister he took with him; he told him that when he came to Portsmouth, he took a lodging; I had forgot the wooden box; he told him that he likewise got made for him a wooden box, I told you that the use of the canister was to contain a candle hiding it; the use of the box was to contain the combustibles which were to be lighted by the match, in order to set the place on fire; the preparation and the ingredients of this you will have an account of. He told him he had taken a lodging at Portsmouth, at a Mrs. Boxell's, where he had made some preparations for the work of setting the place on fire; I should have told you in the conversation with regard to Canterbury, he told Baldwin likewise of a quarrel which he had had there with a dragoon, which had led to a fight of this canister under the flap of his coat; he said at Mrs. Boxell's he had made preparations in order to set the store-houses on fire; and he told him there the manner of making this composition; that it was by grinding charcoal with water very fine upon a colour-stone, such as painters use in grinding their paint, not with a pestle and mortar; that it was ground to an exceeding fine powder; that it was then to be mixed with gunpowder: he then mentioned to him how it was to be diluted with water, and what proportions of the powder and the charcoal and to what consistency it was to be mixed; and so this ended with the particulars of how this composition was made: the prisoner told him that in the afternoon of the 6th, the day before the fire, being in the Rope-house, he got a parcel of hemp and strewed the hemp about where he intended the match to be; that he laid a bottle of turpentine on its side, with hemp placed in the neck of the bottle instead of a cork; that he laid the match upon a piece of paper in which was some gunpowder, and over the gunpowder some hempstrewed very light; he told him that as soon as the match reached the gunpowder, it would fire the hemp, and he mentioned also his throwing a quart of turpentine about the hemp; all these particulars he told this man of the manner of setting it on fire; I should have told you that he said this Mrs. Boxell was impertinent, and turned him out of his lodgings; he told him a circumstance of his being shut in at the Rope-house, that he was so long in the place about this work that the time of shutting it up had arrived, and when he attempted to go out at the door at which he got in, he could not get out; that after having walked up and down without his shoes to avoid being heard, and endeavouring to get out quietly, finding all that impracticable, that he knocked, and cried out halloo; upon which a person came to the door and asked who is there? that the person directed him to go straight forward, and possibly he would find a door open; however, he did happen to get out: he mentioned also the circumstance of his calling to a person on the outside, under apprehensions of his being shut in; he likewise told his acquaintance Mr. Baldwin, that he had been before on the same day in the Hemp-house; it was the Rope-house you observe that was set on fire; that in the Hemp-house he had had the tin canister which he had made: you will be pleased to observe he did not effect the fire in the Rope-house by means of the tin canister; I have told you already how he effected that, but the tin canister he got made at Canterbury was laid in the Hemp-house, which was not set on fire, for by the providence of God, the matches which had been lighted had luckily gone out; that there he had likewise laid a square box, in which square box there was room to put a candle; that he had put into the box, tar and turpentine, and hemp and other combustibles; these things he said he placed in the Hemp-house; that making all this preparation, and doing all this in the Hemp-house, had taken up a great deal of time; that he was so much heated, though in the month of December, that he had pulled off his coat which he could not find for some time; that when he found it, there was a good deal of hemp sticking to it, which he picked off as well as he could; he said the next day he went into the Hemp-house, in order to set it on fire; the candle was placed in the wooden box, and within this tin machine; and he mentioned to him this circumstance likewise, that he had bought some matches for the purpose of lighting it of a woman at Portsmouth, which he supposed were damp, because he could not make them catch fire, in order to light the candle; so you see the saving of the Hemp-house from destruction that day, was, because the matches were not so well made, or being well made, had been so long made that the wood was not dry enough, and would not catch fire, so as to enable him to light the candle; for if the candle had been lighted, the Hemp-house must infallibly have been burnt; then, he says, that not being able to set that on fire, he got some matches of a better sort, and then returned to the Rope-house; that there he placed himself in such a way, as that nobody could see it; when he struck a light, that he lighted the match, and every thing being prepared he went away, leaving that to be burnt, very much vexed that he was not able to set the Hemp-house also on fire; that he set out as fast as he could from Portsmouth; that just after his leaving the town he overtook a woman in a cart; that he got her leave to get into her cart, for the sake of expediting his journey; that he gave her 6d. in order to make haste with him; that he then hastened to London as fast as he could. Another circumstance, likewise, he mentioned; that, besides the lodging, which he took of Mrs. Boxell, he took another of a woman on Portsmouth Common; the pious man mentioned something to be done to the poor woman of whom he took the lodgings; they had a very fortunate escape too, for his intention was to set those lodgings on fire, in order to engage the engines, that they might not assist to extinguish the fire in the Dock-yard; but by good luck that did not succeed neither: burning a house was nothing to him; he told Baldwin a circumstance of his leaving a bundle at the lodging on the Common; he said, that he had come away from Portsmouth in so great a hurry, that he had not time to go there for it, and that bundle, he said, contained three books, the titles of which he mentioned; there was an English translation of Justin, another of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and there was a Treatise of the Art of War and of making Fire Works, or something of that sort, and likewise a pair of breeches, a pair of buckles, and a French passport; all these things, he said, were in his bundle, which he had left with the woman, at his lodgings at Portsmouth Common; now all these particulars he told to Baldwin. I mentioned to you just now, Gentlemen, that it would come out in the course of this cause, that it was impossible for Baldwin to have invented this story; but that it must be, that the prisoner had told it to Baldwin: now I will tell you why I said so; Baldwin having made a discovery of these conversations, that he had held with this man, to the effect I have mentioned, then it was that an enquiry was made into these particulars; for that led to all the discoveries, of which you shall now have an account, and which will be proved to you in evidence. In the first place, I will mention to you, not in the order of time in which the discoveries came out, but in the order of time in which I have mentioned the transactions themselves to have happened: having told the story to this Baldwin of what had passed at Canterbury and the other places, messengers were sent to all these places to find out the people referred to, and to see whether these several accounts were true or no; upon enquiry, they found out the persons who made these tin canisters, not only the persons that made the tin canisters by his directions, which he had left upon their hands, not having time to stay for them; but we found out the very person who made the tin canister that was left in the Hemp-house, in order to set it on fire; you will see the very boy who made this, and he confirms exactly the account as related by Baldwin; that his master having first been employed to do this work, and not rightly understanding the instructions he received, that the boy understanding them, made the canister, and the boy will swear, that the very canister now to be produced at your bar, and which was found in the Hemp-house, he made for the prisoner. The story of his quarrel with a dragoon at Canterbury, will be confirmed by the dragoon who quarrelled with him; the stripping off, or taking up the lappet of his coat, and the seeing the canister under it at that time. The making of the wooden box will be proved; the witness swearing to the identity of the person, by whose order it was made. Mrs. Boxell will be produced to you; she will tell you, that this very prisoner at the bar, came to her house to take a lodging, the day, I think, before the fire happened; that, afterwards, observing a strange sulphureous smell in the lodging, she went about, inside and outside of the house, and could not guess from whence it came; that the next morning, there was the like smell; she then traced it to the very room that the prisoner had taken to lodge in; she found him at work, in preparing combustibles, and there was a stench of gunpowder, or nitre, or whatever it was, which I mentioned to you just now from the account he gave to Baldwin, how he had prepared this; we will produce to you the person, upon whose colour-stone the prisoner ground the very charcoal, and who saw the prisoner grinding the charcoal. Gentlemen, we will prove the circumstance, I mentioned to you, of the Rope-house being shut, and the prisoner being shut in; we will prove by the recollection of the people in the Rope-yard, that there was a man exactly in the circumstances that he describes himself to Baldwin to have been in, making a noise; asking the witness how he could get out, and his giving him the best directions he could, leaving him there speaking to the watchman, the watchman saying, he must stay there all night, the hour of call being over; but perfectly recollecting the circumstances in the way, in which he himself described them. Gentlemen, we will likewise produce, it is marvellous that we are able to do it; but it is owing to the great vigilance and care of the noble person who was at the head of this enquiry, and who has spared no pains, in order to investigate every circumstance as far as possible; though one should not have supposed, that any human enquiry could have reached such circumstances as these; but we will produce to you the very woman that he bought the matches of; she saw him yesterday, and she will tell you, that that man at the bar, and she noted him particularly, because he was not such sort of a man as usually come upon these errands; he came to her shop the day before the fire to buy a bundle of matches; that he asked her whether they would light quick, rejecting one bundle and choosing another; she remembers his taking out a handful of silver, and having but one half-penny, she remembers that particularity; the man being dressed so particular, and unlike persons that call upon such errands, struck her observation, and she will swear to the identity of the person. There is yet, behind, one more circumstance, that places it beyond the possibility of suspicion; the bundle that I told you of, could not be found; for Mrs. Boxell, where he actually did lodge, nor any body there, could hear of any other lodging that he had taken; she remembered that she had seen such a bundle, that the prisoner had with him the first day; but what was become of the bundle, and where he had left it, or whether he took it away with him, God Almighty knew! nobody could give any account. At last, after great search and enquiry, the bundle was found in the possession of another woman, whose lodgings he had taken, and who had no suspicion about what the man was; she wondered that he had not returned, and kept the bundle unopened, expecting him to call every day for it. Upon opening the bundle, there were the very things he had described; an English juitin, Ovid's Metamorphoses, a Treatise on the Art of War and of making fire works, and there was this person's passport from the French government; all these things were found just exactly as he had described them to Mr. Baldwin; and you will have likewise an account, that in that bundle are a pair of buckles, belonging to the prisoner, whom a witness will be produced to you to prove that he has seen, as far as he can remember, that pair of buckles in the shoes of the prisoner. Gentlemen, there is yet one more circumstance; you will have the woman that took him up in her cart, and she will swear to the very man, to the bringing him two miles in her cart, and while they were just at parting the blaze of the fire at the Rope-house burst out. Now, when you have all these circumstances proved to you in evidence, will not you say that I was well warranted in insisting that it was impossible for Mr. Baldwin to have invented this story? for these discoveries were made in consequence of Baldwin's relation; not that Baldwin's relation was after the discoveries, for it was the relation of Baldwin from the mouth of the prisoner that led to a discovery of all the particulars which I have now mentioned to you; the tenth part of these circumstances, which I have opened, would serve, I should think, to decide the fate of any man standing in the prisoner's situation; but it is the wish of the public, it is the wish of Government, that all the world should know the infamy of this transaction, and that they should know to whom they are indebted for the sorrows they have felt, and how much they owe to the providence of God, that America has not been able totally to destroy this country, and to make it bow its neck, not only to the yoke of America, but to the most petty sovereign in Europe; for let the English navy be destroyed, and here was a hand ready to effect it; let but the English navy be destroyed, and there is an end of all we hold dear and valuable; the importance of the subject, the magnitude, the extraordinary nature of the thing calls for a more particular investigation, than any other subject of what kind soever could demand; and therefore I need, I hope, make no apology for having descended so particularly into these minute, if any of them can be called minute, particulars of this story; we shall prove all these circumstances to the full, and surely there can be no doubt what shall be done with the man. I shall be glad to hear what he has to say for himself, and I shall be glad if he is able to lay this guilt at any body's door besides those to whom he has laid it. I wish Mr. Silas Deane were here, a time may come, perhaps, when he and Dr. Franklin may be here.

Prisoner. He is the honestest man in the world.

Q. You are, I believe, employed in Portsmouth-Dock?

Russell. I am.

Q. In what capacity?

Russell. I am clerk to the clerk of the Rope-Yard.

Q. Do you remember the day when the Rope-House was set on fire?

Russell. Yes, it was on Saturday the 7th day of December; the fire was first perceived at half after four in the afternoon.

Q. Was the Rope-House consumed by that fire?

Russell. Yes, entirely.

Q. What was in the Rope-House that was burnt?

Russell. Some hemp-toppings which were in the middle loft of the Hemp-House.

Q. Was there any thing else that was burnt?

Russell. Some cordage on the ground floor.

Q. Is it the place where cordage and hemp usually are kept?

Russell. Yes.

Q. And there were some there at that time which was burnt?

Russell. There was.

Q. Did you at any time find any thing particular in the Hemp-House at Portsmouth?

Russell. Yes, on the 15th of January I found a tin case in the Hemp-House. [The witness is shown a tin case or canister.] This appears to be the tin case that I took up in the Hemp-House; there is a piece of wood hollowed out, which is inside it, and a thin piece of wood nailed at the top of it; there are matches, and tar, and oil, and other combustibles. I have no doubt but this is the tin case; this box goes into it; they were separate when I found them.

Q. What did you find else besides these two things?

Russell. A bottle, which appeared by the smell to have held spirits of turpentine, or something of that quality; and there were some common wooden matches, such as are generally sold at chandler's shops, which I found lying in the Hemp-House just by this tin canister.

Q. Whereabout in the Hemp-House?

Russell. In the centre of the mow of hemp there were some bundles of refused hemp. There is certain hemp which is refused, which is not according to the contract, which is put by and is returned to the merchant; this was behind those bundles of hemp which were then in the very centre of the mow behind several other bundles.

Q. Were these things easy to be discovered, or were they concealed?

Russell. They had the appearance of concealment.

Q. Could they be discovered without removing those bundles of hemp, behind which they were put?

Russell. Not conveniently. There was a passage that went up at the end of the bundles of this hemp, and a person probably might have discovered it. At the ends of the bundle of hemp, there is a little passage; a person might have gone up to the upper end of it and have discovered this, if he had had any apprehensions of such a thing.

Q. Was there any loose hemp near it?

Russell. Yes, what we call dunnage; that is the refuse of the hemp which we generally lay at the bottom of the hemp to preserve it from any moisture that may arise from the foundation; those combustibles were laid upon that; there was also some brown paper; when we found all these parts of the machine they were put together, and then made the appearance of a dark lantern; there was some brown paper laid near it, which appeared to have been tarred; when this thing was all united we put it upon the paper that was tarred, and the paper seemed as if it had been round this tin case; it seemed as if it had been thrown over the bundle, and by striking against the mow of hemp, the parts had separated; that was the idea that I formed of the matter.

Q. Then you communicated it to the proper officer at the Dock-Yard?

Russell.

Ruffel. I did.

Q. Were these things found in such a place, that if a fire had arisen in consequence of them, the Hemp-House and the hemp in it must probably have been consumed?

Ruffel. Undoubtedly.

Q. That Hemp-House, I suppose, from its name, is the place where the hemp belonging to the Dock is kept?

Ruffel. Yes, the ground floor upon which this tin case was found was full of hemp, and this was the situation of the machine; it could not have been thrown in at a venture. The construction that I put upon it was, That it must have been thrown over the bundles of refused hemp, for they were as high as my head, and therefore it is possible, and I apprehend that was the case, that it was thrown against the mow from which it rebounded and separated.

Court. Prisoner, I would once for all, without repeating it to you after every witness is called, inform you, That you are at liberty to ask any witness what questions you think fit, after the examination is gone through by the Crown. You know best your own defence.

WILLIAM TENCH sworn.

Q. Did you ever see the prisoner?

Tench. I have.

Q. Where?

Tench. At my master's house just without Westgate, Canterbury.

Q. Did you make any tin thing for him?

Tench. Yes. I did.

Q. Look at that, and tell us whether that is the thing that you made for him?

Tench. Yes, this is the machine.

Q. When was it you made it for him?

Tench. About a month or six weeks before Christmas.

Q. When was the first time since that, that any enquiry was made of you about making this canister?

Tench. On the Monday before last.

Prisoner. You say you made this canister for me, a month or six weeks ago?

Tench. No; a month or six weeks before Christmas.

Prisoner. How do you know the canister?

Tench. I know it by the seam.

Prisoner. I saw a canister a few days ago with the seam as that; how can you know one seam from another?

Tench. Because this is so very bad foddered; I took particular notice of it when you came to me about it.

Prisoner. Can you swear to the fodder?

Tench. Yes.

Prisoner. How do you know me; by my face, or dress, or voice, or what?

Tench. I know you are the very man that came to me about it. I know you by your person, by your hair, and by your cloaths that you have on now.

Prisoner. What particular garment?

Tench. You had on the same coat you have now.

Prisoner. This coat? (his great coat.)

Tench. No, not your great coat, the other, or near upon such a colour.

Prisoner. On what particular day did you make this tin canister?

Tench. I really cannot tell.

Prisoner. Was it so much as six weeks before Christmas?

Tench. That is as nigh as I can tell.

Prisoner. Was it more or less do you think?

Tench. I really cannot tell.

Prisoner. I think he ought to recollect whether it is more or less than six weeks before Christmas.

Character of Lord Camden.

THIS Nobleman was, on the change of Ministry which was formed by Lord Chatham in July 1766, and thought for some months to be under his controul and direction, appointed Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain. His Lordship, previous to his appointment, stood high in the opinion of the public, as well on account of his strong intellectual powers and professional knowledge, as his laudable and hitherto unshaken political integrity. Brought in under the auspices of his steady friend, it may be presumed their views and sentiments were the same; happy for one of them, we believe, that they had separately thought for themselves. An opportunity soon presented itself, which operated like the touch of Ithuriel's spear. Our new Chancellor was to be tried in the double capacity of Lawyer and Statesman. The Lord Mayor of London, who happened to be a cornfactor, alarmed the Ministry with an account of a short crop of corn at home, a failure of the harvest all over Europe, and a rapid exportation under the corn laws. The question came to be considered in the Cabinet, a royal proclamation was issued, forbidding any further exportation; and the laws, at least in this instance, were made to give way to the arbitrary mandates of the Council-table. The Tories instantly turned Whigs and Patriots, and arraigned the measure as both an open attack on the constitution, and a direct invasion of the laws; they emphatically called it the forty days tyranny, and contended it was much more dangerous than the case of ship money, in the reign of Charles the First, or the the dispensing power assumed by James the Second. The opening was given, the blot was hit; the measure might be softened or palliated, but could not be defended; yet, what was the noble Lord's conduct? Did he confess or acknowledge, that his feelings for the sufferings of his fellow-subjects misled his understanding; or that his love of justice, founded in governmental protection and political preservation, directed or influenced his conduct? No, his Lordship stood on the beaten ground of state necessity; and not only fixed the exercise of the royal prerogative in the first magistrate, where to be sure it should always reside, but endeavoured to invest him with the option when, and on what occasion, with the advice of his privy council, that inherent prerogative is to be exercised, in direct contradiction to the known and statute law of the land, and the acknowledged principle of the constitution. Such was part of the first three months Chancellorship of the once celebrated Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. His Patron's infirmity of body daily encreasing; his weight in the closet daily and proportionably decreasing; the noble Duke * at the head of the Treasury soon attaching himself to another party, his Lordship at once found himself stripped of his popularity, and rendered a cypher in the Cabinet; and thus for three tedious years remained a silent spectator in Parliament, while the Port American duty bill; the explanation by address of the statute of Henry the Eighth, for the trial of offenders for crimes committed beyond sea; and the affair of the Middlesex election, severally received the approbation of a majority, both in Cabinet and in Parliament. His Patron † having for some time before resigned, and recovered his strength and spirits, his Lordship caught the holy flame, and once more commenced Patriot. At the opening of the session in 1770, he separated from his colleagues in office, and condemned, in the most unqualified terms, the conduct of Administration in the affair of Mr. Wilkes and the Middlesex election. In 1774, the affairs of America having become a continual subject of parliamentary discussion, his Lordship resumed his old line of politics, and has ever since uniformly continued one of the strongest advocates for the natural, chartered, and constitutional rights of America, in contradiction to the ministerial and parliamentary claims of this country.—He is, indeed, more able himself than a host of ordinary adversaries.

His Lordship's parliamentary abilities

* Duke of Grafton. † Lord Chatham, are unquestionable. In point of contrast to a noble law Lord *, he is by no means so great an orator, in the strict sense of the word; but he is infinitely superior in depth of reasoning, in logical definition, in the philosophical arrangement and separation of his ideas, and in his knowledge of the fundamental laws of this constitution. He never leaves those openings to his antagonists, which eternally recur in the harangues of his learned and noble brother. He seldom addresses himself merely to the passions; and if he does, he almost always addresses them through the medium of true argument and sound logic. In fact, if he was to speak in an audience, composed of men of talents and experience only, there is no man in either house would stand the least chance to contend with him for victory; but in merely driving or leading a herd, Lord Mansfield, Lord Chatham, and even Lord Lyttleton, are confessedly his superiors. In respect of delineation, Lord Camden is cool, deliberative, argumentative, and persuasive. He is fond of first principles; he argues closely, and never lets them out of his view; his volubility, choice of language, flowings of ideas and words to express them, are inexhaustible. The natural rights of the Colonists, the privileges and immunities granted by charter, and their representative rights as native subjects of the British empire, are substrata on which he erects all his arguments, and from whence he draws all his conclusions. His judgment is, if possible, still greater in debate, than his mere powers of oratory as a public speaker. He either takes a part early in it, decides the question, or embarrasses his adversaries; or he waits till they have spent all their force, and rests his attack on some latent or neglected point, overlooked, or little attended to in the course of the debate. In fine, as Lord Mansfield is the greatest orator, so we do not hesitate to pronounce Camden by much the most able reasoner in either house of parliament. On the other hand, his Lordship deals too much in first principles, denied or controverted by his adversaries; and seems more eager to convince the people of America, though at three thousand miles distance, that they are right, than to persuade his noble auditory, that they are wrong. Many of his speeches bear an inflammatory appearance. His silence or acquiescence in the measures he now so loudly condemns, takes off much of that weight his arguments must be otherwise intitled to. His discourses are sometimes too fine spun and intricate, and sometimes partake of the bar subtilty, and refinement of Westminster-Hall. On the whole, he seems disposed to embarrass and embroil, even where he does not expect to succeed. This we take to be a wanton abuse of his great talents; and what, in our opinion, he ought above all things to totally avoid, or studiously learn to correct.

The present Fashion described.

THE ladies continue to dress their heads very high—three large curls down the sides—the chignon very large and low down the shoulders—very large caps trimmed with large ostrich feathers—hoops small and thick at top—stays exceedingly low, the shape excessively small—very large nosegays or bouquets of natural flowers are now universally worn, especially in the dishabille or polonese. The ladies wear them very high, and monstrously large.

Miss B—— was lately at the opera with a gown of suppressed sighs, ornamented with a trimming of regrets superfluous—her point ruffles perfect candour and strict attention, her shoes queen's hair, embroidered with diamonds perfidious, the come and see emeralds, her curls in sentiments supported by a cap of pretension, trimmed with inconstant feathers, a ribbon of the down-cast eye, her chignon in preference, and an immense bouquet of certain conquests.

The following Instructions from the Lord Bishop of C—— to his Clergy, were lately circulated throughout his Diocese.

My reverend Brother:

THE more than usual influx into my diocese for some years past, of candidates for holy orders, who have not had an University education, calls upon me for my very serious consideration, to give some check to so growing an irregularity. Not that it is peculiar to this kingdom, for the self-same complaint has long obtained in England, and in the Northern dioceses particularly, where some regulations have of late been concerted to obviate it, and with so much success, that I may hope to profit of their measures, by adopting, as near as the condition of the two churches admits, their rules and regulations in mine. Sensible of the propriety of directing my principal attention to the claims in this respect, of an University of our own, of so great figure in the learned world, and of the disproportion at the same time of the supplies to be drawn from thence to the annual demands of our church; I saw alike the call upon me for giving due preference to the University students, and yet no exclusive discouragement (where there could be no general demerit) to those, whose either fortunes or opportunities had not been happy enough to admit of an University education.

These the canonical latitude plainly embraces, still comparing the low state of literature at the times for which our canons had been calculated, with its high advance in these; certainly some higher attainments in literature were reasonably to be expected, even in that quarter, and some discretionary retrenchments of that very latitude seemed expedient, that the literati remain no longer upon an equal footing with the academick.—In this line, whatever the event has proved, have moved all my instructions and directions, in respect of vacant curacies, and it is now become high time for me to draw my line of conduct still closer in this particular, and to communicate with you the inclosed rules and regulations for my own diocese. Not doubting of your ready concurrence with me in the premises, and recommending you in your Ministry, to the grace and protection of Almighty God,

I am, your affectionate Brother,
Dublin, Jan. 7, 1777. J. C.

Rules and Regulations for the Diocese of Clogher, to be communicated to the neighbouring Clergy.

- I. THAT no one who has not had an University education be nominated by you to me, as a candidate for Deacon's orders, till he be twenty-three years of age compleat;—this to be verified from the parish register (if to be had), or other competent attestation.
- II. THAT such person give notice to me or my vicar-general, in writing, at least two months before the day of ordination, of his intentions to offer himself a candidate.
- III. THAT all such, besides the usual instruments, send up to me or my vicar-general, an account of their place of birth; what education they have had, what they have been employed about since they left school, during at least the three last years; this to be signed by themselves and two of the neighbouring clergymen, at least.
- IV. THAT in particular, every candidate who hath been educated in a University in Scotland, give to me or my vicar-general, in writing, not less than three months notice of such his intentions, that I may inform myself, as well of his moral as literary character, from the

the professor of divinity in the University, where the candidate sets forth his education, deeming the usual certificate of having been in a class, no proper testimonial of conduct, and encouraged to believe the divinity professors in that kingdom ready to assist in a regulation of so great consequence to the ministry.

V. THAT they, as well as the candidates above-mentioned, shall understand themselves engaged not to quit the curacy to which they shall be ordained, within three years after such ordination, without reasons to be approved of by me or my vicar general, whose letters of "Bene discessit" shall be governed in a great measure by conformity to the above regulations.

Description of the Town of Newry.

NEWRY is situated 50 miles N. of Dublin, on the river Newry, lately made navigable by parliamentary aid, from Carlisle-bay to Loughneagh. The number of houses in the town are supposed to exceed 1600, mostly built of freestone, forming several very narrow streets, which are very badly paved; this and a want of public lights, make it very dangerous to walk in at night, this season of the year. Vessels of 200 tons burthen can come up to the town from the sea, and unload at the merchants ware-houses, an amazing number of which are on the quays, at each side the river. From Loughneagh boats of 70 tons burthen come down the canal, and lie in a beautiful basin, about 300 feet square, which has a fine gravel-walk round it, with trees at each side; from this basin along the river-side, is a walk of half a mile long, planted with elms at each side, where the inhabitants of the town resort for the benefit of the fresh air, which is much wanting in the town. The church in Newry is perhaps the worst building of the kind in Ireland; A few years ago a subscription was on foot to build a new church, and have the town divided into two parishes, but by some misunderstanding among the subscribers, this laudable design failed. There are here three market-houses, no way remarkable for the elegance of their architecture: A Presbyterian meeting-house, and a Romish chapel. The custom-house is a handsome building of hewn stone.

The trade of this town is very great, and has increased so much of late years, that it is now esteemed the fourth trading town in Ireland; supplying (by means of its communication by water to Loughneagh) most parts of the province of Ulster with foreign merchandize, and having a very great export of linen cloth, beef, butter, &c.—

This town is a potwalloping borough, and having the privilege of election, the inhabitants do not, like most of the neighbouring boroughs, give up that right to the will of the landlord!—There is an assembly held here every fortnight, and several private balls and card-clubs occasionally:—There are two news-papers printed twice in the week, and there is a good coffee-house in this town, besides several bookseller's shops and circulating libraries; so that perhaps, there is not a town of the size of Newry in Ireland, where every convenience of life may be had as readily as here. 'Tis somewhat extraordinary there is not the convenience of public lights here; as to a stranger it must be very dangerous to walk here at night, by reason of the exceeding narrowness and bad pavement of the streets, as also many open cellars, which are in all parts of the town.

Description of the Town of Coleraine.

COLERAINE is situated in the Co. Londonderry, 102 miles N. of Dublin, and 21 E. of Londonderry. It contains about 400 houses, mostly built of stone in a handsome manner, and a few of brick.—In the town is a handsome parish church, with a spire steeple, and in the western suburbs, called Kilowen, stands another handsome, tho' small church. The river Bann divides the two parishes; over it is a good stone-bridge: There are also in the town two Presbyterian and a Quaker's meeting-house. The market-house is a good building, with a clock and steeple: A great weekly market is held on Saturday.

The town is a Corporation, consisting of a mayor, recorder, 12 aldermen, and 24 burgesses, who return, (or rather the landlord in their name), two members to parliament. At a short distance from the town, is a fine seat and demesne, belonging to Richard Jackson, Esq; one of the representatives in the present parliament for this borough.

Character of the Duke of Richmond.

TO bring his grace forward as a public man, it will be necessary to make a trifling deviation from the rule we have hitherto adhered to, and mean in future to follow, when not compelled to a breach of it as on the present occasion. The rule we here advert to is, not to push our political researches farther back than the month of August, 1766, when that great orator, able politician, and consummate statesman, Mr. Pitt, in a fit of vanity and frenzy mixed, or by an act of cool premeditated treachery, bartered bartered himself, and every thing which ought to be held dear by Englishmen, for the earldom of Chatham, and a fat irresponsible office. As we have often alluded to this shameful barter in terms of reproach and lamentation; and as some persons may think we have laid too great a stress on it, and say, that it could amount to no more than the political defection of one man, we beg leave, once for all, to add this short explanation; that it is not the act we now have cause to lament, but its fatal effects. His lordship is still alive, and in opposition; so is much the greater part of the friends that went into administration with him; but when we speak of a barter, we mean to say, that for what the noble lord received in the closet, he virtually surrendered that influence the people of this country have had ever since the Revolution, in chusing some of those servants of the crown and the public, which were wont to be called into office, and supported there, as much by the confidence of one, as the favour of the other: in fact, our government was once a popular government; we are now sorry to say that it has every appearance of a mere system of favouritism, originating in the views, passions, caprices, resentments, and affections of one man.

To return from this digression to what gave rise to it: the duke of Richmond having not been in office since the year 1766, we are obliged to seek and take up his political character in the month of July, 1765, on the ministerial arrangement which took place under lord Rockingham and the Old Whigs, supported and patronized by the late duke of Cumberland.

His grace was appointed ambassador to the court of France, and acquitted himself extremely well; particularly relative to the demolition of the bastion at Dunkirk, which, however agreeable to the then administration, and people at large, was far from being pleasing to some who were in the secret elsewhere. Private intimations, not official ones, were given to the French minister at this court to that effect. Nothing material towards the punctual performance of the article of the treaty of peace has been since done, but furnishing administration with a pretext for providing for a deserving Scotchman * at the trifling expence of thirty shillings a day—not to see the treaty fulfilled, or the jetties and sluices demolished, but wisely to prevent the French king from raising or constructing new ones. This was rather a tender point; his grace was therefore recalled; and in May, 1766, was appointed secretary of state for the southern department, in which post he remained till succeeded by lord Shelburne, who went in on the 2d of August in the same year with the earl of Chatham.

From that remarkable period, his grace has continued uniformly in opposition; and that on the broadest foundation. He does not confine his disapprobation to men only; nor yet to particular measures: but he grounds it on the cause, the motives, and the views which have brought in such men, which have produced such measures; a secret over-ruling, hidden influence, directed to the introduction of a nefarious court system; a system of simple favouritism, by which every thing in cabinet, parliament, and elsewhere, is to be conducted and tried by the test of private judgment, in contra-distinction to and in defiance of public opinion.

To pursue his grace through the wide circle of parliamentary opposition is not our intention; the main object of these enquiries being chiefly to connect the conduct of public men with the affairs of America, we shall consider his grace's, for the greater part, in that point of view.

Lord Hillsborough, in the year 1768, wrote two official letters, which perhaps in a great measure, however well intended, have sown the seeds of the present unhappy civil war. One of them contained instructions to governor Bernard to dissolve the assembly of Massachusetts Bay; the other directing the several American governors to assure the respective assemblies in the provinces where they presided, that no further taxes were meant to be laid on America; and that such as were already laid on would be repealed on commercial principles: these letters being further accompanied by private confidential assurances from administration, in some instances; and in others, as personally coming from the king; one of them indeed so strong, that his majesty was made to say, "That he would rather lose his crown, than preserve it by deceit." * Thus the Americans were taught by one letter to perceive, that the future freedom of deliberation of the assembly of Massachusetts Bay, and consequently of every other assembly on the continent, depended on their resolution to resist a menace, which presented the alternative of either submitting to the mandate of a British secretary of state, or to a temporary ry suspension, tending to terminate in a total dissolution of civil government. By means such as these, the colonies were taught by administration to hold the British parliament in contempt, when they found the king in one instance, and his ministers in the other, pledging themselves for the eventual resolutions of that degenerate and prostitute assembly. Such endeavours suggested besides, to those who saw farther, that when it should be found necessary to employ parliament for the purpose, those promises on the part of the crown might be disclaimed, or controuled by the legislature, and the ministerial authority on which the circular letter was written might be disavowed by succeeding ministers, as a rash ill-judged promise, which neither their successors in office, nor parliament, were by no means bound to perform or fulfil.

What foundation there might have been for the preceding observations, we do not pretend to determine; we only meant to state them shortly, as being the substance of the eighteen celebrated resolutions moved for by his grace in the house of lords, on the 18th of May, 1770, which produced one of the most extraordinary debates that we ever remember to have been present at. The whole of the misconduct of ministers in relation to America, for the four preceding years, was laid open in the most pointedly severe terms; the then state of that country was most strikingly depicted; and the disservice of it (to use one of Mr. Solicitor's technical expressions) was predicted in terms the most confident and unconditional; yet administration remained in a kind of political apathy. Lord Hillsborough rather palliated the measures on the stale doctrine of state necessity, than offered to defend either himself or his colleagues; and very modestly, though he owned himself the culprit [his own word] moved for an adjournment.

We find his grace, as often as an opportunity offered, continually recurring to the same ground, and as continually overpowered by numbers. His repeated contests with administration the whole of the spring session seventy-five, will bear testimony what his opinions have uniformly been on the present disputes subsisting between this country and America. His grace distinguished himself particularly in opposing the Prohibitory Fishery-bill, and in supporting the petition from his Majesty's natural-born subjects residing in Canada, praying that the law passed the preceding session, for regulating the government of Quebec, might be repealed. Time only can discover whether his grace has not been as able a politician, as he has uniformly proved himself to be a sound, at least a sincere and steady, patriot.

On the opening of the last session, administration began to feel him a most weighty, as well as warm antagonist. Besides his general grounds of opposition, he opened several new ones. He proved that the nation had been led imperceptibly into the present unnatural civil war; that ministers answered for matters of which they were intirely ignorant, and deceived parliament with a previous intention of doing so. He pointed particularly at the first * lord of the admiralty, who in the preceding session assured the house, that 22,000 seamen and marines would answer all the purposes of home protection and American hostility, and who, the first day of next session, had the temerity to tell parliament, that he knew the force was not sufficient, but he concealed his knowledge of it for fear the measure at large would not meet with their concurrence and support.

His grace took a very warm and active part in the motions of the duke of Manchester, on the introduction of the Hanover troops into Gibraltar and Minorca; and the duke of Grafton's relative to the number of British troops serving in America, and those in the Provincial service.—He moved for the examination of Mr. Penn, relative to the petition of the congress, and to the general state and disposition of the people of America; by which he proved this very important point, that whatever the intentions might be of a few ambitious fiery spirits in all parts of America, or of the Northern Colonies, that a very great majority of all degrees of people totally disapproved of any attempt to render themselves independent of the parent state.—Happy would it be for both countries, had this important truth been more seriously attended to.

The motion for suspending the military operations against America, and countermanding the march of the foreign troops, on the 5th of March, 1776, was brought forward by his Grace in one of the ablest speeches we have yet heard on either side of the subject. It took in the whole of the American question, both in point of justice, expediency, and practicability. He shewed, that the claim pushed to the length of unconditional submission, which was the language again resumed and publicly avowed, and to support which a noble lord † was appointed secretary of state,

state for the Colonies, was unjust, despotic, and oppressive, and led directly both in form and essence to arbitrary power: for where no line was offered to be drawn, either in respect of taxation or chartered rights, but the option lay with one party to act according to their own discretion, and no right of restraint, refusal, or controul, lay in the other, that, in his opinion, was the true and only substantial definition of arbitrary power; and was precisely what was sought and exercised by every successful or unsuccessful tyrant, or combination of tyrants, that ever lived.—On the ground of expediency, his grace was, if possible, more convincing: he pointed to the present state of France, her governing politics for more than a century, the mixture of jealousy, envy, rancour, and revenge, she entertained for this country, as well on ruling steady principles of national pride and national emulation, as of retaliation, and a spirit of re-conquest, on account of her disgraces during the late war, and the acquisitions ceded to us at the late peace. His grace strongly held up in contrast the present state of our only sure bulwark against the secret or avowed attempts of France, our navy, which he contended did not consist of more than the guardships, and they not above half manned; to which he added this very alarming circumstance, that the whole military force then within the kingdom did not amount to quite 8000 men. The last point, the impracticability of succeeding in our proposed attempt of reducing, and establishing a government founded in conquest, he treated with all possible ridicule. He contended, that the whole treasures of Great Britain would fall infinitely short of the undertaking; that if it were practicable, the country would be untenable; that if it were tenable, the expence would be enormous, and the burdens such a military establishment would necessarily introduce, be intolerable; and if none of those obstacles stood in the way, the conquest and dominion would not be worth seeking, as it would only put us in possession of a depopulated waste, perhaps, here and there along the sea-coast, occupied by a few mercenary, subjugated, spiritless slaves.

We must apologize to our readers for introducing the duke of Richmond so early into our catalogue as a parliamentary speaker, and have only to plead, that we were induced to it by the same motive which prevailed on us to present our readers with the character of a noble lord †, merely on account of his political value. His grace abounds with information, well selected. He arranges his matter judiciously, and seldom brings any thing forward that does not immediately concern the subject of debate, and is likewise important in itself. He is able in reply, and never fails to point out and detect, wherever his adversaries endeavour to palliate, falsify, or misrepresent. This, joined to his great sources of information, his personal boldness, his warmth of expression, his energy on some occasions, and his coolness and recollection on others, unite to render him a most useful speaker and formidable antagonist. On the other hand, his tedious, unmarked manner of speaking, his slow costly delivery, his frequent pauses and want of recollection, leave him far behind several, as a public speaker, who are destined to follow him on the same side. In fine, it is his matter, and his sincerity, not his oratory, that renders him at present so valuable to the English nation, so prized by his party, so detested by the junto, so feared by the ostensible ministers, and so obnoxious to a certain great man.

April, 1777.

The duke of Richmond, as one of the leaders of a powerful party, as a public man and peer of parliament, is one out of the very few who has preserved an uniformity of conduct; has been steady in his principles, open and undisguised in his sentiments, inflexible in his opinions, unremitted in his opposition to what he thought was wrong; staunch, sincere, and unmoved, by any extrinsic consideration, in support of whatever he thought was right. His opposition has been uniform; never languid: it is not mixed with indolence, inattention, and a certain tone of pliability, a certain air of political charity, a certain trimming, lukewarm disposition. No, the duke of Richmond has not attended his duty in parliament merely to give a silent vote. He has not absented himself on purpose to create an apology for his non-attendance. He has not delivered his sentiments by halves, in order to let one part of the measure pass unnoticed, and the other unproved, in the terms it deserved. He has not spared ministers when they deserve it, out of a mixture of court and parliamentary complaisance. Though bred and educated a modern Whig, he has not learned the whole of their creed by heart: nor brought himself up to the docility of practising a fifth of

it. He does not measure his present conduct in order to defend himself when in office by precedent; and more than all, he is above loading the tools in power, the phantoms in office, with matters that, he is convinced in his heart, are only chargeable to the obstinacy and ambition of the first M——e.

This may be a description of a man in the clouds; but, be that as it may, his grace's parliamentary conduct has encouraged us to give it as a real one; and that without wishing to pass the least degree of censure, oblique or direct, upon any man alive, who is not conscious of deserving it.

LETTER XIII.

Mrs. Pelham to Mrs. Butler.

My dear kind Friend,

I Am much obliged to you for your invitation to Nancy; but I think it best to have her come home: she has lost her watchful guide and protector—her heart is tender, and she may fall into a snare before she thinks of it. W——n B——h is populous, and she is more exposed there than in her father's family. Though she is mine, yet I do not scruple to say her person is attractive, because every one says it. But having been used to be with good people, she cannot be supposed to know enough of the cunning world to be guarded. I do not think it prudent she should stay at Trenchard Manor any longer than while necessary; yet if she is urged, the affair will require delicate management; you will be able to judge how long the affairs committed to her by the late excellent lady will be accomplishing. I cannot bear to be ungrateful, or appear insensible of the kindness shown by every branch of the family; but it is best to have her home. If I could discourse with you, my reasons would be known; but they are too nicely circumstanced to put on paper; perhaps you are before hand with me. I leave it to you to manage, but must desire you to mention to Sir William my desire of her living at home, as she has lost her mistress, and I think her too young to be her own yet—in a place where there is so much gay company there are too many snares. My heart is full.

“Virtue for ever frail as fair below;

“Each salutation may slide in a sin,” and the innocent confiding heart be drawn in—especially when gratitude inclines to put the best colouring on every action of the seeming benefactor. I shall write to Nancy, and wish you to ask for my letter, but I would not that she see this. Mr. Pelham has written a letter of condolence, with thanks to Sir William for his satisfaction to us of gloves and rings. If Nancy comes home, she may have most of her time to work for herself; and I think by her needle she might get a pretty maintenance. Lady Parker will employ her; and her acquaintance in the neighbourhood, and my cozen Briscow at Bath can do much for her in that way. So that she need not fear a genteel livelihood. Perhaps she is so used to high food, she will not like our more simple table; but use will bring her to love it, or I shall be sorry she ever knew any other. But I am too prolix when I write to you: however, we are bound by ancient rules—never to compliment in our letters. My hearty thanks and respects to Dr. Butler, whom I expect to watch over my daughter while she is his parishioner; his counsel added to yours, may be a help to preserve her in the paths of virtue.

I am with esteem,

Your much obliged

ANN PELHAM.

LETTER XIV.

From the Same to her Daughter.

My dear Child,

MRS. Butler has written me a kind invitation of you to stay a while with her; but I chuse to have you at home. It will, no doubt, affect you to leave the house and family where you have lived so long, and so pleasantly, and met with such abundant kindness; but more to part with the worthy young ladies who have bestowed their friendship on you. But consider, my dear, the difference of your situation now: you have no lady Trenchard, no superior head to direct, and let me say, govern your time. As to the young ladies, you can correspond with them, and perhaps to as much profit as in conversation: each kind of intercourse hath its peculiar advantages, and you seem to have a turn for epistolary. I know not when your business is over, but whenever it is, I would have you come away: in the mean time be putting your things up, and send your trunks in the stage to Mr. Carter's: write to me by the post, and I will get them home:—but take care so to behave as not to bring any slur on your reputation. Consider your past advantages, and improve by the remembrance. As great as your known privileges, so will the expectations of your friends and the world be. Every action of one who was thus indulged ed by lady Trenchard will be scrutinized. O! my dear child, be ever on your guard: shun the deadly influence of flattery. You are said to be pretty, if any tell you so, especially of the other sex, beware of them. The path of the seducer is smooth and gentle at first, but his steps lead down to death. Be afraid of those who are profuse of benefactions; you have had enough from the family already, and I would not chuse you should accept any presents. Lady Trenchard gave you what she thought proper. Trust not to verbal professions of virtue in those whom you do not fully know—this may lead you into snares. O! my child, I tremble to think how many fair blossoms have been shook off by the blighting winds of temptation. It is an evil world, and we have deceitful hearts. It is a just remark of one, “few bring back at evening the manners of the morning.” I do not speak from any thought that you have acted amiss; hitherto I know of no blame you have incurred. But W——n B——h and Trenchard Manor are places of too much company, the one of gay, the other can be only of gentlemen now. I hope you keep out of both. I believe I have said sufficient till you return, to put you on your guard. When you remove, be sure to leave the house in the most respectful manner. I long for the time which will bring you safe to the arms of

Your loving mother,
ANN PELHAM.

Your father joins me in these cautions and desires. Dolly is longing to have you teach her some more needle work.

L E T T E R X V.

Mrs. Butler to Mrs. Pelham,

NANCY has finished the work—and acquitted herself wisely and faithfully of the entrustments of lady Trenchard; so that she might return home as you desire, if she is willing. If you insist upon it, Sir William says he will send her in his own carriage; but he had rather she should tarry a while: adding, “Nancy has behaved so discreetly and modestly in the house that my people all love her—and besides for appearances I would have her stay longer—as she was my dear wife’s favourite—it will seem as if I slighted her, to have Nancy go away. Mrs. Wilson is a wife faithful woman, and Mrs. Pelham need not be afraid of trusting her daughter with her. I intend to do handsome for her.” Madam Masham was by, and Mr. Trenchard: the former said she would have Nancy stay a while with her, for that she had some work for her, and she did not know any body that would be so nice and exact about it, and she must not go away till that was done. Sir William replied, “well send your work here and she will do it—and that will do as well.” Mr. Trenchard said nothing, nor took any notice. I told him “Nancy was young—and you was not quite easy as she had no head to watch and guard her morals: you were afraid she might fall into some snare. Girls were much exposed when there was no mother or mistress to account to.” As I guessed what your fear was (though I have no reason from any thing but your letter for my conjecture) I closely watched the young gentleman, but when I began the subject, he went to the opposite window, and stood looking out all the time; so I saw not his countenance—and as he did not meddle with it I can guess nothing. But perhaps I wrong you in these conjectures; if so, I ask pardon, though I know not but you ought to ask mine for not speaking plainer, as you know my inviolable adherence to the rules of our friendship and correspondence*. I had asked Nancy before to let me see your letter; she readily gave it me. I asked her what her thoughts were: she sighed and said, “it would be dull to her to leave the house and the borough, but she chose notwithstanding to go home,” and desired me to ask Sir William, for she thought it would not be handsome to break away without, though she had no doubt of his assent, for she had nothing to do there.

Before I went away, Mrs. Wilson came into the room to speak to Madam Masham, when Sir William told her your propoal: the poor woman, it was plain, could not bear the thoughts of it, and then, and more when I went up stairs, pleaded so hard to have her stay, and promised to take care of her, and if any thing appeared wrong in her conduct, or that of others to her, she would tell me directly, I promised to use my interest with you to let her stay till spring; if nothing material happened; and I give it as my opinion that she is as safe there, as if she were at home: but after all, would have you do as you judge best—all is now before you. Mr. Trenchard waited on me home—tarryed a while and discoursed very pertinently on his sorrowful bereavement; he really loved his mama, and seemed to pride himself

LETTER XVI.

Nancy Pelham to her Mother.

I AM very thankful, my ever dear mother, for your letter; but truly sorry that you should have anxiety on my account. I am willing to do any thing, and be almost any where, so I please you and my father. Though I love Trenchard Manor better than any place, because my lady lived here, and I was happy under her; yet I can leave it when you call me away. I have a dear affection indeed for all here, and for my young friends Miss Collet, Miss Harmel, Miss Kolse, the Miss Brices, &c. There are others though poor among the tenants wives and daughters, that I set much by—as I used by my lady's orders to go once a month the rounds among them, to see what their cases were, report them to her, and then carry her bounties: to some she sent physic, salves and cordials; to some clothes; to some provisions; and to some money, as she thought proper. This brought me to a more exact knowledge than I could otherwise have had; and has led me to a greater insight of human nature than all my reading. This department was what she meant when she first told me she had something to employ me about that would be of the greatest advantage to me; and, dear madam, I hope it has done much to help me in gaining a juster opinion of the outward good things I enjoy, and to lessen my esteem for this world's glory—for when I see some among these poor, sick, and maimed, yet sensible people, a humble, patient, contented frame of mind, neither murmuring at the providence that has assigned their stations, nor envying those above them—thankful for the smallest kindness, grateful to the Supreme Giver, and blessing the little dispenser—silent and cheerful under the frowns, and not elated at the smiles of Providence on their outward affairs; and on the other hand, see among the rich, some uneasy amidst the loads of plenty, searching, as in the dark, after unknown, untasted pleasures: disquieting all around them, because some petty trifle has arisen about their food, their cloathing, or their diversions; surfeited with vanities, yet eagerly bent on repeating the tiresome round of pleasures, wholly sensitive, regardless of virtue, and almost dead to the feelings of humanity and reason, buried in self, and immersed in vanity, revelling, &c. I cannot but think real happiness consists in the temper of the mind. When I saw while living, and now reflect on the example and character of my excellent lady deceased, that self-enjoyment she had, that love of books and retirement, and select society, which she chose among the truly serious, without respect to rank, fortune, sects, or narrow distinctions; that possession of her soul in trying afflictions, (which I knew, though few saw or knew) that cheerful satisfaction with the disposals of heaven in all her long confinement, hours of pain, and mortal languishment, that benevolence, kindness, sympathy, she shewed to the afflicted, the charitable things she did secretly, the bounties she so readily bestowed, the indifference to show, dress, and such things; I cannot but think it is no farther happiness to be rich, than we have hearts to do good with our riches. It is not in money, in dress, in equipage, in birth, in title, in palaces, in costly food, nor gaudy array, to make us feel and act like reasonable beings.

I still lodge in Mrs. Wilson's room, and shall while I stay. In the day time Katy and I sit in the little chamber where my lady used to be in the winter, next to her bedchamber. Sir W. told me to take that for the winter. Mrs. Wilson sits with us when she can be spared up stairs, and that is generally all the afternoon and evening, for they seldom have great suppers now, and the servants are as observant of her orders as before. Sir W. and Mr. Trenchard sit in the parlour, where they entertain their friends together. Mr. T's club meet in his chamber, and then they have their supper there, but his servant only goes in. Mr. T. is very grave yet: I seldom see him, not once in a week, for he never comes into his mother's bedchamber where Sir W. sits of evenings when he is alone, and which opens into ours. He told Mrs. Wilson once, he could not bear to go into it. Mrs. Wilson speaks very handsomely of him, says he is worthy such a mother.

I submit it wholly to papa and you whether to go, or stay and finish Madam Masham's work here: Mrs. Wilson says if I go Madam Masham will be offended, and then I shall lose her work, and that she always pays generously. She gave me two guineas to buy the materials with, and they cost but one guinea and a quarter; but she would not let me return the rest.—She said that was to pay me for getting them, and she would give me some shillings (laughing) for my work, if I did it good; this is her way, for she is full of humour. Mr. Johnny is like her, and she always calls him her son. Please to let me know soon your whole mind.

Your dutiful,

NANCY PELHAM-

LETTER XVII.

Mrs. Pelham to her Daughter.

My dear Nancy,

YOUR father and I, upon maturely considering what Mrs. Butler and you have written, consent that you stay a while longer. But if we alter our opinions reserve the liberty to recall this consent. I like the way of living you now observe. I would have you still visit lady Trenchard's poor; in general I have found more edification in such company than among their superiors; not that there is none good amongst the genteel, the wealthy, and even the great. The late Lady M——n, Lady O——t, Lady Trenchard, and the present excellent duchess of S——t, and countess of N——, are among those I know to be eminently good, as well as noble and great. Religion like its object is no respecter of persons, but some of all ranks are recipients of its genuine operations. If real goodness commands your esteem, you will be in less danger than I feared of swerving; but still, my dear child, watch yourself, guard your eye, and guard your heart from other intrusions. Too careful you cannot be. I hope you pay due regard to the advice of worthy Dr. Butler and his lady. I am thankful to Mrs. Wilson for her care and love to you; but a mother's protection is different, and you will find it so, I believe, if ever you want it. But above all, place your reliance on divine aid for wisdom to discern, and strength to pursue the path of duty; this will be your safety and your happiness: thus wishes your solicitous,

Affectionate mother,

A. PELHAM.

These are all the letters that are necessary to transcribe till we find Miss Nancy returned to her father's, to live there, which she did three months afterwards. The occasion of her return we are about to enter on, which will display more of her amiable character and wise conduct.

(To be continued.)

To the Editors of the Hibernian Magazine.

THE weighty and important business of the nation, having for some time past engrossed much of my attention, and in consequence thereof, carefully viewing and reviewing every circumstance that might possibly tend to promote the welfare of the state, amongst a variety of expedients for that purpose, I present you with the first, which is calculated (as I humbly apprehend) to answer many worthy and laudable ends, the smallest of which will be an addition to his majesty's revenues of near 300,000l. per annum, besides an increase of subjects, that may in time become useful members of society. Add to this, that many inferior taxes intended to be laid upon servants, dogs, &c. &c. may upon such event be the better dispensed with. As the supply alluded to is to be levied upon all old maids, beyond a certain age, and intitled to certain yearly or other incomes; I make no doubt but both houses of parliament will speedily manifest their hearty concurrence thereto, and as soon as the usual forms will permit, pass a bill to the following effect:

Bill for taxing old Maids.

"IT is enacted, by the advice and authority of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled,

"That all maids, intitled to a clear yearly income of 100, or 1000l. in the whole, and so in proportion to any fortune above that sum, do at the age of 27 years (being the time limited for the commencement of their old maidship) register themselves in the books of the governor of the county they live in, and then and there give in a true and particular inventory, or schedule, of all their real and personal estate, wearing apparel excepted, under the penalty of having a fourth of their fortune forfeited for the first offence, or neglect of conforming to this act; and double that sum for every other the like omission, upon sufficient information, given to any of his majesty's commissioners in Chancery, King's-Bench, or Common Pleas.

"And be it further enacted, by the advice and authority aforesaid, that this act, nor any matter, clause, or thing therein contained, shall not extend, or be deemed to extend to such old maids, as never had a true, genuine, or serious proposal of marriage made to them, nor to any person on their account, for ten years preceding their old maidship, any clause, matter, or thing contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

"And be it further declared as aforesaid, that after the expiration of 27 years, each old maid shall be subject to a tax of 6d. in the pound, in proportion to their fortunes, as aforesaid; and to be raised and levied by his majesty's revenue officers, under certain restrictions*, pains, and penalties, as shall be hereafter observed.

NOTE.

* No old bachelor to be concerned in raising this tax upon any pretence whatever.

"And

“ And be it further enacted, that after the age of 35 years, no old maid shall be allowed, or permitted to enter into the holy state of matrimony; as at that period they shall be deemed incapable of performing any of the necessary functions incident to such happy state.

“ And be it further enacted, that all legacies, given by old maids to favourite cats, lap-dogs, or to other animals, shall be void to all intents and purposes; and that such legacy, and every benefit and advantage to be derived therefrom, shall from henceforth be appropriated towards supporting and defraying the expences of the present American war; and when and so soon as a peace shall be effected, or take place with the American colonies, that such sums be appropriated towards the support and maintenance of the Magdalene hospital.”

A Lecture on Widows.

Are all widows alike? Or how many species are there of them?

THERE are good and bad of all ranks and situations; and I fear, if I was to take the whole company of widows which there are in the world, I should be obliged to range them under several distinct and separate classes; but as you seem to be unsettled in your principles upon this important subject, I will give you my sentiments of the matter.

A widow is a woman, who, having been freed from the restraint of a single life by matrimony, is delivered from the shackles of a married life by the death of her husband.

Thrice happy being! who canst obey the call of pleasure, without following the train of a chaprone; who canst open thy doors to the flatterer and the beau without scandal; who, at the same moment, mayest enjoy all the freedom of the married life, and receive all the homage of the virgin state!

Of widows there are two kinds:

1. Those who did love their husbands—or appeared to love them.

2. Those who did not—and made no secret of it.

The first is an amiable consistent character; she loved her husband while he lived, and she reveres his memory now he is no more. Her affection dwells continually upon his goodness and his virtues, and exercises its best powers in teaching her off-spring to follow the steps of honour wherein their father trod before them: this is her happiness, and she is content with the share of it Heaven has allotted her; nor does she look forwards with the hopes of increasing it by any future connections.

This is the rational widow!

If I had described this character in verse, I should have compared her to an honeysuckle which continues to blow round the trunk of an oak, which has long been withered.

2dly. Of the widows who did not love their husbands, there are two distinct species.

The first is that lady, who having been disappointed of the happiness and comfort which she expected from matrimony in her past connection, is continually looking forwards to obtain that happiness and comfort in another alliance.

This is the longing, or expecting, or wishing widow!

The second is a lady, who, now and then, thought she loved her husband—or did not well know whether she loved him or not; and though she has her wishes and expectations, does not always know what they are, or where to direct them—and is continually changing their form and colour by the powers of her own lively and changeful fancy.

This is the whimsical widow!

And I really believe, that under the characters of the rational, the wishing, and the whimsical widow, as I have defined them, you might rank every widow under the moon.

I have a very particular and sufficient reason for not using the word fun as the last word of the last sentence.

The characters of the wishing and the whimsical widows will admit of an infinite number of divisions and subdivisions. The subject is pregnant with uncommon variety, but where is the imagination whose flight is so powerful as to follow the wishes of the wishing widow, or the whims of the whimsical widow?

I am, at this moment, acquainted with the most whimsical widow, fancy was ever godmother to. There is not a hair of her head which has not a whim in it—she is the very soul of whim. There was, ah! there was a time in my life, when I should have been well pleased to have roused all her fancies from their hiding places, hunted them through the infinite turnings and windings of her little brain, till panting and breathless, they implored my mercy—for their innocence sake.

Capt. Alexander Blair's Appeal to the Public, relative to the Spaniards seizing a British Ship.

THE capture of the Morning Star, belonging to Dr. Irving, and myself, and my application for redress having been greatly greatly misrepresented, both in and out of parliament, I submit the following state of facts to the public, who may then judge for themselves, how far any of their servants have been culpable; and whether, in my appeal to parliament, I have been guilty of that indecent hurry of which I am accused.

Lord Halifax, when Secretary of State, in a letter to the Governor of Jamaica, dated December 9, 1763, says, "The Musquito Shore is a British settlement, and as such is to be maintained and encouraged."

Lord Dartmouth sent instructions to the Governor of Jamaica, in August 1775, for establishing a legislative council on the Musquito Shore, to be chosen by the inhabitants.

Dr. Irving and myself, induced by the above arrangement, sailed from Gravesend on the 13th of November, 1775, with a design of settling on the Musquito Shore, not entertaining the most distant suspicion, that our property would not be equally protected there as in any other part of the British dominions.

On the 30th of April last, the Morning Star was lying at anchor, under British colours, in the road of Black-river, the principal settlement on the Musquito Shore, and in sight of the king's house, and was there forcibly seized by two armed sloops under Dutch colours; at the same time one of their boats chased the Nancy, a small sloop belonging to Black-river: John Coffil, master of the Nancy, and Richard Burrel, who was a passenger in her, both deposed, that the boat was at one time so near as to hook the Nancy's quarter-rail, and that the crew were Spaniards; every man who has ever seen a Spaniard, must know that they could not be mistaken.

The inhabitants of Black-river, conscious that the Morning Star had never been employed in any illicit trade, were greatly alarmed; they considered the capture as a direct attack on the colony, and applied to the Superintendent to assemble the Legislative Council; that Council which (I am told) Lord North assured the House of Commons never existed, met, advised the Superintendent to send an express to Jamaica, with an account of this daring and unprecedented outrage, and laid a tax on the colony for defraying the expence.

The depositions of John Coffil, Richard Burrel, and some other persons, who saw the transaction, were sent to the Governor of Jamaica (the colony being at present an appendage to that government); but both the Governor and Admiral, for reasons best known to themselves, were of opinion, that the Morning Star was taken by North-American privateers; and no step was taken to reclaim the vessel and seamen, until Dr. Irving arrived in Jamaica on the 19th of September, and fortunately met with Frederic Sund, one of the seamen taken in the Morning Star, and who had escaped from Carthagea. This man made oath to all the particulars of the capture before Thomas Fench, Custos and Chief Judge of the Court of Common pleas of Kingston in Jamaica.

The Governor, unable to resist such positive proof, applied to Admiral Gayton, who, after a delay of another month, sent a frigate to Carthagea, but positively refused to permit Dr. Irving to go in the frigate to assist the captain in his application for redress.

The Spanish Governor, contrary, in all probability, to the wishes of Sir Basil Keith and admiral Gayton, acknowledged the capture, but said he had no power or authority to order restitution.

Having taken the earliest opportunity of returning to England, I got to London September 24, and next day presented a memorial to Lord George Germaine, with an attested estimate of the actual loss immediately sustained, amounting to 2659 l. 12s. 10d. sterl. besides the total ruin of our project; his Lordship acquainted me with the opinion of Sir Basil Keith, that the Morning Star was taken by North American privateers. I showed him the affidavits of John Coffil, and Richard Burrel; but his Lordship chose to give more credit to the vague suspicion of the Governor of Jamaica, than to my positive assurances, as a spectator of the transaction, supported by the clearest evidence the nature of the case would admit, or which there was at that time any probability of ever obtaining.—His Lordship seemed extremely desirous of not making any immediate application to the court of Spain, and in deference to the critical situation of this country at that time (for the accounts of our successes in America were not then arrived) I did not then press the matter farther.

I received Frederic Sund's affidavit on the 17th of December, and wrote immediately to Lord George Germaine, inclosing a copy of it. I saw his Lordship on the 19th, when he seemed still desirous of making further delays; but being pressed by me for redress, referred me to Lord Weymouth, to whose department he told me it belonged to make application to the court of Spain.

I saw Lord Weymouth by appointment soon after, who told me that the first knowledge he had of the affair was by a copy of

Dr. Irving's petition to the Governor of Jamaica, and of Frederick Sund's affidavit, transmitted to him from the Admiralty; that he had immediately sent them to Lord Grantham; that the papers which I had put into his hands should be sent that evening; and that as soon as any answer arrived from the court of Spain, it should be communicated to me: this last part of his Lordship's promise has never been performed; but I willingly impute the neglect to hurry of business.

The propriety of Lord Weymouth's conduct in the affair of Falkland's island, makes it reasonable to suppose, that if the representations to the court of Spain, on the present occasion, have not been made with becoming spirit, it is not his Lordship's fault.

I am assured that Lord ——— told the House of Commons, that the Spanish Minister denied any knowledge of the affair in the month of January. The Morning Star was taken on the 30th of April, and carried directly to Porto-Bello and Carthagena. Can any man believe that a Spanish Governor dared so long neglect informing his court of the capture of a British vessel in so unprecedented a manner?

Great pains have been taken to represent the whole affair as a complaint of a private injury, in order that Administration might shelter themselves under the shallow pretence, that I did not continue to harass them, with daily applications for redress, from the 25th of September to the 17th of December, but this is by no means the case;—the British flag has been insulted;—British seamen have been made captives in the most barbarous and disgraceful manner;—and the very existence of a colony, capable of being made equal to any in the West Indies, is at stake.

I conceive that I have discharged my duty to the Public, by communicating to his Majesty's Ministers, as early as possible, all I knew of the matter; if the negotiation has languished in their hands, it is to be hoped the day will arrive, when they shall be made answerable for it.

ALEX. BLAIR.

Oxendon-street, March 4.

Substance of the "Act for enabling the Lords of the Admiralty to grant Commissions to private Ships, &c. employed in Trade, or retained in his Majesty's Service, to make Prize of such ships, &c. as are therein mentioned, for a limited Time."

THIS act, after in part reciting that of 16 Geo. III. c. 5. enacts, that the lord high admiral of Great Britain, or the commissioners for executing that office, or any three of them, or any person by him or them appointed, may, from Feb. 20, 1777, at the request of the owner of any ship, &c. employed in trade, or retained in his majesty's service, giving such security as after-mentioned, issue forth commissions to the commanders of such ships, &c. for taking ships, &c. belonging to the rebellious colonies; and also all the British and Irish ships, trading to or from the said colonies, contrary to the said act, 16 Geo. III. ch. 5. and that such ships (being first legally condemned) shall belong wholly and intirely to the owners and crews of such commissioned ships, without any deduction whatever (customs and duties only excepted) to be divided in such manner as the said owners and crews shall agree among themselves; except when such commissioned ships are under convoy.

That the lord high admiral, &c. by orders in writing under their hands and seals, may revoke any such commissions; provided, that the secretary of the admiralty shall cause notice in writing to be sent to the owner, agent, or security, of the ship, &c. and, if such ship, &c. shall be in the channel, such order of revocation shall effectually supersede the said commission in twenty days after such notice given, or sooner, if notice shall be actually given to the commander thereof; and, if such ship, &c. shall be to the southward of Cape Finisterre, in six weeks; and, if in North America or the West Indies, in three months; and commanders, &c. may complain of such revocation to his majesty in council, within thirty days after such notice is given as aforesaid; and his majesty's determination in council shall be final; provided also, that, when any order of revocation shall be superseded, the commission shall be deemed to have continued in force, and all prizes taken by virtue thereof shall belong to such owners, &c. as if such orders had not been made, and no person shall be liable to be punished for so doing, before receiving notice of such revocation, any thing which he might lawfully have done under such commission:

That the same security, &c. as for private ships of war, shall be taken, before granting any commission:

That all persons applying for commissions shall set forth in writing an exact description of the vessel, its cargo, burthen, number and nature of the guns, from and to where bound, names of the principal owners, and number of men, which are all to be inserted in the commission; and which commission the commander shall produce to the collector, &c. of the customs;

at the port from which such ship, &c. shall be fitted out; who are to examine such ship, &c. without fee or reward; and, if found agreeable to the description, to grant a certificate thereof gratis; and, if any commander shall leave port without such certificate, or with a force inferior to that specified in the commission, his commission shall be void; and the commander, on conviction, imprisoned, without bail or mainprize, any time not exceeding one year for one offence.

That if any collector, &c. shall grant on false certificate, he shall forfeit his office, and be for ever incapable of holding any office in the customs, and shall forfeit 100l. one moiety to the informer, and the other to the corporation for the relief of sick and wounded seamen in the merchants service; or, if such penalty be incurred in any out-port, where a like corporation is established, then the last moiety is to be paid to such corporation.

That if the commander of any commissioned ship shall agree with any person belonging to any prize taken, for the ransom thereof, and set such prize at liberty, he shall be deemed a pirate, and suffer death accordingly.

That all agents for prizes condemned, shall register their letters of attorney in the court of admiralty, where such prizes shall be condemned, within six months after condemnation; or, on default, shall forfeit 500l. to be recovered by any person who shall sue for the same; but agents appointed after condemnation are to register their letters of attorney within six months after the date thereof.

That all condemnations, or other determinations concerning prizes, appraisements and sales, payments of prize-money, forfeitures, &c. &c. shall be regulated by the act 16 Geo. III. ch. 5.

That the treasurer of the navy shall pay to the officers, seamen, &c. on board any of his majesty's ships, or any commissioned ships, who shall take any ships of war, &c. from the rebels 5l. from every man found on board such ships, &c.

That all prizes which shall have been taken from his majesty's subjects, not in rebellion, are to be restored to the owners, on payment of one-eighth of the value thereof as salvage.

That all offences on board commissioned ships, shall be punishable in the same manner as on board ships of war.

That this act shall continue in force until the expiration, or other sooner determination, of the aforesaid act, 16 Geo. III. c. 5.

The Method taken for preserving the Health of the Crew of his Majesty's Ship the Resolution, during her late Voyage round the World. By Captain James Cook, F.R.S. Addressed to Sir John Pringle, Bart. P. R. S.

AS many gentlemen have expressed some surprise at the uncommon good state of health, which the crew of the Resolution, under my command, experienced, during her late voyage, I take the liberty to communicate to you the methods that were taken to obtain that end. Much was owing to the extraordinary attention given by the Admiralty, in causing such articles to be put on board, as either by experience or conjecture were judged to tend most to preserve the health of seamen. I shall not trespass upon your time in mentioning all those articles, but confine myself to such as were found the most useful.

We had on board a large quantity of malt, of which was made sweet wort, and given (not only to those men who had manifest symptoms of the scurvy, but to such also as were, from circumstance, judged to be most liable to that disorder) from one to two or three pints in the day to each man, or in such proportion as the surgeon thought necessary; which sometimes amounted to three quarts in the twenty-four hours.

This is, without doubt, one of the best antiscorbutic sea-medicines yet found out; and, if given in time, will, with proper attention to other things, I am persuaded, prevent the scurvy from making any great progress for a considerable time; but I am not altogether of opinion, that it will cure it in an advanced state at sea.

Sour krout, of which we had also a large provision, is not only a wholesome vegetable food, but, in my judgment, highly antiscorbutic, and spoils not by keeping. A pound of it was served to each man, when at sea, twice a week, or oftener, when it was thought necessary.

Portable soup, or broth, was another essential article, of which we had likewise a liberal supply. An ounce of this to each man, or such other proportion as was thought necessary, was boiled with their pease three days in the week; and, when we were in places where fresh vegetables could be procured, it was boiled with them and with wheat or oatmeal, every morning, for breakfast, and also with dried pease and fresh vegetables for dinner. It enabled us to make several nourishing and wholesome messes, and was the means of making the people eat a greater quantity of greens, than they would have done otherwise.

Further, we were provided with rob of lemons and oranges ; which the surgeons found useful in several cases.

Amongst other articles of victualling, we were furnished with sugar in the room of oil, and with wheat instead of much oatmeal, and were certainly gainers by the exchange. Sugar, I imagine, is a very good antiscorbutic ; whereas oil, such at least as is usually given to the navy, I apprehend, has the contrary effect. But the introduction of the most salutary articles, either as provision or medicines, will generally prove unsuccessful, unless supported by certain rules of living.

On this principle, many years experience, together with some hints I had from Sir Hugh Palliser, the Captains Campbell, Wallis, and other intelligent officers, enabled me to lay down a plan whereby all was to be conducted. The crew were at three watches, except upon some extraordinary occasions. By this means, they were not so much exposed to the weather, as if they had been at watch and watch ; and they had generally dry cloaths to shift themselves, when they happened to get wet. Care was also taken to expose them as little as possible. Proper methods were employed to keep their persons, hammocs, bedding, cloaths, &c. constantly clean and dry. Equal pains were taken to keep the ship clean and dry between decks. Once or twice a week she was aired with fires ; and, when this could not be done, she was smoked with gunpowder, moistened with vinegar or water. I had also, frequently, a fire made in an iron pot at the bottom of the well, which greatly purified the air in the lower parts of the ship. To this and cleanliness, as well in the ship as amongst the people, too great attention cannot be paid ; the least neglect occasions a putrid, offensive smell below, which nothing but fires will remove ; and, if these be not used in time, those smells will be attended with bad consequences. Proper care was taken of the ship's coppers, so that they were kept constantly clean. The fat, which boiled out of the salt beef and pork, I never suffered to be given to the people, as is customary ; being of opinion that it promotes the scurvy. I never failed to take in water, whenever it was to be procured, even when we did not seem to want it ; because I look upon fresh water from the shore to be much more wholesome than that which has been kept some time on board. Of this essential article we were never at an allowance, but had always abundance for every necessary purpose. I am convinced, that, with plenty of fresh water, and a close attention to cleanliness, a ship's company will seldom be much afflicted with the scurvy, though they should not be provided with any of the antiscorbutics before-mentioned. We came to few places, where either the art of man or nature did not afford some sort of refreshment or other, either of the animal or vegetable kind. It was my first care to procure what could be met with of either by every means in my power, and to oblige our people to make use thereof, both by my example and authority ; but the benefits arising from such refreshments soon became so obvious, that I had little occasion to employ either the one or the other.

These, Sir, were the methods, under the care of Providence, by which the Resolution performed a voyage of three years and eighteen days, through all the climates from 52 deg. North to 71 deg. South, with the loss of one man only by disease, and who died of a complicated and lingering illness, without any mixture of scurvy. Two others were unfortunately drowned, and one killed by a fall ; so that, of the whole number with which I set out from England, I lost only four.

I intirely agree with you, that the dearth of the rob of lemons and of oranges will hinder them from being furnished in large quantities, but I do not think this so necessary ; for, though they may assist other things, I have no great opinion of them alone. Nor have I a higher opinion of vinegar : my people had it very sparingly during the late voyage ; and, towards the latter part, none at all ; and yet we experienced no ill effects from the want of it. The custom of washing the inside of the ship with vinegar I seldom observed, thinking, that fire and smoke answered the purpose much better.

I have the honour, &c.

History of the Proceeding of the present Sessions of the British Parliament. (Continued from p. 210.)

Tuesday, February 25.

THIS day an important debate was carried on for near three hours in the House of Commons, upon the most alarming and interesting subject that has come before parliament during the present session.

After the private business of the day was over, the house seemed to be for a considerable time totally unemployed ; but was in fact in that situation, which is usually called waiting for the minister. Between three and four o'clock Lord North arrived, and soon after Lord George Germaine ; and

and the house being called to order, Governor Johnstone arose and desired leave to bring up a petition which he held in his hand from Mr. Blair and Dr. Charles Irwine, owners of the ship the Morning Star, complaining of a violent outrage committed on the persons of British subjects, and on their property by two guarda costa ships of war belonging to the crown of Spain, whose commander had boarded the said Morning Star in the Black River on the Musquetto Shore, seized her, made prisoners of the crew, bound them hand and foot, and carried the said ship and crew to Carthagea, where the crew were put into prison; and all but one man, who escaped, most probably remain to this hour in irons, in dungeons at the said place. The governor observed, that as he had been given to understand, since he came into the house, that he should not be permitted to bring up the petition, for that very reason he should desire the patience of the house while he went into the merits of the complaint at large, as stated in the petition. He then remarked, that it was far from his intention to involve this country in a war with Spain, for he thought we had already enemies enough to contend with; but that at least some reparation ought to be made to the petitioners, who had embarked their whole fortune in an adventure, if not actually under the sanction, yet with the approbation of government. He stated, that Mr. Blair was not to be considered as one of those men who carry on a clandestine commerce with the natives of the Musquetto Shore, connived at by the officers of government in that part of the world, but as quite another kind of man, one whose veracity and honour might be depended on; and that the scheme on which the ship was fitted out was a laudable one, meriting encouragement, it being to extract oils from certain materials to be found there, for the benefit of our wool-combers at home; and added, that Dr. Irwine was a chymist of the first reputation. Under these circumstances the Morning Star was fitted out without having any contraband goods on board, and without any avowed pretext whatever of offence given to the Spaniards; the two guarda costas bore down upon her, at first under Dutch colours, and then shewed themselves to be Spaniards, and seized her. The petition, he said, further stated, that the petitioners being then at Kingston in Jamaica, applied to his Majesty's governor there for redress, and was told that he suspected the ship was taken by American privateers: they also applied to the admiral on the station, who at first refused to send any ship to Carthagea to enquire into the affair; and at last when he did send a frigate, refused to let Mr. Blair go in her to Carthagea to see if he could find out and make known to the captain of the frigate his own ship. That he then came over to England, and on the 25th of September last, laid his complaint before Lord George Germaine, who for a considerable time told him, he could do nothing in it till he had received further information concerning it from the governor of Jamaica; but for his part, he could not believe the insult had been offered by Spanish ships, but that his vessel had been seized by American privateers. At length, on the 17th of December, Lord George Germaine told Mr. Blair, that the matter was now no longer in his hands, but in Lord Weymouth's department, secretary of state for the southern provinces. The ministry it seems were now convinced that the injury had been done by Spaniards; and luckily for Mr. Blair, one of the crew having escaped from his dungeon at Carthagea, went to Kingston in Jamaica, and made an affidavit of all the circumstances of the capture, which plainly proves, that there could be no doubt from the beginning of the seizure of the ship, and the ill usage of the crew, being by Spanish subjects.

This deposition was contained in the petition, and Governor Johnstone read it. From the 17th of December to the present time, all the satisfaction Mr. Blair could obtain at Lord Weymouth's office, was, that no answer had yet been given by the court of Spain.

Governor Johnstone complained in severe terms of the pusillanimity of the ministry, and said, that had Lord Chatham been in power, satisfaction would have been obtained from the court of Spain in half the time; but such was the wretched state into which the present administration had plunged this country, that we were now to put up with an insult from Spain of much more consequence than the affair of Falkland's Isles; for this was a direct attack on our trade, and on the liberty and property of our countrymen, at a place not unsettled like Falkland's Islands, but where 600 families resided under an express stipulation of the 16th article of the treaty of Paris, in 1763, and on the faith of our government, which had established there a superintendant, and a legislative council. He blamed the governor of Jamaica, and the admiral on the station; said if the first had not written home a proper state of the affair as soon as possible after it happened, he ought not to be governor an hour; and concluded with the hope that parliament would go into an enquiry into the cause of the neglect or delay of obtaining satisfaction for the injured honour of the nation, and the losses of the petitioners for near twelve months since the outrage had been committed.

John Johnstone, Esq; member for Kinghorne, seconded his brother, and lamented the unhappy state to which this nation was reduced, by the violent measures pursued by administration against America, which left us open to every insult from foreign nations, and afraid to demand satisfaction, notwithstanding all the high sounding boasts of warlike preparations, and being in a state of defence, capable of repelling all other attacks; he therefore thought this petition ought to be received, and made a ground of enquiry into the conduct of administration.

Lord North in reply stated his objections to receiving the petition, and assigned the reasons why he should vote against it. His lordship observed, that government had received advice of this affair from the governor of Jamaica before Mr. Blair had made applications at Lord George Germaine's office, but the governor in his letter mentioned his having a suspicion, that the Morning Star was taken by two American privateers; this letter had been read to Mr. Blair upon his first application to the office in September, and under these circumstances government did not think proper to make any complaint to the court of Spain. Afterwards, upon receiving other letters from the governor and from the admiral, confirming the account given by Mr. Blair, that the outrage had been committed by the King of Spain's ships, Mr. Blair was informed at lord Weymouth's office, to which department the affair was now properly transferred, that application was made by letter to the earl of Grantham, his majesty's minister at the court of Spain, to lay the whole matter before the Spanish ministry, and to demand satisfaction: this was on the 17th of December; he was afterwards informed, that no answer had yet been received from the Court of Spain. I therefore think it highly improper, said his lordship, for a British House of Commons to take up this affair, in the beginning of a negotiation, and I aver that no time has been lost since government obtained intelligence from their own officer that there was proper ground to complain to the court of Spain. The honourable gentleman has no reason to complain of delay since the 17th of December; for Lord Grantham writes in January, that the Spanish minister had given for answer—"Our court has had no intelligence whatever of this transaction, but draw up a memorial, and I will immediately lay it before the king." And I will appeal to the house whether there can have been time to obtain any answer, or even to make any considerable progress in such a negotiation, considering the distance of Carthage: it is well known that negotiations of this sort have frequently taken five times the space that has elapsed. As to the establishment of a settlement, and of a legislative council on the Musquetto Shore, I do not believe there is any such council; there are straggling inhabitants spread all along the coasts, but no regular government authorized from hence; nor has it ever been considered as a part of the settlements or colonies belonging to the Crown of Great Britain.

As to our right by the treaty of Paris, I could wish, says his lordship, gentlemen would not enter into the discussion of so delicate a point at this time; it might involve us in a dispute with Spain upon the subject of right, not in the least connected with the present question.

Governor Johnstone. To explain, Sir, upon hearing what the noble lord said, that there was no legislative council at the Musquetto Shore, it struck me with astonishment. I went out to ask capt. Blair about it, and he assures me of the fact, that he actually saw them sitting upon public business, and what is more, read their instructions from the noble lord; therefore, to tell the house, that there was no such council, is the most extraordinary assertion that ever was hazarded by any minister in the British House of Commons. The noble lord has arraigned me, as if there was no reason for captain Blair's expecting the satisfaction he demanded, and that we were to wait for the slow movements of the court of Madrid;—but, Sir, what would have been the case had Christian Sund not escaped from the Spanish dungeon? What, are we to suffer every insult, that the Spaniards chuse to put upon us?—to lose whatever ships they chuse to seize, and then to be told they know nothing of it at Madrid?—and the whole to be shuffled away between the minister and the governor?—It puts me in mind of an expression of a great admiral, Sir Charles Saunders, upon the Falkland Island affair.—Madrid in ashes, was not more than a compensation for such an indignity. But, Sir, the noble lord seems to give up the Musquetto Shore;—and to esteem the trade as a matter of small consequence;—I will not debate that matter with him, sorry as I am to hear it;—but let me tell those of the house, who have no objection to good eating,—that the Musquetto Shore is the place from whence the turtle come!

come!—Think what a loss that will be!—And to the younger part of the house, I shall say, that it is from thence the farsaparilla comes!—what will you do for that?

Lord North. Upon my word, Sir, I could not have conceived, that any person could have so utterly mistaken, and misinterpreted my meaning;—but the honourable gentleman has perverted every thing I said. As to the legislative council, I adhere to what I said, that government had not established a legislative council there.—I say it now, and if there was any thing of a council, at the time the affair happened, it was a council of the superintendent's calling together, in order to remedy the defects of the government;—and for want of better authority it soon came to nothing; and I believe the fact is at present, that no such thing as a council exists.—Relative to the dates, the honourable gentleman is perfectly right; it was three months after the first complaint, to lord Weymouth's letter:—but the first complaint, Sir, has nothing to do with the case; that came at the same time with the governor of Jamaica's strong suspicion, that the ship was taken by the American privateers. In consequence of that notice, it would have been ridiculous to have stirred;—but, Sir, the moment the affidavit of Sund arrived, which was the first shadow of proof, lord Weymouth instantly wrote to the Spanish minister. To give up the Musquetto Shore, and undervalue its trade is also laid to my charge; did I say any such thing, Sir? I said, the matter of right was a point of delicacy at present to bring into negotiation;—is that giving up our right? Lord Weymouth has complained to the court of Spain; is that like giving it up? If we had no right, he would not have made that application; nor would the Spanish minister have mentioned writing to the governor of Carthagena, but have answered at once,——Your ship was trading where you had no right, and consequently you ought not to complain.

Mr. Fox. I shall make a very few observations upon the variety of matter which has been stated.—I would only remark, Sir, that the petition ought certainly to be brought up;—and you ought to receive it under the idea of the contents being true.—A member, upon any petition being presented, rising in his place, and saying, that he knows some of the allegations in it to be false, is never admitted as a reason for not allowing a petition to be brought up. This, Sir, would be to act in the same manner as the noble lord, who presides in the American department; who, upon captain Blair's first assuring him,—that the Spaniards had taken his ship, found occasion prima facie, to believe, that the Spaniards had not taken his ship: now, Sir, this is such a mode of arguing as is utterly incomprehensible: when a petition comes to the bar, we are to believe it true, till we have reason to find it false;—unless, Sir,—unless the prayer of the petition is against the authority of the house, or such as is entirely beyond the power of it. I must also remark, Sir, that the case of Mr. Blair and Dr. Irwine, is peculiarly hard indeed!—For tho' the prayer of the petition is admitted to be true, yet is he to receive no redress from Spain: and he is to receive none from this house, because if we were to pay the money, then says the noble lord, it would be giving up the right of the crown to the Musquetto Shore. So are these gentlemen, Sir, to lose all their property, evidently from the pusillanimity of government, and they have no other prospect from what has been said by the noble lord to-day.

But, Sir, there is another reason for parliament going into this business; here is a question of fact has arisen between the noble lord and the gentleman at the bar, about the existence of the legislative council; one positively denies what the other asserts; ought not therefore the house to go into it, and to elucidate this doubtful matter by an enquiry, which cannot possibly have any of those ill effects which the noble lord is apprehensive of? But let me observe upon this point, that the apprehension of Mr. Blair was like what that of all mankind must be, that a legislative council, sitting and acting at the Musquetto Shore, by the authority of the superintendent and the governor of Jamaica, was a council authorized by the government of England; this is the supposition which any man in the world would have conceived, and consistent with common sense.

Mr. Luttrell. Sir, it appears to me that nothing could have been more unfortunate than the gallery of this house being open to strangers, for the first time, when such an affair was under consideration; for if there should be persons there, who should do what the gentlemen of this side the house have been falsely charged with, send intelligence to France and Spain, how must the enemies of this country triumph, to hear that the minister of it speaks of the trade of the Musquetto as of slight value, and even the right of the crown to it to be represented as dubious, and what ought not even to be examined into by this house. It is not, Sir, that I object to their being in that gallery; I am on the contrary one of those who think they ought always to be there upon the clearest principles of the constitution. And relative to the question before us, I shall not enter into a diffusive enquiry of the circumstances which have arisen before us, but I shall remark, that to avoid the house enquiring into it, lest our right should be questioned and discussed by the court of Spain, is to conduct ourselves upon the very poorest principles of policy that ever led a nation astray. Sir, doubtful points of this sort can never be cleared up too soon; and as to the waiting with a patience equal to the repeated delays of such a court as Madrid,—injuries should ever be redressed speedily, and vigorously; for to shrink from the satisfaction which ought to be demanded for small injuries, is the sure way to bring great ones upon us. All history is the proof of this; for these reasons I am clearly for the petition being brought up.

Lord George Germaine. I think, Mr. Speaker, that nothing can be clearer, than the whole of this business; indeed it is so clear, that I should not rise upon the occasion, were it not from the situation I am in, in office, enabling me to satisfy the house as to what happened thro' me, that is, from the 25th of September to the 15th of December;—the honourable gentleman at the bar is very right in his dates;—on the 25th of September, the complaint was lodged by captain Blair, in my hands; but it did not come till after I had received a dispatch from the governor of Jamaica; in which he informed me of several reasons he had for believing that attributing the capture to the Spaniards was a great mistake, and that it was probably taken by the American privateers. The complaint, and this information coming together, what was I to do? I am in the judgment of the house, if I could take any step in the matter, till it was proved more satisfactory, in opposition to the suspicions of the governor of Jamaica. On the 15th of December, the affidavit of Sund was put into my hands; then, Sir, the case was altered, and as it appeared from thence to be taken by the Spaniards, and complaint of course to be lodged, it went of course to Lord Weymouth's office;—this is all I know of the matter in my office; and how the honourable gentleman at the bar, or any one else could condemn me for any share I had in the transaction, I must own I cannot understand. Much has been said about the noble lord's undervaluing the trade of the Musquetto Shore, and sacrificing the national right to the Spaniards:—How has he done this?—If we can quietly enjoy a trade, without examination and dispute; —is it to undervalue it, to say that we had better not go into the inquiry of right? But the right has been urged, and acquiesced in;—the very complaint to the court of Madrid is a contention for the right,—and Spain allows it, for if we had no rights there, the ship had no business there, and the capture was just; but the Spanish minister gave no such answer, nor founded any such conclusion.

Sir Edward Astley replied particularly to that part of Lord North's speech, wherein he mentioned, that the message of the governor of Jamaica was civil. He said, he feared we were too civil to the Spaniards; that knowing the criticalness of our situation, respecting the war in America, we dread a war with Spain,—and if so, there could be no doubt but we should have insults in plenty.

Lord North. It is not my custom, so much as it is that of some other gentlemen, to address themselves to the gallery; indeed not having my glass with me, I did not see that there were any persons there; however, Sir, lest what the honourable gentleman (Mr. Luttrell) has advanced should be taken for my sentiments, by any gentleman that may have come in since I spoke before, I shall repeat, that I never said a word that intimated the sinking or doubting our right to the Musquetto Shore,—nor which could allow any person to say that I undervalued the trade of it. What I said was this, Sir, that it was at present a delicate circumstance, to enter into an unnecessary dispute with Spain, about rights, which were never clearly ascertained, and when no good could result from such an explanation. Is this to give up our rights, or undervalue the trade? By no means. I am confident no minister dreams of giving up either one or the other. As to the civility of the governor of Jamaica's message, I can assure the honourable gentleman it was not only civil, but had all the manly firmness in it, which became the representative of the King of Great Britain;—there is a politeness in all public dispatches, but nothing more than that was the civility I alluded to. The Spanish governor's answer was civil also—but by no means what it has been misrepresented into;—it said, that he the governor had not authority sufficient to restore the ship, that it must be settled by higher powers; but would represent it to his court.—The honourable gentleman (Mr. Luttrell) hinted something about my not knowing perhaps that there was such a country in the world as the Musquetto Shore; I own, Sir, that I am not a very great geographer, but in that I am not singular, for I have heard of some curious geographical geographical knowledge in this house, about towns whether in Russia or the Baltic*.

Mr. Thomas Townshend.—Whether the noble lord may be a good geographer relative to the situation of the Moschetto shore, I will not dispute, but I am sure he is a very bad politician as to the government of it;—for a more confused account was never given in distinctions of who appointed the legislative council, as if it was of sipping consequence to the sufferers, whether it was Lord Dartmouth, the governor of Jamaica, or the superintendent. —These are matters of small moment to us;—but, Sir, it is a matter of humanity to every one of us, to wish that the poor wretches in a Spanish dungeon in the West Indies, should have their liberty as soon as possible;—their situation is the most cruel in the world, as we have long been taught to know; if indeed any of them at present survive their horrid confinement. —Another thing, which is still more melancholy, is the little attention to this business, which is given by a British House of Commons. Good God, Sir, to what is this country come? That such an affair should come before such empty benches! —This is indeed a melancholy consideration, and which affects the kingdom, in a more intimate manner than I shall mention at present. The noble lord, supposing his argument respecting time is just,—still gives Captain Blair very fine hope indeed, to tell him, that five months are not only too short a time to do any thing in it, but five times five months, the same. A pretty situation, therefore, his is, and much comfort, therefore, he has to expect from this application.

Mr. Herbert.—Sir, it appears to me, that no question can have wandered farther from the point, than this has done. We have nothing to do with the value of the Muschetto trade;—nor is the nature of the right we claim to in that country, at all an object in the present enquiry.—Let me, therefore, bring back the debate to the real question, which is simply whether the petition should be brought up or

N O T E.

* What his lordship alluded to, was the examination of Mr. Brook Watson, in 1775, upon the prohibitory bill, who was asked,

Q. Are Christianstadt and Archangel in the Baltic?

A. No.

Q. Is Christianstadt in Russia, or Denmark?

A. In Denmark.—From this we may suppose it was Mr. Luttrell, who put these curious questions.

not? For what purpose is it contended, that it ought? Solely as an appeal from the public offices to this house, under pretence, that such delays have been used in the former, as call for the attention of the latter. Now, Sir, if it is proved, that no other than absolutely necessary delays have been used, then there is an end of the argument for bringing it up. This appears to me clear as demonstration itself.—For to hear any man tell us, that from December 17th to this time, there has been time to send to Spain; to have an answer;—for Spain to send to Carthage, and to have an answer:—and for the report to come to England, is so flat an absurdity, that it deserves not a moment's attention;—and to bring the petition into the house at all, appears to me very extraordinary. I am therefore, Sir, entirely against its being brought up, being convinced that every thing that could be done, has been done by administration;—and that nothing else yet, ought to be done.

Resolved, that the petition be not brought up.

The Life of Father Courayer.

FATHER Courayer was once a canon of St. Genevieve, who came over to England, and wrote a defence of the English ordinations in the French language, maintaining the succession of the English episcopacy against all the objections from the church of Rome. His book made a great noise at the time; it is now in the hands of many curious people, and has never been refuted.

He was born at Rouen in the year 1681. When he was a canon regular and librarian at the church of St. Genevieve, he applied to archbishop Wake for the resolution of some doubts, concerning the episcopal succession in England, and the validity of our ordinations; being encouraged thereto by the friendly correspondence which had passed between the archbishop and the late Dr. Du Pin of the Sorbonne. The archbishop sent him exact copies of the proper records, attested by a notary public; and on these he built his defence of the English ordinations, which was published in Holland in the year 1727. For this book the university of Oxford gave him a doctor's degree; and, I am informed, there is a Latin speech, preserved at Oxford, which he either sent or spoke, in return for the honour conferred upon him. The original papers, which the archbishop sent over to Courayer, together with several letters which passed concerning the terms of a projected reconciliation between the churches of France and England, are extant in private hands, and some of them are published in the Biographia Britannica.

The cardinal De Noailles being highly offended with the book, the marshal De Noailles, his brother, endeavoured to pacify him and restore Courayer to his favour; but without success. While the danger of a prosecution, or rather a persecution, was depending, it was thought most advisable that he should take refuge in England; but he was in so little haste on this occasion, that he made a slow journey to Calais in a stage coach, and was detained there some time by a contrary wind, so that he might easily have been apprehended. However, he got safe to England, where he was well received: but he complained to archbishop Wake, that it was a bad country for a religious man to reside in, on account of the unhappy difference in religion, by which mutual charity is destroyed: and the liberty which many take of blaspheming against the doctrines of Christianity, and corrupting the minds of the people. The marquis of Blandford soon made him a present of fifty pounds by the hands of Nicholas Mann, Esq; who was afterwards master of the Charter-house. With some difficulty he obtained a pension of one hundred pounds a year from the court; and having translated father Paul's History of the Council of Trent into French, he dedicated it to queen Caroline, who increased his pension to two hundred pounds; and, by the sale of the work, he raised fifteen hundred pounds. He gave sixteen hundred pounds to lord Feverham, for an annuity of one hundred pounds per annum, which he enjoyed for fifty years. Thus he rose, by degrees, to very easy circumstances, which were made still more so by the reception which his agreeable and edifying conversation procured him among great people, with many of whom it was his custom to live for several months at a time. He was occasionally generous to some of his relations in France. He had two sisters who were nuns; and to this day has a brother living at Paris in the profession of the law, to whom he gave a handsome gold snuff-box, which had been presented to him by queen Caroline. His works were many, and all in French. He translated Sleidan's History of the Reformation; and wrote a second defence in support of his first, against the arguments of the Jesuits, father Hardouin, cardinal Tencin, &c. In discoursing about religious subjects, he was reserved and cautious, avoiding controversy as much as possible. He never had any good opinion of Bower, who came over hither to write his History of the Popes; he accused him of pretending to collect from books which he had never seen; and said he was a dark mysterious man, of a very suspicious character. He was taken ill on Tuesday the 15th day of October, and died on the Thursday following; sinking naturally under the burden of his years, which were beyond the common age of man. He declares in his will that he dies a catholic, but not according to all the modern doctrines of the church of Rome. Soon after his retirement to England he went to a priest of the Romish church, for confession, and told him who he was. The priest dared not take his confession, because he was excommunicated; but advised him to consult his superior of St. Genevieve. What was the issue of this application, we know not; but it is certain that, when in London, he made it his practice to go to mass; and when in the country at Ealing, he constantly attended the service of the parish church, declaring, at all times, that he had great satisfaction in the prayers of the church of England. The Jesuits were his worst enemies; yet when that order was suppressed, his great humanity lamented the fate of many poor men, who were thrown out of their bread, and cast, in a helpless state, upon the wide world. At his own desire he was buried in the cloyster of Westminster abbey, by Dr. Bell, chaplain to the princess Amelia. He left 500*l.* to St. Martin's parish, and 200*l.* to the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in which he died; with many other private legacies to his friends in England.

Anecdote.

FORTY or fifty years ago, when the actors gave out a new play, it was customary for them to say, "Containing the tragical end of such a one, the comical adventures, the memorable battle, &c."

Tom Walker, who originally played Macheath, was giving out a play, on a Saturday night, for Mrs. Bicknell's benefit, when he said, "Gentlemen and Ladies, to-morrow evening will be performed" "To-morrow! (said a gentleman in the pit) to-morrow will be Sunday."—Walker was extremely confused; but recovering himself, made a second bow, and proceeded as follows: "Ladies and Gentlemen, on Monday next will be performed, the historical play of King Henry the Eighth; containing the divorce of Anna Bullen, the marriage of the Princess Catherine, and the death of Mrs. Bicknell—for the benefit of Cardinal Wolsey."

The Life of Edward Boscawen.

BOSCAWEN (Edward) an admiral of distinguished valour and capacity, was the second surviving son of Hugh, late lord viscount Falmouth, and having early entered into the navy, was, in 1740, appointed captain of the Shoreham, and behaved with great intrepidity as a volunteer, under admiral Vernon, at the taking of Porto-Bello. At the siege of Carthagea, in March 1740-1, he had the command of a party of seamen, who resolutely attacked and took a battery of fifteen twenty-four pounders, though expoited to the fire of another fort of five guns. Lord Aubrey Beauchamp being killed on the 24th of March, at the attack of Boca-Chica, captain Boscawen succeeded him in the command of the Prince Frederick, of seventy guns. On the 14th of May, 1742, he returned to England, and married Frances, daughter of William Glanville, Esq; and the same year was elected a representative in parliament for Truro, in Cornwall. In 1744 he was made captain of the Dreadnought, of 60 guns, and soon after took the Medea, a French man of war, commanded by M. Hoquart. On the 3d of May, 1747, he signalized himself under the admirals Anson and Warren, in an engagement with the French fleet, off Cape Finisterre, and was wounded in the shoulder with a mulquet ball. Here M. Hoquart, who then commanded the Diamant of fifty-six guns, again became his prisoner, and all the French ships of war, which were ten in number, were taken. On the 15th of July he was appointed rear-admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of the land and sea forces, employed on an expedition to the East Indies; and, on the 4th of November, sailed from St. Helen's, with six ships of the line, five frigates, and two thousand soldiers. On the 29th of July, 1748, he arrived at Fort St. David's, and soon after laid siege to Pondicherry; but the men growing sickly, and the monsoons being expected, the siege was raised. Soon after he had news of the peace, and Madras was delivered up to him by the French.

In April, 1750, he arrived at St. Helen's in the Exeter, where he was informed that in his absence he had been appointed rear-admiral of the white. He was in 1751 made one of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and chosen an elder brother of the Trinity-house. On the 4th of February, 1755, he was appointed vice-admiral of the blue, and on the 19th of April, sailing in order to intercept a French squadron bound to North-America, fell in with the Alcide and Lys, of sixty-four guns each, which were both taken; on this occasion M. Hoquart became his prisoner a third time, and he returned to Spithead with his prizes and 1500 prisoners. In 1756 he was appointed vice-admiral of the white, and, in 1758, admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of the expedition to Cape Breton, when, in conjunction with general Amherst, and a body of brave troops from New-England, he took the important fortress of Louisbourg, and the whole island of Cape Breton; for which he afterwards received the thanks of the house of commons. In 1759, being appointed to command in the Mediterranean; he arrived at Gibraltar, where hearing that the Toulon fleet, under M. de la Clue, had passed the Streights, in order to join that at Brest, he got under sail, and on the 18th of August saw, pursued, and engaged the enemy. His ship, the Namur, of ninety guns, losing her main-mast, he shifted his flag to the Newark, and, after a smart engagement, took three large ships, and burnt two, and the same year arrived at Spithead with his prizes, and two thousand prisoners. On the 8th of December, 1760, he was appointed general of the marines, with a salary of 3000*l.* per annum, and was also sworn one of the privy council. This brave admiral died at his seat at Hatchland Park, near Guildford, in Surry, of a bilious fever, on the 10th of June, 1761.

The Life of Archbishop Boulter.

Boulter (Hugh) archbishop of Armagh, primate and metropolitan of all Ireland, was born in or near London, and was a person as much distinguished by his learning, his virtue, his humanity, and natural endowments, as by his high station. He was educated at Merchant-Taylor's school, and at Christ-church college, Oxford, and afterwards at Magdalen college. In 1700, he was appointed chaplain to Sir Charles Hedges, principal secretary of state; and by the interest of the earl of Sunderland, he was soon after preferred to the parsonage of St. Olave, Southwark, and the archdeaconry of Surry. In 1719, he was recommended to attend king George I. to Hanover, as his chaplain; and was soon after promoted to the deanery of Christ-church, and the bishopric of Bristol. In this station he was extremely assiduous in the discharge of his pastoral duty; and while he was thus employed in one of his visitations, he received a letter from the secretary of state acquainting him that his majesty had nominated him to the archbishopric of Armagh.

On his arrival in Ireland, in 1724, he immediately set about studying the real and solid interest of that kingdom. In innumerable instances, he exerted himself in the noblest acts of beneficence: in seasons of the greatest scarcity, he was more than once instrumental in preventing a famine which threatened that nation. On one of these occasions, he distributed vast quantities of corn throughout the kingdom, for which the house of commons passed a vote of public thanks; and at another time 2500 persons were fed at the poor-house, in Dublin, every morning and evening, for a considerable time together, mostly at the primate's expense. When schemes were proposed for the advantage of the country, he encouraged and promoted them not only with his counsel but with his pulse. He had great compassion for the poor clergy of his diocese, who were disabled from giving their children a proper education; and he maintained several of the children of such in the university; he erected four houses at Drogheda, for the reception of clergymen's widows, and purchased an estate for the endowment of them. His charities for the augmenting small livings and buying glebes amounted to upwards of 30,000*l.* besides what he devised by will for the like purposes in England. In short, the instances he gave of his generosity and benevolence of heart, his virtue, his piety, and his wisdom, are almost innumerable. This excellent prelate died at London, in the year 1742, and was interred in Westminster-abbey, where a beautiful monument of finely polished marble is erected to his memory.

The Life of Mark Alexander Boyd.

Boyd, or Boyd, (Mark Alexander) an excellent Scottish poet, was born in Galloway, on the 13th of January, 1564, and came into the world with teeth. He learned the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages at Glasgow, under the two grammarians; but was of so high and intractable a spirit, that they despaired of ever making him a scholar. Having quarrelled with his masters, he beat them both, burnt his books, and forsook learning. While he was yet a youth, he followed the court, and did his utmost to push his interest there; but the fervor of his temper soon precipitated him into quarrels, from which he came off with honour and safety, tho' frequently at the hazard of his life. He, with the approbation of his friends, went to serve in the French army, and carried his little patrimony with him, which he soon dissipated at play. He was shortly after roused by that emulation which is natural to great minds, and applied himself to letters with unremitting ardour, till he became one of the most consummate scholars of the age. The Greek and Latin were as familiar to him as his mother tongue. He could readily dictate to three scribes in as many different languages and subjects. He had an easy and happy vein of poetry, wrote elegies in the Ovidian manner, and his hymns were thought to be superior to those of any other Latin poet*. He wrote a great number of other poems in the same language, and translated Cæsar's Commentaries into Greek, in the style of Herodotus; this translation was never printed. His other manuscripts on philological, political, and historical subjects, in Latin and French, are enumerated by Sir Robert Sibbald, in his Predromus Historiæ Naturalis Scotiæ, who tells us that he was the best Scottish poet of his age. He was tall, compact, and well-proportioned in his person; his countenance was beautiful, sprightly, and engaging; he had a noble

* Olaus Borrichius, a very eminent and judicious critic, at p. 150 of his Dissertationes Academicæ de Pœtis, speaking of Boyd, says, "In Marco Alexandro Bodio, Scoto, redivivum spectamus Nationem; ea est in ejusdem Epithetis Heroidum, lux; candor, dexteritas." He speaks as highly of his Hymns in heroic verse.

air; and appeared to be the accomplished soldier among men of the sword, and as eminently the scholar among those of the gown. He died at Pinkhill, his father's seat, in April, 1601, at the age of thirty-nine. Granger's Biographical History of England, Vol. I.

The Life of Richard Boyle.

Boyle (Richard) one of the greatest statesmen of the last century, and generally styled the Great Earl of Cork, was the youngest son of Mr. Roger Boyle, and was born at Canterbury, on the 3d of October, 1566. He studied at Bennet college, Cambridge, and afterwards became a student in the Middle Temple. Having lost his father and mother, and being unable to support himself in the prosecution of his studies, he became clerk to Sir Roger Manwood, chief baron of the exchequer; but finding that by this employment he could not raise his fortune, he went to Ireland in 1588. He was then about two and twenty, had a graceful person, and many accomplishments, which enabled him to render himself useful to some of the principal persons employed in the government, by drawing up for them memorials, cases, and answers. In 1595, he married Joan, the daughter and coheir of William Anslcy; and she dying in labour of her first child (who was born dead) in 1599, left him an estate of 500*l.* a year in land. Some time after, Sir Henry Wallop, and several other persons of rank, envying him on account of the purchases he had made in the province of Connaught, represented him to queen Elizabeth as being in the pay of the king of Spain, who, they pretended, had furnished him with money. Soon afterwards the rebellion broke out in Ireland, and the earl of Essex being nominated lord deputy of that kingdom, Mr. Boyle, who was then at London, was recommended to his lordship; but Sir Henry Wallop, treasurer of Ireland, knowing that Mr. Boyle had several papers in his custody that could detect his fallacious manner of passing his accounts, resolved to crush him, and renewed his former complaints against him to the queen; upon which he was suddenly taken up and committed close prisoner to the Gatehouse, and all his papers seized. At length, with much difficulty, he obtained the favour of the queen to be present at his examination; and having fully answered what was alleged against him, he gave a short account of his own behaviour since his first settling in Ireland, and concluded with laying open to the queen and her council the conduct of his chief enemy, Sir Henry Wallop, with such force that her Majesty declared him innocent, stripped Sir Henry of his post of treasurer, and gave Mr. Boyle her hand to kiss before the whole assembly. A few days after, she constituted him clerk of the council of Munster, and recommended him to Sir George Carew, lord president of that province, who sent him to the queen with the news of the victory gained, on the 24th of December, 1601, near Kinsale, over the Irish and their Spanish auxiliaries.

Upon his return to Ireland, he assisted at the siege of Bearhaven castle, which was taken by storm, and the garrison put to the sword. He soon

soon after received the honour of knighthood. He now rose with great rapidity to the highest offices, and even to the dignity of the peerage in Ireland, to which he was raised by king James I. on the 29th of September, 1616, by the style and title of baron of Youghall, in the county of Cork; four years after, he was created viscount Dungarvon, and earl of Cork; and, in 1631, was constituted lord treasurer of Ireland, an honour that was made hereditary to his family. He distinguished himself by the noble stand he made, when the fatal rebellion broke out in that kingdom, in the reign of Charles I. and in his old age acted with as much bravery and military skill, as if he had been trained from his infancy to the profession of arms. He turned the castle of Lismore, his capital seat, into a fortress capable of demanding respect from the Irish. He immediately armed and disciplined his servants and protestant tenants, and by their assistance, and a small army raised and maintained at his own expence, defended the province of Munster, and in the space of a year took several strong castles. This great man died on the 15th of September, 1643.

The Life of Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery.

Boyle (Roger) first earl of Orrery, was the fifth son of Richard, styled the Great Earl of Cork. He was born April 25, 1621, and raised to the dignity of baron Broghill, when only seven years old. He was educated at the college of Dublin, where he soon distinguished himself as an early and promising genius. He afterwards made the tour of France and Italy, and at his return assisted his father in opposing the Irish rebellion, in which he behaved with all the spirit of a young, and the discretion of an old officer. After the cessation of the Irish rebellion, he paid his duty to the king at Oxford, and returned to Ireland, by his majesty's orders, to perform some important services there, where he continued to act till the murder of the king, when he left his country, and retiring to Mariton in Somersetshire, concealed himself in the privacy of a close retirement; but being at length ashamed to sit the tame spectator of all the mischief that appeared around him, he resolved, under the pretence of going to the Spa, for the recovery of his health, to cross the seas, and apply to king Charles II. for a commission to raise forces in Ireland, in order to restore his majesty, and to recover his own estate. To this purpose, he prevailed, on the earl of Warwick to procure a licence for his going to the Spa, and having raised a considerable sum of money, came up to London to prosecute his voyage; but he had not been long in town when he received a message from Cromwell, who was then general of the parliament's forces, that he intended to wait upon him. The lord Broghill was surprised at this message, having never had the least acquaintance with Cromwell, and desired the gentleman to let the general know, that he would wait upon his excellency; but while he was waiting the return of the messenger, Cromwell entered the room, and after mutual civilities, told him in few words, that the committee of state were apprized of his design of going over and applying to Charles Stuart for a commission to raise forces in Ireland, and that they were determined to make an example of him, if he himself had not diverted them from that resolution. The lord Broghill interrupted him, by assuring him that the intelligence which the committee had received was false, and that he neither was in a capacity, nor had any inclination, to raise disturbances in Ireland; but Cromwell, instead of making any reply, drew some papers out of his pocket, which were the copies of several letters that lord Broghill had sent to those persons in whom he most confided, and put them into his hands. The lord Broghill, upon the perusal of these papers, finding it to no purpose to dissemble any longer, asked his excellency's pardon for what he had said, returned him his humble thanks for his protection against the committee, and intreated his advice how to behave in so critical a conjuncture. Cromwell told him, that though till this time he had been a stranger to his person, he was not so to his merit and character; for that he had heard how gallantly his lordship behaved in the Irish wars, and therefore, since he was named lord lieutenant of Ireland, and the reduction of that kingdom was become his province, he had obtained leave of the committee to offer his lordship the command of a general officer, if he would serve in that war; that he should have no oaths or engagements imposed upon him, nor be obliged to draw his sword against any but the Irish rebels.

The lord Broghill was infinitely surprised at so generous and unexpected an offer; he saw himself at liberty, by all the rules of honour, to serve against the Irish, whose rebellion and barbarities were equally detested by the royal party and the parliament: he desired, however some time to consider of what had been proposed to him; but Cromwell briskly told him, that he must come to some resolution that very instant; that he himself was returning to the committee, who were still sitting, and if his lordship refused their offer, they had determined to send him to the Tower; whereupon the lord Broghill, finding that his liberty and life were in the utmost danger, and charmed with the frankness and generosity of Cromwell's behaviour, gave him his word and honour that he would faithfully serve him against the Irish rebels; upon which Cromwell assured him, that the conditions which he had made with him should be punctually observed; and then ordered him to repair immediately to Bristol, adding, that he himself would soon follow him into Ireland. Lord Broghill, therefore, having settled the business of his command, went over into that country, where, by his conduct and intrepidity, he performed many important services, and fully justified the opinion Cromwell had conceived of him.

He was fruitful in the most ingenious artifices; an instance of which we cannot forbear mentioning. At the siege of the castle of Carrigrohilly, he informed the garrison, that if they did not surrender before his heavy artillery came up, he would shew them no mercy. As this his own army were greatly astonished, as they knew he had not a single piece of battering cannon; but his lordship ordering several large trees to be cut, and drawn at a distance by his baggage-horser, the besieged, judging by the slowness of their motion that they were cannon of a vast size, capitulated. He afterwards defeated an army of three times the strength of his own, by repeating, in the heat of the action, in conjunction with those about him, They run! they run! He had a principal hand in the Restoration, and was by Charles II. advanced to the dignity of earl of Orrery, on the 5th of September, 1660. His lordship died on the 16th of October, 1679, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, greatly regretted by all ranks of people.

The earl of Orrery was a man of parts and learning, a good soldier, and an able statesman, and remarkable for his presence of mind, which enabled him to extricate himself with extraordinary dexterity from the greatest difficulties. His courage and generosity were eminent; he was an affectionate husband, a tender father, and a kind master. He was extremely liberal to men of merit in distress, and very charitable to the poor, for the benefit of whom he erected several schools and alms-houses. His wit, his knowledge of the world, and his learning, rendered his conversation highly entertaining and instructive. He was the author of several pieces; but his literary productions have not added much to his reputation, though they have been much commended by some writers. His works are, 1. A Treatise on the Art of War. 2. Parthenissa, a Romance. 3. The History of Henry V. a Tragedy. 4. Mithras, a Tragedy. 5. The Black Prince, a Tragedy. 6. Tryphon, a Tragedy. 7. Mr. Anthony, a Comedy. 8. Guzman, a Comedy. 9. Herod the Great, a Tragedy. 10. Alembica, a Tragedy. 11. State-Letters. 12. Several Poems, and other small Pieces.

The Life of Robert Boyle.

Boyle, (Robert) the celebrated philosopher, was the seventh son of Richard, earl of Cork, and was born at Lismore, in the province of Munster, on the 25th of January, 1626. While he continued at home, he was taught to write a very fair hand, and to speak French and Latin, by one of his father's chaplains, and a Frenchman whom the earl kept in the house. In 1635, he was sent over to England, in order to be educated at Eton school. Here he soon discovered a force of understanding, which procured great things, and a disposition to cultivate and improve it to the utmost. He continued at Eton near four years; after which, he was removed to his father's seat at Salsbridge, in Dorsetshire. In the autumn of 1638, he attended his father to London, and remained with him at the Savoy, till his brother Mr. Francis Boyle elapsed Mrs. Elizabeth Kellgren; and about four days after the marriage, the two brothers, Francis and Robert, were sent abroad upon their travels, under the care of Mr. Marcombes, a Frenchman. They embarked at Rye in Sussex, and from thence proceeded to Dieppe in Normandy; then they travelled by land to Rouen, and from thence to Paris. After which they repaired to Lyons; from which city they continued their journey to Geneva, where their governor had a family; and there the two gentlemen pursued their studies without interruption. Mr. Boyle, during his stay here, resumed his acquaintance with the mathematics, or at least with the elements of that science, of which he had before gained some knowledge. In September, 1641, he quitted Geneva; and passing through Switzerland and the country of the Grisons, entered Lombardy. Then taking his route through Bergamo, Brescia, and Verona, he arrived at Venice; where having made a short stay, he returned through Padua, and from thence to Florence, where he passed the winter. Here he employed his spare hours in acquiring the Italian language, which he at length understood perfectly, though he never spoke it so fluently as he did the French. About the end of March, 1642, he began his journey from Florence to Rome, which took up but five days. And he tells us himself, that, "the more conveniently to see the numerous rarities of this universal city, and to decline the distracting intrusions and importunities of English Jesuits, he passed for a Frenchman, which neither his habit nor language much contradicted. Under this notion he delightfully paid his visits to what in Rome and the adjacent villages most deserved them; and amongst other curiosities and antiquities, had the fortune to see the Pope at chapel, with the cardinals, who severally appearing mighty princes, in that assembly looked like a company of common friars. Here he could not chuse but smile to see a young churchman, after the service ended, upon his knees carefully with his hands sweep into his handkerchief the dust, his holiness's gouty feet had by treading on it consecrated, as if it had been some miraculous relic."

Mr. Boyle returned from Rome to Florence, from whence he went to Leghorn, and so by sea to Genoa. Then passing through the county of Nice, he crossed the sea to Antibes, where he fell into some danger for refusing to honour the crucifix; from thence he went to Marseilles by land. He was in that city, in May, 1642, with his brother, when they received letters from their father, containing a melancholy account of the general rebellion in Ireland, and acquainting them, that it was with great difficulty he had procured for them 250l. to supply their expences in their way home. But this money being entrusted with one Perkins, a citizen of London, to be sent them in bills of exchange, he proved unfaithful, so that they never received the least part of it. Being thus left destitute in a strange country, they were by means of Mr. Marcombes their governor, brought to Geneva, till supplies could be received to enable them to return home. They continued at Geneva a considerable time, without either advices or supplies from England; upon which Mr. Marcombes was obliged to take up some jewels on his own credit, which were afterwards disposed of with as little loss as could be; and with the money thus raised, they continued their journey to England, where they arrived in 1644. On his arrival Mr. Boyle found his father dead; and though the earl had made an ample provision for him, as well by leaving him the manor of Stalbridge in England, as other considerable estates in Ireland, yet it was some time before he could receive any of the money.

In March, 1646, he retired to the manor of Stalbridge, where he now chiefly resided, in a kind of learned retirement. But the course of his studies was interrupted for some time in the summer of the year 1647, by a severe fit of the stone, to which distemper he was extremely subject. However, in September following, he went to Brilltol and Salisbury; and in February, 1647-8, made a voyage to Holland, from whence he soon after returned to England. During his retirement at Stalbridge, he applied himself with incredible industry to studies of various kinds, but more particularly to natural philosophy and chemistry. He omitted no opportunity of obtaining the acquaintance of persons distinguished for parts and learning, to whom he was in every respect a ready, useful, generous assistant, and with whom he held a constant correspondence. He was also one of the first members of that small, but learned body of men, who, when all academical studies were interrupted by the civil wars, secreted themselves about the year 1645; and held private meetings, first in London, afterwards at Oxford, for the sake of canvassing subjects of natural knowledge. They styled themselves then "The Philosophical College;" and, after the Restoration, when they were incorporated and distinguished openly, took the name of "the Royal Society." In 1652, Mr. Boyle went over to Ireland, in order to visit and settle his estates in that kingdom; and returned from thence in August, 1653. In 1654 he went to reside at Oxford, in order to prosecute his studies with the greater advantage, and continued there for the most part till April 1668, when he settled at London in the house of his sister, Lady Ranelagh, in Pall-Mall. It was during his residence at Oxford, that he invented that admirable engine, the Air-Pump, which was perfected for him, in 1658, or 1659, by the ingenious Mr. Robert Hook. In 1660, Mr. Boyle published in 8vo. "New Experiments physico-mechanical, touching the spring of the air and its effects, made for the most part in a new pneumatical engine." The same year he published his "Seraphic Love; or, some motives and incentives to the love of GOD, pathetically discoursed of in a letter to a friend." This work has passed through many editions, and been translated into Latin. It appears that the fame of Mr. Boyle's great learning and abilities had now extended itself beyond the limits of our island; for on the 10th of October, 1660, Mr. Robert Southwell, envoy from king Charles II. to the king of Portugal, wrote to him from Florence, to inform him, that the Grand Duke of Tuscany was extremely desirous of a correspondence with him, that Prince being not only a pattern of learning, but also a great master of it himself.

Mr. Boyle was for many years a director of the East India Company, and very useful in this capacity to that great body, more especially in procuring their charter; and the only return he expected for his labour, was, the engaging the company to come to some resolution in favour of the propagation of the gospel, by means of their factories in that part of the world. As a proof of his own inclination to contribute, as far as lay in his power, to that end, he was at the expence of printing at Oxford, in 1677, five hundred copies of the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, in the Malayan tongue, under the direction of Dr. Thomas Hyde, keeper of the Bodleian library. These were sent abroad at Mr. Boyle's expence; and it was the same pious motives which induced him to send, about three years before, several copies of Grotius de Veritate Christianæ Religionis, translated into Arabic by Dr. Edward Pococke, into the Levant, as a means of propagating Christianity there.

About the entrance of the summer of the year 1691, Mr. Boyle began to feel such an alteration in his health, as induced him to think of settling his affairs; and accordingly, on the 18th of July, he signed and sealed his last will, to which he afterwards added several codicils. In October, his distempers encreased, which might perhaps be owing to his concern for the tedious illness of his sister the Lady Ranelagh, with whom he had lived many years in the greatest harmony and friendship, and whose indisposition brought her to the grave on the 23d of December following. He survived her but a few days; for he died on the 30th of December, 1691, in the 65th year of his age. He was interred, on the 7th of January following, in St. Martin's church in the Fields, Westminster.

Robert Boyle was not only one of the greatest philosophers, but, what is more, one of the best men, that this or any other country, has produced. He was not more distinguished for his extensive knowledge, and for the uncommon sagacity of his philosophical researches, than for the exemplary and uniform virtue of his life, and his steady, fervid, and rational piety. He was at once a pattern and an ornament to the age in which he lived, and may be truly said to have done honour to humanity. Dr. Shaw observes, "that there is no profession or condition of men, but may be benefited by the discoveries of Mr. Boyle. As he had a wonderful comprehensive genius himself, he has improved every part of natural knowledge; and the world is more obliged to this single man, than to a thousand vulgar philosophers taken together." 'Tis certain, that he laid the foundations of almost all the improvements which have been made since his time in natural philosophy, and actually himself performed abundance of those very things, and perhaps in a much better manner too, whereby several famous men have gained a reputation in putting them off for their own discoveries. A very fine collection of useful knowledge, published as the works of a foreign society, bears a remarkable testimony to this truth. The Mechanic, the Merchant, the Scholar, the Gentleman, are all benefited by Mr. Boyle. He shews us trades in a new light, and makes them, what they really are, a part of Natural Philosophy; and considering them accordingly, reveals some of their mysteries, all along advancing proper means to encourage, promote, promote, and multiply the arts themselves. The Goldsmith, the Lapidary, the Jeweller, the Refiner, the Stone-cutter, the Dyer, the Glass-maker, artizans of all kinds, will from him receive the best information; as to the working, managing, and employing to advantage their various commodities, materials, engines, and instruments. The Husbandman and the Diver are here instructed in their arts; and the Mineralist, the Miner, and Aflayer; to find and separate their ore to its greatest profit; to increase the quantity, to meliorate, improve, and enrich their metals; to purify and find them, and accurately to distinguish the genuine and pure from the adulterate, base, or counterfeit. The Architect and Builder are shewn how to choose the best materials for their several purposes; the Painter to make, to mix, and improve his colours; and no part of mankind is neglected by Mr. Boyle. But he shews a more particular regard to those professions, wherein the health of the species is nearly concerned. The Physician, the Anatomist, the Apothecary, and the Chymist, are most highly obliged to him. He has considered and improved the art of medicine in all its branches. We owe to him the best ways we have of distinguishing genuine drugs from adulterate; the discovery and preparation of several valuable medicines; with the manner of applying abundance to good advantage. He has shewn us the way wherein specifics may act, how to judge of the wholesome-ness and the unwholesomeness of the air, of water, and of places; and how to examine and make choice of mineral springs. In a word, there is scarce an art or natural production known, but he makes some useful discovery or improvement in it."

His great merit as a writer in natural philosophy and chemistry has been, indeed, universally acknowledged. The celebrated Dr. Boerhaave, after having declared Lord Bacon to be the father of Experimental Philosophy, says that "Mr. Boyle, the ornament of his age and country, succeeded to the genius and enquiries of the great Chancellor Verulam. Which of Mr. Boyle's writings shall I recommend? All of them. To him we owe the secrets of fire, air, water, animal, vegetable, fossils; so that from his works may be deduced the whole system of natural knowledge."

Mr. Granger observes, "that Robert Boyle, who was born the same year in which Lord Bacon died, seems to have inherited the penetrating and inquisitive genius of that illustrious philosopher. We are at a loss which to admire most, his extensive knowledge, or his exalted piety. These excellencies kept pace with each other; but the former never carried him to vanity, nor the latter to enthusiasm. He was himself the Christian Virtuoso which he has described. Religion never sat more easy upon a man, nor added greater dignity to a character. He particularly applied himself to chymistry; and made such discoveries in that branch of science, as can scarce be credited upon less authority than his own. His doctrine of the weight and spring of the air, a fluid on which our health and very being depend, gained him all the reputation he deserved. He founded the theological lecture which bears his name."

Mr. Boyle wrote, 1. New Experiments Physico-mechanical, &c. 2. Seraphic Love; 3. The Sceptical Chymist; 4. Considerations upon the Style of the Holy Scriptures; 5. New Experiments and Observations upon Cold; 6. Hydrostatical Paradoxes; 7. The Origin of Forms and Qualities; 8. Traacts about the cosinical Qualities of Things, &c. 9. Essay about the Origin and Virtue of Gems; 10. Historical Account of a Degradation of Gold made by an Anti-elixir; 11. The Aerial Noc-tiluca; 12. Medicina Hydrostatica; 13. The Christian Virtuoso; 14. Certain Physiological Essays, and other Traacts; 15. Essays on the Nature of Effluvia; 16. Experimenta et Observationes Physicæ; and many other pieces. All his works were collected and printed in five volumes in folio, at London, in the year 1744.

The Life of Charles Boyle, Earl of Orrery.

Boyle (Charles) earl of Orrery in Ireland, and baron of Marston in Somersetshire, was the second son of Roger, second earl of Orrery, and was born in Aug. 1676. At the age of fifteen he was entered as a nobleman of Christ-church, Oxford, where he had for his tutor the celebrated Dr. Francis Atterbury, afterwards bishop of Rochester, and Dr. Friend, under whose care he made so rapid a progress in his studies, that he was soon considered as an ornament to the college. The first work that fell from his pen, was a translation of the Life of Lyfander, from the Greek of Plutarch; soon after which, in 1695, he published a new edition of the Epistles of Phalaris, which gave rise to a violent dispute between him and Dr. Bentley. In 1700, he was chosen member for the town of Huntingdon; and in 1703, on the death of his elder brother, succeeded to the title of earl of Orrery. Some time after, he obtained the command of a regiment; was elected a knight of the Thistle, promoted to the rank of major-general, and sworn of her majesty's privy council. On the 10th of September, 1711, he was raised to the dignity of a British peer, by the title of lord Boyle, baron of Marston in Somersetshire. He enjoyed some additional honours in the reign of George I. but in 1722, having the misfortune to fall under the suspicion of the government, he was committed to the Tower: however, he was at length admitted to bail, and nothing being found that could be esteemed a sufficient ground for a prosecution, he was discharged. His lordship died on the 28th of August 1731, in the 56th year of his age. He wrote a comedy, entitled, As you find it; and was also the improver of that noble instrument, which, after him, is called The Orrery.

The Life of John Boyle, Earl of Cork and Orrery.

John Boyle, earl of Cork and Orrery, a nobleman distinguished by his learning and genius, was the only son of the above-mentioned Charles earl of Orrery, by lady Elizabeth Cecil, and was born on the second of January, 1707. He was educated at Christ-church college in Oxford, to which society he was an ornament, as his father had had been before him. He himself declares, that early disappointments, the perplexed state of his affairs, indifferent health, and many other untoward accidents, all contributed to render him, even in the earliest part of life, fond of retirement. Being thus indisposed for an active life, he passed his time principally in his study; daily exercising and improving his talents for polite literature and poetry. In this last art he gave occasionally several excellent specimens, the first of which was, A Copy of Verses to the Memory of that much beloved youth and relation Edmund, Duke of Bucks. There are many others of the like kind in his copious and curious notes to his translation of Pliny the Younger's Letters, which was undertaken for the service of his eldest son the lord Boyle, was published in 1751, in two vols. 4to, and has since gone through many editions. In the following year he published that entertaining work, The life of Dean Swift, in several letters addressed to his second son Hamilton Boyle, then a student at Christ-church. His third and youngest son Edmund is now earl of Cork and Orrery. His lordship died in November, 1762.

The Life of Mr. Samuel Boyse.

Boyse (Samuel) a poet, remarkable for his extravagance, his meanness, and his letting slip the greatest advantages, was the son of a dissenting minister in Dublin, and was born in 1708. He was educated at a private school in Dublin, and at eighteen years of age was sent to the university of Glasgow; but he had not been there a year when he married Miss Atchenfon, the daughter of a tradesman in that city. The natural extravagance of his temper soon exposed him to want, and having now the additional charge of a wife, he was obliged to quit the university, and to go with his wife (who also took a sister with her) to Dublin, where he depended on his father for support. Young Boyse was of all men the farthest removed from a gentleman; he had no graces of person, and fewer still of conversation. Never were there three persons of more libertine characters than young Boyse, his wife, and sister-in-law; yet the two ladies wore such a mask of decency before the old gentleman, that his fondness for them was never abated. An estate he possessed in Yorkshire was sold to pay his son's debts, and when the worthy old man lay in his last sickness, he was entirely supported by presents from his congregation, and buried at their expence.

Soon after his father's death, Boyse went to Edinburgh, where his poetical genius raised him many friends, and some patrons of great eminence. In 1731 he published a volume of poems, addressed to the countess of Eglington. That amiable lady was the patroness of all men of wit, and greatly distinguished Mr. Boyse, while he resided in Scotland. Upon the death of the viscountess Stormont, who had the most refined taste in the sciences, and was a great admirer of poetry, he wrote an Elegy, entitled, The Tears of the Muses, which was much applauded by her ladyship's relations; and the lord Stormont was so pleased with it, that he ordered a handsome present to be given to Mr. Boyse, by his attorney at Edinburgh. The notice which lady Eg-lington and the lord Stormont took of our poet recommended him to the patronage of the duchess of Gordon, who was so solicitous to raise him above necessity, that she employed her interest in procuring the promise of a place for him, and gave him a letter, which the next day he was to deliver to one of the commissioners of the customs at Edinburgh. It happened that he was then some miles distant from that city, and the morning on which he was to ride to town with her grace's letter proving rainy, this trivial circumstance prevented his going, and the place was given to another person.

Boyse having at last defeated all the kind intentions of his patrons, fell into poverty and contempt, and being obliged to quit Edinburgh, communicated his design of going to London to the duchess of Gordon, who having still a high opinion of his poetical abilities, gave him a letter of recommendation to Mr. Pope, and obtained another for him to Sir Peter King, lord chancellor of England; the lord Stormont also recommended him to his brother the solicitor-general, and to many other persons of rank. Upon his arrival in London he went to Twickenham, in order to deliver the duchess's letter to Mr. Pope, but that gentleman not being at home, Mr. Boyse never gave himself the trouble to repeat his visit. He wrote poems, but though they were excellent in their kind, they were lost to the world, by being introduced with no advantage. He had so strong a propensity to groveling, that his acquaintance were generally the lowest and most ignorant people, and those in high life he addressed by letters, not having sufficient confidence or politeness to converse familiarly with them. Thus, unfit to support himself in the world, he was exposed to a great variety of distresses, from which he could find no means of extricating himself, but by writing mendicant letters. Notwithstanding this, and though he had not the least taste for any thing elegant, he was so luxurious and expensive, that when he had received a guinea in consequence of a supplicating letter, though he had not another shilling in the world, and scarcely shoes to his feet, he would send for a bottle of Champaign or Burgundy. About the year 1740 he was reduced to the last extremity of human wretchedness, and had not a coat, a shirt, or any kind of apparel to put on; even the sheets in which he lay were carried to the pawn-broker's, and he was obliged to be confined to his bed, with no other covering than a blanket. Thus he remained six weeks, during which he was employed in writing verses for the magazines. Whoever had seen him in his study must have been shocked at his appearance; he sat up in his bed with the blanket wrapt about him, in which he had cut a hole large enough to admit his naked arm, and placing the paper upon his knee, wrote in the best manner he could. Perhaps he would have remained much longer in this distressful state, had not a compassionate gentleman, upon hearing this circumstance related, ordered his cloaths to be taken out of pawn, and enabled him to appear again abroad.

About the year 1745 Mr. Boyse's wife died; he was then at Reading, and pretended much concern on hearing of it. He affected to appear very fond of a little lap-dog, which he always carried about with him in his arms, imagining it gave him the air of a man of taste; and his circumstances being then too mean to put himself in mourning, he resolved that some of his family should, and therefore buying half a yard of black ribbon, fixed it about his dog's neck, by way of mourning for the loss of its mistress. Towards the close of his life he began to shew a greater regard to his character; and in his last lingering illness had the satisfaction to observe a poem of his, entitled, The Deity, recommended by two eminent writers, the ingenious Mr. Henry Fielding, and the rev. Mr. James Hervey, author of the Meditation. While he was in this illness, his mind was often religiously disposed. Indeed the early impressions of his education were never obliterated, and his whole life was a continual struggle between his appetites and his conscience, and in consequence of this war in his mind, he wrote an excellent poem, called The Recantation. In May, 1749, he died in obscure lodgings near Shoe lane, and was buried at the expence of the parish.

Never was a life spent with less prudence than that of Mr. Boyle, and never were such distinguished abilities given to less purpose. His genius was not confined to poetry and literary productions: he had a taste for painting, music, and the aldry, in the latter of which he was very well skilled. Two volumes of his poems have been published in London, and if the rest were collected, they would all together make six moderate volumes. Many of them are scattered in the Gentleman's Magazine, marked with the letter Y, or Alceus.

The Life of Dr. James Bradley.

Bradley (Dr. James) Savilian professor of astronomy in Oxford, fellow of the Royal Society at London, and member of the Academies of Sciences and Belles Lettres at Paris, Berlin, Boulogne, and Petersburg, was born at Shireborn, in Gloucestershire, in 1692, and educated at Oxford. In 1719 he was instituted to the vicarage of Briddlow, in Herefordshire. He received the first rudiments of the mathematics from his uncle, Dr. James Pound; and, on the death of John Kiel, M. D. was, in 1721, chosen Savilian professor of astronomy in Oxford, on which he resigned his living. Notwithstanding the veil which his innate modesty had cast over him, he was soon distinguished by the friendship of Sir Isaac Newton, lord chancellor Macclesfield, and Dr. Edmund Halley, his colleague in the Savilian professorship. In 1730 he succeeded Mr. Whiteside, as lecture reader of astronomy and experimental philosophy, in the university of Oxford; and, on the decease of Dr. Halley, was chosen astronomical observator at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, and honoured with the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1747 he published his Letter to the earl of Macclesfield, concerning the apparent motion observed in some of the fixed stars; and, on account of this curious discovery, obtained the annual gold prize-medal from the Royal Society. In consequence of this letter, his late majesty caused him to be paid 1000*l.* to repair the old instruments in the royal observatory, and for providing new ones, which enabled him to furnish it with the noblest and most accurate apparatus in the known world. He was afterwards offered the living of Greenwich, which he refused from a conscientious scruple, that the duty of a pastor was incompatible with his other studies; upon which his majesty granted him an annual pension of 250*l.* He was remarkable for the evenness of his temper, and for his sweet and amiable disposition, and was particularly distinguished for his modesty and taciturnity. He was always temperate, easy of access, humane and benevolent; was never tenacious of his own opinion, and was free from bigotry and ostentation. In short, he was a dutiful son, an indulgent husband, a tender father, and a steady friend. He died at Chalford, in Gloucestershire, of a suppression of urine, on the 13th of July, 1762, in the seventieth year of his age. Few of his works have appeared in public, but his Observations are contained in thirteen folio and two quarto volumes, and are lodged in safety for the public use.

The Life of Mr. Thomas Brown.

Brown (Thomas) of facetious memory, as Mr. Addison says of him, was the son of a considerable farmer in Shropshire, and received the first part of his education at Newport school in that county; from whence he was removed to Christchurch college, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by his uncommon attainments in literature. He had great parts and quickness of apprehension, nor does it appear that he was deficient in application; for we are told, that he was well skilled in the Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Spanish languages, even before he was sent to Oxford. The irregularities of his life did not suffer him to continue long at the university; he was soon obliged to quit that place; when, instead of returning home to his father, he went to London, in hopes of making his fortune some way or other there. However, he was in a short time reduced to the extremity of indigence; upon which he made interest to be school-master of Kingston upon Thames, in which pursuit he succeeded. But this was a profession very unsuitable to a man of Mr. Brown's turn; and therefore we cannot wonder, that he soon quitted his school, and went again to London, where he had recourse to that last refuge of half-starved wits, writing for bread. He published a great variety of pieces, both in prose and verse, in all which he discovered no small erudition, as well as an exuberant vein of humour. An anonymous author, who has given the world some account of Mr. Brown, says, that tho' a good-natured man, he had one pernicious quality, which was, rather to lose his friend than his joke. He had a particular genius for satire, and dealt it out liberally whenever he could find occasion. He is famed for being the author of a libel, fixed one Sunday morning on the doors of Westminster-abbey; and of many others against the clergy and quality. He died in the year 1704, and was interred in the cloister of Westminster-abbey, near the remains of Mrs. Behn, with whom he was intimate in his life-time. His whole works, consisting of dialogues, essays, declamations, satires, letters from the dead to the the living, translations, &c. have been printed in four volumes, 12mo.

The Life of Sir Thomas Browne.

Browne (Sir Thomas) an eminent physician and celebrated writer, was born at London, on the 19th of October, 1605. He was placed for his education at Winchester-school, and entered as a Gentleman-Commoner at Broadgate hall, since stiled Pembroke-college: he was admitted to the degree of bachelor of arts in 1627; and having afterwards taken that of master, he turned his studies to physic, and practised it for some time in Oxfordshire: but he soon quitted his settlement there, and accompanied his father-in-law into Ireland. From thence he passed into France and Italy; made some stay at Montpellier and Padua, which were then the celebrated schools of physic; and returning home through Holland, was created doctor of physic at Leyden.* It is supposed that he arrived in London about the year 1634, and that the next year he wrote his celebrated piece, entitled, Religio Medici, the religion of a physician; which was no sooner published, says Dr. Johnson, than it excited the attention of the public, by the novelty of paradoxes, the dignity of sentiment, the quick succession of images, the multitude of abstruse allusions, the subtilty of disquisition, and the strength of language.

In 1637 he was incorporated doctor of physic in Oxford; and in 1646 published his Treatise on Vulgar Errors, entitled by himself, “Pseudodoxia Epidemica; or, Enquiries into very many received Tenets, and commonly presumed Truths.” He also wrote “Hydriotaphia, or a discourse of sepulchral urns,” to which was added, “The Garden of Cyrus, or the Quincuncial Lozenge, or Network Plantation of the Antients, artificially, naturally, mystically considered.” In 1665, Dr. Brown was chosen honorary fellow of the college of physicians, as a man “virtute et literis ornatissimus,” eminently embellished with literature and virtue. In 1671, he received the honour of knighthood from king Charles II. Having long lived in high reputation, in his seventy-sixth year he was seized with a cholic, which, after having tortured him about a week, put an end to his life at Norwich, on his birth-day, the 19th of October, 1682. He was a man of great learning and abilities, and of regular and virtuous manners. He has been spoke of by some as a Deist, and by others as an Atheist; but these imputations are merely the result of bigotry. That he did not assent to every article in certain theological creeds, may perhaps be admitted without injury to his character: but he appears evidently to have been a firm believer of christianity. “There is no science, says Dr. Johnson, in which he does not discover some skill; and scarce any kind of knowledge, profane or sacred, abstruse or elegant, which he does not appear to have cultivated with success.”

The Life of Mr. George Buchanan.

Buchanan (George) a celebrated Scottish poet

* Life of Sir Thomas Browne, by Dr. Samuel Johnson.

Ap. 11, 1777.

and historian, was born at Kellern, in the shire of Lenox, in Scotland, in February, 1506. His father being dead, and his mother being left with eight children, her brother sent him to Paris for his education; but in two years the death of his uncle, and his own bad state of health, and want of money, obliged him to return. About a year after, he made a campaign with the French auxiliaries, in which he suffered so many hardships, that he was confined to his bed by sickness all the ensuing winter. Early in the spring, he went to St. Andrew's, to learn logic under Mr. John Mair, whom he followed in the summer to Paris. Here he embraced the Lutheran tenets, which at that time began to spread: and, after struggling with ill fortune for near two years, he went, in 1526, to teach grammar in the college of St. Barbe, where he continued two years and an half; after which he was taken into the family of the earl of Castels, who, in 1534, carried him into Scotland. Upon the earl's death, king James V. appointed him preceptor to his natural son James, afterwards the famous earl of Murray.

The king of Scotland having discovered a conspiracy against his person, in which he was persuaded that some of the Franciscans were concerned, commanded Buchanan to write a poem against them. Our poet, unwilling to disoblige either the king or the friars, wrote a few verses susceptible of a double interpretation: but the king was displeased at their not being severe enough, and ordered him to write others more poignant, which gave occasion to his famous piece, entitled Franciscanus. Soon after, being informed by his friends at court that the monks sought his life, and that cardinal Beaton had given the king a sum of money to have him executed, he fled to England; from whence he passed over to France. On his arrival at Paris, he found his inveterate enemy, cardinal Beaton, at that court, in the character of ambassador; upon which he retired to Bourdeaux, at the invitation of Andrew Govianus, a learned Portuguese. He taught at the public school lately erected there three years; in which time he wrote four tragedies, which were afterwards occasionally published. In 1547 he went into Portugal with Govianus, who had received orders from the king his master to bring him a certain number of able men, to teach philosophy and classical learning in the university he had lately established at Coimbra. After the death of Govianus, Buchanan suffered every kind of ill usage: his poem against the Franciscans was objected to him by his enemies; the eating of flesh in Lent, which was the common custom throughout the whole kingdom, was charged upon him as a crime; it was reckoned a heinous offence in him to have said in a private conversation with some Portuguese youths, that he thought St. Austin favoured rather the protestant than the popish doctrine of the eucharist; and two men were brought to testify that he was averse to the Romish religion. In short, he was sent to a monastery for some months, to be better instructed by the monks. At length, having recovered his liberty, he came to England, where things were in such a confusion during the minority of Edward VI. that he went to France in the beginning of the year 1552; and in July 1554, he published his tragedy of Jephtha, with a dedication to Charles de Cossé, marshal of France; with which the marshal was so highly pleased, that he sent for Buchanan into Piedmont, and made him preceptor to his son. Buchanan spent five years in France with this youth, employing his leisure hours in the study of the scriptures. He returned to Scotland in 1563, and joined the reformed church in that kingdom. In 1565, he went again to France, from whence he was recalled the year following, by Mary queen of Scots, who appointed him principal of St. Leonard's college in the university of St. Andrew, where he resided four years; but, upon the misfortunes of that queen, he joined the party of the earl of Murray, by whose order he wrote his Detection, reflecting on the queen's character and conduct. He was by the states of the kingdom appointed preceptor to the young king, James VI. He employed the last twelve or thirteen years of his life in writing the history of his country, in which he has happily united the force and brevity of Sallust with the perspicuity and elegance of Livy. He died at Edinburgh the 28th of September 1582, aged 76. The most valuable of his works are, his Translation of the Psalms, and his History of Scotland.

went

Sir James Melvil tells us, that Buchanan "was a Stoic Philosopher, who looked not far before him; a man of notable endowments for his learning and knowledge in Latin poetry, much honoured in other countries, pleasant in conversation, rehearsing, at all occasions, moralities, short and instructive, whereof he had abundance, inventing where he wanted. He was also religious, but was easily abused, and so facile, that he was led by every company that he haunted, which made him factious in his old days, for he spoke and wrote as those who were about him informed him; for he was become careless, following, in many things, the vulgar opinion; for he was naturally popular, and extremely revengeful against any man who had offended him, which was his greatest fault."

The Life of Eustace Budgell, Esq;

Budgell, (Eustace) Esq; an ingenious and polite writer, was the son of Gilbert Budgell, D. D. and was born at St. Thomas, near Exeter, about the year 1585. He was educated at Christ-church college, Oxford, from whence he was removed to the Inner Temple, London; but instead of studying the law, for which his father intended him, he applied to polite literature, kept company with the genteel persons in town, and particularly contracted a strict intimacy with Mr. Addison, who was first cousin to his mother. He was concerned with Sir Richard Steele and Mr. Addison in writing the Tatler, as he had, soon after, a share in writing the Spectators, where all the papers written by him are marked with an X; and when that work was completed, he had likewise a hand in the Guardian, where his performances are marked with an asterisk. He was afterwards appointed under-secretary to Mr. Addison, chief secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, and deputy-clerk of the council in that kingdom. Soon after, he was chosen member of the Irish parliament; and in 1717, when Mr. Addison became principal secretary of state in England, he procured Mr. Budgell the place of accountant and comptroller-general of the revenue in Ireland. The next year, the duke of Bolton being appointed lord lieutenant, Mr. Budgell wrote a lampoon against Mr. Webster, the duke's secretary, in which his grace himself was not spared, and upon all occasions treated that gentleman with the utmost contempt. This imprudent step was the primary cause of his ruin; for the duke of Bolton, in support of his secretary, procured his removal from the post of accountant-general; upon which, returning to England, he, contrary to the advice of Mr. Addison, published his case in a pamphlet, entitled, *a Letter to the Lord *, from Eustace Budgell, Esq. accountant-general, &c. In the year 1720 he lost 20,000*l.* by the South-Sea scheme, and afterwards spent 5000*l.* more in fruitless attempts to obtain a seat in parliament. This completed his ruin. He at length employed himself in writing against the ministry, and wrote many papers in the Craftsman. In 1733 he began a weekly pamphlet, called The Bee, which he continued for about an hundred numbers. During the progress of this work, Dr. Tindal died, by whose will he had 2000*l.* left him, to the exclusion of the next heir; but soon after he was reduced to a very unhappy situation by law-suits. He however got himself called to the bar; but being unable to make any progress, he resolved to put an end to his life. Accordingly, in the year 1736, he filled his pockets with stones, then taking a boat at Somerset-stairs, ordered the waterman to shoot the bridge, and while the boat was going under, threw himself into the river. He had several days before been visibly distracted in his mind. Upon his bureau was found a slip of paper, on which were these words;

What Cato did, and Addison approv'd,
Cannot be wrong.

Mr. Budgell was never married; but left one natural daughter, who afterwards assumed his name, and became an actress at Drury-lane theatre.

The Life of Mr. John Bunyan.

Bunyan (John) the celebrated author of the Pilgrim's Progress, was born at Elstow, near Bedford, in 1628. He was the son of a tinker, and, in the early part of his life, was a great reprobate, and a soldier in the parliament army; but being at length deeply struck with a sense of his guilt, he laid aside his profligate courses, became remarkable for his sobriety, and applied himself to obtain some degree of learning. About the year 1655 he was admitted a member of a Baptist congregation at Bedford, and was soon after chosen their preacher. He suffered much for his attachment to the principles of the Non-conformists, being apprehended as he was preaching, and confined twelve years in Bedford goal. During his imprisonment, we are told that he chiefly supported himself by making long-tagged thread laces, which he had learned to do since his confinement. At this time also he wrote many of his tracts. After his enlargement, he travelled into several parts of England, to visit pious persons of his own opinions, and confirm them in their religious sentiments and practice; which procured him the appellation of Bishop Bunyan. When the declaration of James II. for liberty of conscience was published, he, by the contributions of his followers, built a meeting-house in Bedford, and preached there constantly to a numerous audience. He died on the 31st of August, 1688. He wrote a great number of books; though his library, during his long confinement, consisted only (we are told) of the Bible and the Book of Martyrs. His master-piece is his Pilgrim's Progress, one of the most popular books ever published. It has passed through many editions, and has been translated into several languages. The allegory is admirably carried on in this performance, which, in point of invention, has been r... d to Bishop Patrick's Pilgrim. The works of Bunyan have been collected and published in two volumes folio.

The Life of Edmund Burke, Esq.

Burke (Edmund) Esq; a distinguished orator and ingenious writer now living, is the second son of Mr. Garret Burke, an attorney of fair character and extensive practice in the city of Dublin. He was born in the year 1730, and was, during his childhood, educated at a school near Ballymore, in King's-County. From this seminary he was removed to Trinity-college, Dublin, where he gave many proofs of soon becoming an adept in those branches of polite literature, which essentially contribute to form the orator and the poet. In this university he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and, being designed by his father for the study of the law, soon after came to London, and was entered a student in the Middle Temple, where he read the law for upwards of two years, at which period his father died. Being thus freed from all restraint, he pursued the natural bent of his genius, and applied himself solely to the Belles Lettres. His first performance was "A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful;" which was so favourably received by the public, that it passed through several editions in a short time. This essay recommended him to several gentlemen of distinction in the republic of letters; and, in 1761, William Gerard Hamilton, esq; being appointed secretary to the earl of Halifax, who had been made viceroy of Ireland, he invited Mr. Burke to accompany him to that kingdom; where, by his address and penetration, he did considerable services to the court party, and received, as a gratification, a pension of 500*l.* per annum. No man was better acquainted with the state of Ireland than Mr. Burke, who gave in such an ingenuous representation to the minister, with respect to the commerce and finances of that kingdom, that no demands were made by government, but what were granted that session; so well were all parties convinced, that, while he served the court, he was a firm friend to the liberties of his country. During these transactions, it is asserted, his friend the secretary became jealous of his great abilities, and took several steps to deprive him of that pension he had so deservedly obtained. The duke of Northumberland, being appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland in 1763, used his dis-most endeavours to make Mr. Burke's situation agreeable to him; but that gentleman was so displeased with the ungrateful treatment he received, that he politely declined any further connexion with administration, from whom he was determined to lie under no obligation, and therefore resigned his pension, notwithstanding the duke, in the most liberal manner, pressed him to have it continued. On his return to England, Mr. Burke warmly attached himself to the popular party; and, as he had inherited an estate of 600*l.* per annum, by the death of his elder brother, he was elected a member in the last parliament, and soon became formidable, from his uncommon oratory and political knowledge. His election for Bristol in the present parliament did not cost him a shilling, and is consequently a proof of the high opinion the inhabitants of that city entertained of his integrity and abilities.

Mr. Burke is said to be the author of the historical part of the Annual Register; and is thought by many to be the writer of those epistles which appeared some years ago under the signature of Junius. His Thoughts on the National Debts, and other political pieces, are too well known to require further notice here.

The Life of Bishop Burnet.

Burnet (Gilbert) bishop of Salisbury, an eminent writer, was born at Edinburgh, September 18, 1643. He received the first rudiments of his education from his father, and perfectly understood the Latin tongue at ten years of age; when being sent to the college of Aberdeen, he was scarce fourteen when he commenced master of arts. At eighteen he was admitted a probationer, or expectant preacher, and soon after an offer of a good benefice was made him, which he declined. He at length came into England, and, after six months stay at Oxford and Cambridge, returned to Scotland; some time after, he made a tour through Holland and France. At Amsterdam, by the assistance of a Jewish rabbi, he perfected himself in the Hebrew language, and likewise became acquainted with the leading men of the different persuasions tolerated there, Arminians, Lutherians, Baptists, Brownists, Papists, and Unitarians; and used frequently to declare, that among each of these he met with men of such unfeigned piety and virtue, that he contracted a fixed principle of universal charity, and an invincible abhorrence of all severity, on account of difference in religion. On his return to Scotland, he was admitted into holy orders by the bishop of Edinburgh, in 1665, and presented to the living of Saltoun, when he was the only clergyman in Scotland that made use of the prayers in the liturgy of the church of England. In 1668 he was employed in negotiating the scheme of accommodation between the episcopal and presbyterian parties, and by his advice many of the latter were put into the vacant churches. In the following year he was made divinity professor in the university of Glasgow, where he continued four years and a half, equally hated by the zealots of both parties. In 1672 he published "A Vindication, &c. of the Church and State of Scotland," which so pleased the court, that he was offered a bishopric, and a promise of the next vacant archbishopric, but would not accept of it, because he saw the great design of the court was to advance popery. In 1673, he took another journey to London, when the king having heard him preach, nominated him one of his chaplains in ordinary. But the next year the duke of Lauderdale accusing him as the cause of the miscarriage of the measures taken by the court in Scotland, his name was ordered to be struck out of the list of chaplains; when being told that his enemies intended to get him imprisoned, he resigned his professor's chair at Glasgow; and preaching in several churches in London, had been chosen minister of one, had not the electors been deterred from it by a message in the king's name. However, in 1675, he was appointed preacher of the Rolls chapel, and was soon made lecturer of St. Clement's; but afterwards, his behaviour at the lord Russell's trial, and his attending that unhappy nobleman in prison and at his execution, occasioned his being discharged, by the king's mandate, from his lectureship; and having, on the fifth of November, 1684, preached a sermon at the Rolls chapel, severely inveighing against the doctrines of popery, he was forbid to preach there any more.

After the death of king Charles II. he travelled through France, Italy, and Switzerland; then repairing to the Hague, he was admitted to the confidence of the prince of Orange, and had no inconsiderable share in the Revolution. He was advanced to the see of Salisbury in 1689, and afterwards appointed preceptor to the duke of Gloucester. He was a man of great parts and learning, and of an exemplary life. He wrote, 1. The History of the Reformation of the Church of England. 2. A modest and free Conference between a Conformist and Nonconformist. 3. Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton. 4. The History of the Rights of Princes in disposing of Ecclesiastical Benefices. 5. The Pastoral Care. 6. An Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles; and many other works. He died on the 17th of March, 1714-15, and was interred in the parish church of St. James, Clerkenwell. After his death, his History of his own Time, with his life annexed, was published by his son Thomas Burnet, Esquire.

History of the Proceedings of the British Parliament. (Continued from p. 207.)

HIS Lordship spoke above an hour, to prove the solid grounds the credit of the bank of England stood on; and contended, that it was no less supported by its own ability, than its known regard to public faith, which had secured it a credit and reputation, not only within this island, but in almost every part of the mercantile world. He alluded to Dr. Price, Lord Stair, &c. several of whose arguments, he said, were built on hypothetical reasonings. They often contained matter well deserving of public and private consideration; but there was one observation he learnt by perusing them, that however their facts might be just, pertinent, or important, their conclusions and predictions generally turned out to be false. Whenever men, the best versed in business, and who had acted in the most important stations, quitted practice for theory, they were no less liable to fall into error than mere abstract reasoners. Such was the case of a great minister (Sir Robert Walpole) who was often heard to say, that whenever the nation owed 100 millions, it would be undone, and would become a bankrupt. The event has since falsified the prediction of that able politician, for in less than thirty years after pronouncing this authoritative sentence, the nation owed near 150 millions, and was neither bankrupt nor undone.

He observed, that great pains had been taken to decry the bank, and to depreciate its credit, but to no purpose. It had been called a bubble; but to use the words employed on another occasion, if the bank was a bubble, so was the world. Many attempts have been made to prove its connection and dependence on government, and the influence it gave the minister. If by the minister was meant the first lord of the treasury, he assured the committee he had no influence on them; if he had, he should, he hoped, use it to the best purposes, that of the public welfare. It was said too, that the bank had joined government against the people, then which nothing could be more fallacious, for by joining and co-operating with government, they essentially served the people, and no surer test could be given than this, which was, that if the people withdrew their confidence from government but for one day, he would engage that the next the individuals who compose the present administration, would have no more influence with the bank, than any other set of individuals whatever; and on the whole, he could fairly declare, that he did not know a single instance in which the bank had assisted government, which was in fact assisting the publick, but in circulating the exchequer and navy bills, which brought them into the market, and lowered the premium half per cent.

It might be objected, he said, that the grants already made, and the services already provided for, would not be sufficient, particularly that no provision had been made for the army extraordinaries, which would be a certain expence. The observation would be a just one, if made, for there was none. He foresaw, and intended, if something had not prevented him, to have taken his Majesty's directions on that point. He, however, would take the earliest opportunity of waiting on his Majesty, in pursuance of which he presumed, he would to-morrow deliver a royal message, desiring a vote of credit.

The events of war were uncertain; but he had every reason to be satisfied, that such steps had been taken as would be the means of bringing America to a proper sense of their duty. There was nothing he so much desired, nor nothing more disagreeable to him, than to assert the rights of this country by force of arms, if it were possible to secure them by any other means. He sincerely wished for accommodation, if it could be obtained consistently with the honour and interest of the parent state, and the dignity and legislative supremacy of the British Parliament. He wished sincerely for conciliation, and was heartily disposed to treat America with tenderness nerfess and affection. But he trusted to the spirit and insulted honour of the British nation, that it would not let its most valuable and important rights be wrested by force, violence, and rebellion, out of its hand; and if occasion should require it, that it would exert that strength which, when properly exerted, never failed to prevail.

His Lordship, in reply, seemingly, to such as had asserted in print, that the current gold and silver coin of the kingdom had been decreased, stated several facts to prove it was not. He said nine millions sterling had been already coined since the passing of the act; that four millions of light and cut gold remained in the bank ready for coining; that probably the present proclamation, for calling in such guineas as were under five pennyweights six grains, and which exceeded five pennyweights three grains, would produce three millions; to which, if were added such guineas as were within the six and eight grains, for which no proclamation had been issued, with the silver coin, probably amounting to between three and four millions, supposing the last to be very base and not worth half its nominal value; the whole he believed, would not fall much short of twenty millions, a sum far exceeding any thing that had been yet asserted in print respecting any other period.

He dwelt upon the wealth, strength, and high spirit of the nation; talked much of the pitiful figure we made in the beginning of the late war, and afterwards how vigorously we prosecuted, and how gloriously we terminated it. [He alluded to Doctor Brown's Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the times.]

Governor Johnstone observed, it was a little extraordinary that the gallery should be open on that day, and shut up upon almost every other, since the commencement of the session, on which matters of importance came under discussion. He assured the House, that he was always pleased to see the gallery as full as the convenience of the members would permit; but the admission on such a day as this, which gave the minister an advantage over his opponents, by giving any sentiments as his own, and imputing any sentence he pleased to others, convinced him that his Lordship's influence extended to every matter relative to the conduct and ordering of that House, be the occasion ever so trivial or important. If strangers are to be shut out one day, none can be at a loss to know whence the mandate originated; if the gallery is to be open on another day, it was equally evident to whom the public was indebted for the indulgence. He knew he was disorderly in alluding to such a circumstance, and he should hardly have mentioned it, but for another, which was of no small importance to him, as well as all the other gentlemen on that side of the House. The matter he alluded to was the indirect charges made against them, as if they had vilified the nation, questioned its spirit and ability, and drawn comparisons between it and America much to its disgrace, than which nothing could be more false or ill-founded. The arguments he alluded to were, he insisted, mis-stated and mis-represented. It was not the courage nor the spirit of the nation that was questioned; it was that the war was unpopular, that the people did not approve of it, that they were cool, languid, and irresolute. He said it was happy for the noble Lord that the people were so, for if it was a foreign war that had been so unsuccessful, that had been so replete with mismanagement and misconduct, it would probably by this time have cost the minister his head. He adverted to the very great and heavy expence, spoke of the present taxes proposed, as only a foretaste of what the people were to expect. He said the war was diabolical, but he would not take the advantage of an open gallery to declare his sentiments, but he was certain it was an unjust and impolitic war. The noble Lord, and his colleagues in office in that House, had frequently asserted that America would be subdued in one campaign; but he called upon any one gentleman, either in the army or navy, to rise and pledge himself, as a professional man, for the truth of it. He was very certain not one would or could. If so, then it would follow that our additional taxes were but just commencing; and if we were to borrow two millions this year, five times the sum would hardly be sufficient to defray the expences of the next year. He observed that the language of the noble Lord had been greatly changed of late. The general tenor of it, for the purpose of inducing the nation to go to war, was, that our burthens were intolerable; that our debt was enormous, our resources exhausted; that we paid seventeen shillings and six-pence in the pound, while America did not and would not contribute a pepper-corn towards the support of those burthens which she had been instrumental in incurring. Now the note is suddenly changed: Britain is the most rich, flourishing, and opulent country on the face of the earth. Her taxes are great, but her resources are immense, and her strength irresistible. He objected to the tax on hackney coaches and news papers, on the ground of being stated by the noble Lord as articles of luxury. Stage-coaches, he said, were very useful modes of conveyance. They were calculated for the convenience of the middling and lower orders of people. They were expeditious, and were of national benefit, that of opening a communication between one part of the kingdom and another, which, in a trading, manufacturing nation, was of no small consequence. As to news-papers, he thought the tax had better be laid on the political pamphlets, or rather the political trash, countenanced by government. But if news-papers are an object of luxury, it was a luxury which it would be cruel to deprive those of who thought it so. But even on the noble Lord's own state, he could not think it so great as he represented it. He remarked on the noble Lord's reasonings relative to the ship-news received from Jamaica. He said he had made it his business to enquire of the captain, and had found it to correspond with what appeared in the public prints.—His Lordship has said if there had been any foundation for the report, the governor would have sent an account of it. But does it follow, that the report must be false, because the ministry have received no intelligence of it? The ship which brought the news from Jamaica came by the north passage, which was the safest, and frequently frequently the most expeditious; another vessel, with the dispatches, might be on her voyage; and martial law might be proclaimed or it might not; still the fact was not invalidated, of the governor of Jamaica being alarmed by the great force the French had in the West-Indies.

Mr. Fox began with remarking on an observation made by his honourable friend, relative to the opening of the gallery on one day, and shutting it every other day during the session, in which public business was transacted. He presumed, the cause was, that the noble Lord over the way could learn to be consistent one day, though not a second day in the year. It gave him an opportunity, besides, to misrepresent what had been said at the other side of the house, by charging them with assertions that never entered their thoughts, reflecting on the spirit of the nation, and the bravery and native courage of its inhabitants.

Sir Fletcher Norton said he could not sit silent and hear it thrown out as if he had been the means of shutting the doors at some times, and opening them at others. He disclaimed the imputation. He said, whatever had been done, was in pursuance of the order of the House; that there was a standing order, that no strangers should be admitted into the gallery, and that frequent applications had been made to him by several gentlemen to have it strictly enforced. If the order was thought to be an improper one, a motion ought to be made to take it into consideration; and if the House thought proper, they might rescind it. Till that was done, or until the House unanimously agreed to relax it, for it would be in the power of any one member to move to have the gallery cleared as long as the order stood, it was impossible he could act otherwise.

Mr. Rigby insisted, that no person of any description had any right to enter into either House of Parliament but the members. He said, that the Speaker had no power to dispense with the standing order no more than any one else; nor did he see what business strangers had at any time in the gallery. He was extremely violent against America, and contended, that Great-Britain ought never to make any specific promise; or agree to any previous conditions, till the people of America threw down their arms; and if they should obstinately persist, Britain ought to persevere till America was subdued. He contended that America aimed at independence. It was plain, from the pamphlet called Common Sense, written by a member of the congress.

Colonel Barre desired to know if Lord Howe was to go out to America, and whether, if he should, it was intended to arm his Lordship with powers sufficient to treat with the colonies; because he understood from his Lordship, that he would not go, unless he had powers to treat on terms of conciliation.

No answer

Lord North said he did not mean to assure the House, that the report of advices from Jamaica was not true; but that he did not believe those advices.

From the LONDON GAZETTE.

Whitehall, March 20, 1777.

Extract of a Letter from the Hon. General Sir Wm. Howe, to Lord Geo. Germaine, dated New-York, February 12, 1777.

THE disposition of the troops in this quarter having undergone little alteration since my last dispatch, I have only to advise your lordship of the return of a brigade of British, and some companies of grenadiers and light infantry, from Rhode Island, to strengthen Lord Cornwallis's corps in Jersey, in order to enable his Lordship, with more security to the posts of Brunswick and Amboy, to make a movement when the weather proves favourable, against the enemy still remaining at Morris-Town.

Lieutenant General Clinton being gone to England, Lord Percy has succeeded to the command at Rhode Island, and has with him Major-General Prescott, one troop of the 17th light dragoons, one brigade of British, and two of Hessians.

His Excellency Governor Tryon has offered his service in the command of a corps of Provincials for the ensuing campaign; and, presuming this measure will be approved by his Majesty, I shall endeavour to place such a corps under his command as may be of essential use in the prosecution of the war.

Major-General Robertson, who will have the honour to deliver this dispatch, can give your Lordship the best information respecting the present state of this country.

Major-General Robertson, who left New-York the 18th of February, and by whom the letter, of which the above is an extract, has been received, gives an account of several advantages gained by parties composed of British and Hessian troops, employed in escorting convoys in the Jerseys, over large bodies of the rebels, by which they had been attacked; particularly, that a party of the 42d, which was escorting some forage waggons from Brunswick, having been attacked by a great number of the rebels, Sir William Erskine marched out with a detachment to their relief, and taking a position which placed the rebels between two fires, obliged them to retreat in great confusion, leaving between three and four hundred dead upon the spot.

That a considerable number of the rebels having appeared on the heights above the light-house, at Sandy-hook, Major Gordon, with 200 men, landed behind them, attacked and defeated them, killing several, and taking 74 prisoners, which had occasioned the rebels to abandon all that part of Monmouth county.

That the Hessian soldiers that had fought their way through the rebels, at Trenton, and come to New York, had requested Gen. Howe to send them back into the Jerseys, that they might have a share in any services that the season would admit of; with which the General had complied, and they were sent back accordingly.

That the rebels on the West Chester side had collected all the militia they could draw together from the New England provinces, and the western parts of New York, bringing with them a number of empty waggons, in expectation of plundering the inhabitants of New York island, and had appeared before Fort Independence, near King's-Bridge, which they summoned to surrender; but upon receiving some cannon shot from the place, and perceiving the disposition making by General Knyphausen, who commands at King's-Bridge, for attacking them, they withdrew with their waggons and dispersed.

That General Howe proposed passing over from New York into the Jerseys on the 18th of February, having ordered the troops which were returned from Rhode Island to disembark at Amboy.

That all his Majesty's ships fit for sea were kept out cruising, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, and had taken and sent into New-York near two hundred sail of prizes.

That although, when the King's troops took possession of the city of New York, it was found almost without inhabitants, the eagerness of the people to return under his Majesty's government was such, that the number of inhabitants on the 17th of February amounted to upwards of 11,000. That they kept constant watch, and patrolled the city night and day, to guard against any further attempts of the rebel incendiaries, and that their zeal and alertness had prevented any late material injury to the city or shipping from fire.

That the Congress, after declaring General Washington Dictator of the American States for six months, had withdrawn to Baltimore, in Maryland, leaving a committee at Philadelphia to assist him with their advice.

Copy of a Letter from Governor Tryon to Lord George Germaine.

New York, Feb. 11, 1777.

My Lord,

THE success that accompanied my endeavour to unite the inhabitants of this city, by an oath of allegiance and fidelity to his Majesty and his government, has met my warmest wishes, 2970 of the inhabitants having qualified thereto in my presence. The mayor, recorder, and alderman Waddle, were employed in administering the oath.

I have the satisfaction to assure your Lordship, as the invitation to the people to give this voluntary testimony of their loyalty to his Majesty and his government, was made even without a shadow of compulsion, it gave me peculiar satisfaction to see the cheerfulness with which they attended the summons. I verily believe there are not one hundred citizens who have not availed themselves of the opportunity of thus testifying their attachment to government. The mayor, since I went through the several wards, has attested 50 more men, and is daily adding to the number, which makes the whole sworn in the city 3020, which added to those attested on Staten-Island, in the three counties of Long Island, and in West Chester county, (all which amounted to upwards of 2600,) makes the whole amount to 5600 men.

Thus, my Lord, I have used my best endeavours to secure the fidelity of the inhabitants of this government, within those districts through which the King's troops have moved. I have assured the General, that, should he remove all his troops from this city, there would not be the least risk of a revolt from the inhabitants; but, on the contrary, was confident large numbers would take a share in the defence of the town against the rebels.

The loyal inhabitants of Queen's-county received the 800 stand of arms, distributed by the General's permission, with demonstrations of joy, and with a professed resolution to use them in defence of the island.

I am anxious that some grace from government may speedily be extended to this loyal quarter of the province.

I have the honour to be, &c.

W. TRYON.

From the CONGRESS GAZETTE.

This morning the Congress received the following letter from Gen. Washington.

*Head Quarters, New-Town,
Dec. 26, 1776.*

S I R,

I HAVE the pleasure of congratulating you upon the success of an enterprize, which I had formed against a detachment of the enemy lying in Trenton, and was executed yesterday morning. The evening of the 25th, I ordered the troops intended for this purpose to parade the back of M'Kenky's Ferry, that they might begin to pass as soon as it grew dark; imagining that we should be able to throw them all over, with the necessary artillery, by twelve o'clock, that we might easily arrive at Trenton by five o'clock in the morning, the distance being about nine miles; but the quantity of ice made that night, impeded the passage of the boats so much, that it was three o'clock before the artillery could be got over, and near four when the troops took up the line of march. I formed my detachment into two divisions, one to march up the lower or River road, the other by the upper or Pennington road. As the divisions had nearly the same distance to march, I ordered each of them, immediately upon forcing the out-guards, to push directly into the town, that they might charge the enemy before they had time to form. The upper division arrived at the enemy's advanced post exactly at eight o'clock, and in three minutes after I found, from the fire in the lower road, that that division had also got up. The out-guards made but a small opposition, though for their numbers they behaved very well, keeping up a constant retreating fire behind houses. We presently saw their main body formed, but from their motions they seemed undetermined how to act, being harassed by our troops, who had already got possession of half their artillery; they attempted to file off by a road on their right, leading to Prince-town, but perceiving their intention, I threw a body of troops in their way, which immediately checked them.

April, 1777.

Finding from our disposition that they were surrounded, and must inevitably be cut to pieces if they made any further resistance, they agreed to lay down their arms. The number that submitted in this manner were 23 officers, and 886 men. Col. Rhall, the commanding officer, and seven others, were found wounded in the town. I do not exactly know how many were killed, but I fancy about 20 or 30, as they never made any regular stand. Our loss was very trifling indeed, only four officers, and one or two privates wounded. I find the detachment of the enemy consisted of the three regiments of Hessians, Hanpach, Kniphausen, and Rhall, amounting to about 1500 men, and a troop of British light horse. Immediately upon the beginning of the attack, all those who were not killed, or wounded, pushed directly down the road towards Burdenton. These would likewise have fallen into our hands, could my plan immediately have been carried into execution. General Erving was to have crossed before day, at Trenton Ferry, and taken possession of a bridge leading out of town; but the quantity of ice was so great, that, though he did every thing in his power to effect it, he could not get over; and finding it impossible to embark his artillery, he was obliged to desist. I am fully confident, that, could the troops under General Erving and Cadwallader have passed the river, I should have been able, with their assistance, to have driven the enemy from all their posts below Trenton; but the number I had with me, being inferior to those below me, and a strong battalion of light infantry being at Prince's Town above me, I thought it most prudent to return the same evening with the prisoners, and the artillery we had taken. We found no stores of any consequence in the town.

In justice to the officers and men, I must add, that their behaviour on this occasion reflects the highest honour upon them. The difficulty of passing the river in a very severe night, and their march through a violent storm of snow and hail, did not in the least abate their ardour; but when they came to charge, each seemed to vie with the other in pushing forward; and were I to give a preference to any particular corps, I should do injustice to the other. Capt. Baylor, my first aid-de-camp, will have the honour to deliver this to you; and from him you may be made acquainted with many other particulars. His spirited behaviour upon every occasion requires me to recommend him to your particular notice.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,
Sir, yours, &c. &c.

G. WASHINGTON.

Extract of a Letter from Boston, by Way of Hamburg, dated Jan. 8.

"The Altier, of 64 guns, and the Silphide of 16, arrived in this harbour the 4th instant from Brest. They have brought 90,000 suits of regimentals, being part of 150,000 which were contracted for by the Congress in the summer for the Provincial army. The above ships are to take on board cargoes of tobacco in part of payment."

Written in MILTON's Paradise Regained.

By the late Ambrose Phillips, Esq; Author of the Disfranchisement of the Mother, &c. and not printed in his Works.

IF Fame the Paradise of Poets be,
(As sure, 'tis seldom they a richer fec)
How fair a Paradise might Milton boast
For that his daring song to greatly lost !
Which in immortal bloom had still remain'd,
Had he not strove to have the first regain'd.
So that first Fair he sings, with Adam's arms,
And chaste embrace, her own unsully'd charms,
Eden's fair fields, the whole creation's store
Nor satisfy'd, lost all, in grasping more.
One common fate all fond ambition shares;
And oft' with Poets, as with Maids it fares,
But over conscious of a lovely frame,
Too much they shew, and disappoint their aim :
Expose their all, and leave no room to guess :
Mistaking thus for beauty, nakedness.

ODE to the MORNING.

HAIL rosy Morn ! whose purple ray
Declares th' approach of dawning day,
You bid the dusky vapours fly,
And spread new beauties o'er the sky ;
The enamel'd gardens all their charms display
And steal new lustre from thy roseate ray.
The flow'rets breathe perfumes around :
The lambskins o'er the vallies bound.
The feather'd tribes on ev'ry spray,
Welcome in the rising day.
From Thetis' oozy bed spring gentle gales,
That waft sweet odours from the flow'ry vales.
The flocks now pour along the plain,
And whiten all the hills again,
The fawns their wonted gambols play,
The kids o'er all the vallies stray
Now downy sleep forsakes the shepherd's eyes,
And to his bleating care he jocund hies.
The reaper now his sickle wields
And hastens to the yellow fields ;
The lowing herds all take their stand,
And wait the milker's easing hand.
The plowman now renews his wonted toil,
And lab'ring oxen turn the yielding soil.
The swain whom love deprives of rest,
Who feels soft tumults in his breast,
Now wanders by the whirling rills
That trickle down the verdant hills ;
His inward pains sigh forth in moving lays,
While pitying rocks sigh back the daniel's praise.
All Nature for thy vital rays
Renders 'o thee her grateful praise ;
The little warblers join for thee
In a vocal symphony ;
While ev'ry swain that wanders o'er the plains,
Joyful salutes thee in his rustic strains.
Dublin, 5th
April, 1777.

To SPRING.

A Deotour-muse, sweet Spring, once more,
To thee, her annual tribute pays ;
O that she cou'd (as wont before)
Present it now in happy lays !
But, this the wayward fates deny,
And licences of horror, war and woe,

Combin'd, each happier theme destroy,
And bid her strains to sorrow flow.
Thy social haunts and cheerful bow'rs,
Forsaken all and sad remain !
Unheeded, bloom thy choicest flow'rs,
Whilst civil rage usurps the plains !
Fair in the South, thy hand was seen,
Shedding its sweets in seasons past ;
'Till desolation seiz'd the green,
Borne on the North's destructive blast !
In vain, each gentle gale arose
To sigh for mercy from the foe ;
A Tyrant's breast no mercy knows,
His triumph, is to overthrow !
Goddess, do thou oppose his will,
Bid persecution's reign to cease ;
Protect us from impending ill,
And breathe on us the breath of peace.
So shall the voice of rural song,
Joyful once more resound thy praise ;
Birds, Rustics, Bards, a tuneful throng,
Unite to thee their grateful lays.

VERSES to Miss MARY J——, with Young's Night Thoughts.

BRIGHT maid, whose beauty shines devoid
Of art,
Whose mild behaviour wins each youthful heart,
Whose form would glad the Hermit's lonely cell,
Where stern severity is known to dwell ;
Cause thrilling raptures in his breast to flow,
And youthful crimson on his cheeks to glow ;
Whole better reason can these gusts controul,
And calm the boisterous transports of the soul,
Receive this work : — peruse it o'er and o'er,
On frequent reading you'll admire the more. —

The AIR PUMP.

DOMITIAN, as old story ring
(That most ridiculous of Kings)
Was wont whole days to divertile
In slaught'ring hoids of puny flies,
Preferring to all courtly joys
Sports only fit for Butchers boys.
But had the monarch learned the knowledge
Since practis'd by our modern college,
Of using their pneumatick engine,
Would have afforded pleasure swinging ;
The sight of every rare experiment
Had given his heart unusual merriment.
For instance—To have seen a moule,
Shut fast within its chrystal house,
And thence the air exhausted all,
To view the creature gasp and spawl ;
At ev'ry suction of the pump,
Observe him pant from head to rump,
Foam, kick and turn him on his back, —
T' had been ye powers a mighty knack !
What arts of choaking, tort'ring, killing,
Adepts to teach him had been willing ;
All nature he'd have known no doubt,
He would have pump'd her secrets out,

Doge,

Dogs, kittens, every four legg'd thing
Had been game royal for the King,
He'd been with lice and scabby vermin
Familiar as a cousin german,
Diverted with each day a new whim,
No toad had come amiss unto him.

Perhaps by novelty excited
Fresh objects had this prince delighted,
Known had but been the invention then,
He would have tried his pump on men,
Have found receivers apt and fit,
T' have made the operation hit.
Mercy! what sights! well worth a prying
A quite new way of courtier trying!
The beau, when fast included there,
More light than wind, that child of air,
Soon grown convulsed would droop and tire,
And with a pump or two expire.

The belle within a little second,
Would die, it safely may be reckoned
Creature that least confinement bears,
She cannot live without her airs,
Mere butterfly all gay and light
For ever flutt'ring in your sight.
Dull politicians, tools who seem
Made solely up of earth and phlegm,
Like moles in their deep shrouded cell,
Perhaps might stand the trial well.
Flat'ers, those ear-wigs, preft by the lumping,
Would yield an endless fund for pumping.
The empty coxcombs in that dloyster
With scull more thick than senseless oyster,
Could there no alteration know,
They always live in vacuo.

HISTORICAL

February 22.

THE ship Phoenix, from London to Gainborough, was unfortunately set on fire by a cinder's falling on a cat in the cabin, and the cat's running frightened into the half-deck, where was stowed a quantity of hemp, which instantly burst into a flame, and, more than 20 barrels of powder being on board, so intimidated the ship's company, that they quitted the vessel, to preserve their lives, and soon after she blew up.

Monday March 3.

The following bills received the royal assent by commission:

The bill to enable his Majesty to detain persons suspected of treason in America.

— to enable the Admiralty to grant letters of marque.

— to defray the charge of cloathing the militia.

— for regulating the affairs of the East India company.

— for enlarging Mr. Hartley's patent, and to a number of local and private bills.

Tuesday 4.

The Right Hon. Henry Dundas, Lord Advocate for Scotland, and Andrew Stuart, Esq; of Craighthon, are appointed keepers of his Majesty's Signet in Scotland.

Capt. Talbot, of the West Indies, with his wife and children, his father, and eight servants, were all unfortunately drowned in going aboard a West-india-man then lying ready to sail at Spithead.

Friday 7.

Was heard before the Lords a Scotch appeal, wherein Elizabeth Ross, widow, was appellant, and David Ross, Esq; comedian, her brother, was respondent. David Ross had been cut off by his father with a shilling, on account of his taking to the stage, and his sister was left sole heiress; but he sued and obtained a verdict in Scotland for all the out-standing bond-debts, which were considerable.—The Lords confirmed the decree.

At Oxford assizes, John Peter Le Matre, alias Matra, was tried for robbing the Ashmolean Museum of divers gold medals, a Queen Anne's five-guinea-piece, and two gold chains. It appeared in evidence, that the prisoner was first apprehended in Ireland; that two of the medals were found at his lodgings, in the drawers of a bureau of which he had the use; that a third was found fastened to the side of his waistcoat, like the ensign of an honorary order, which he wore, as a badge, to give him consequence. It appeared, likewise, that two other medals had been sold at Oxford; and that at Norwich he had disposed of the gold chains, and the other pieces with which he was charged: all these had been collected, and were produced against him. The manner he obtained them is said to be as follows:—He had been admitted into the Museum as a teacher of French, and in that character had frequent opportunities of being there alone; that at one of those times he had taken occasion to secret two of the medals, and at another to conceal himself in the Museum all night, and, after breaking open the cabinet where the medals were locked up, and possessing himself of the contents, he wrenched a bar out of a window, and made his escape unsuspected. But he soon afterwards being missed from Oxford, and upon enquiry it being discovered, that he went off in a post chaise and four; that he had pledged two medals to pay the post boy; with other circumstances; it was no longer a doubt but that he was the thief. He was therefore advertised and described, and by means of that advertisement apprehended. He was convicted on the clearest evidence; but it seems the crime did not amount to a capital felony; and he was sentenced to work on the Thames for five years.

Tuesday 11.

Orders were sent to Chatham for the immediate embarkation of 100 riflemen, for Gen. Howe's army, under the command of Capt. Ferguson.

Friday 14.

At Gloucester assizes, Joseph Armstrong was tried for petty treason, in poisoning his master's lady, Mrs. A'Court. The prisoner was hired into the family by Capt. A'Court, and shortly after attended his master and mistress to Cheltenham. The lady had expressed her dislike at the prisoner's conduct, and had intimated a wish that he might be discharged from their service. This being known to Armstrong, he determined on revenge, and by infusing small quantities of arsenic into his lady's tea, she contracted a disorder which carried her off in ten days. The jury found him guilty.

Extra

Extract of a letter from Paris.

Your papers have repeatedly mentioned the loss of the Pomona, in a storm off the Isle of Martinico; your Admiralty does not think proper to reveal all it knows; but the truth of the business is this: The Licorne, a French frigate of 32 guns, convoyed a Dutch ship out with arms and ammunition; they fell in with the Pomona at sea; she attempted to examine the Dutchman; the frigate of France commanded him to desist—the consequence was, an engagement ensued, and the Pomona sunk in the conflict.

Dr. Franklin is gone for Prussia; and so far has his negotiation succeeded, that England dare not take any Russians into her service, for then Prussia falls upon Hanover. I think a war inevitable, and your condition deplorable; I hear no other language in Paris.

General Howe's army, in the beginning of the year 1776, it is universally agreed, consisted of thirty-three thousand men. At the close of the summer's campaign, of the same year, the returns were one-and-twenty thousand. As all our victories, previous to that period, were, if we believe the Gazette, bloodless, it has puzzled politicians to account for this reduction of twelve thousand men. The following relation, which we have from an officer of the ——— now in England will, by accounting for no inconsiderable part, enable the reader to judge what is become of the rest. When it was resolved to force the American works at Kingsbridge, the above officer, with the 6th, 27th and 38th regiments, each consisting of nine hundred men, and headed by three hundred matrosses, was ordered to begin the attack. Our men marched up towards the works with the bravery of Britons. The Americans defended them with the resolutions of a people nobly struggling for liberty. Their fire, in short, was so dreadful, that though it was thought necessary to abandon the works to save the provincials from being surrounded, yet while it continued the whole element seemed to be in a flame. The officer assures us it was nothing but one continual storm, and that so well directed, that in a few minutes the whole corps of matrosses was cut off, but three hundred men of the three regiments left alive, and only six officers of the 6th. We are in possession of the gentleman's name who made this report, and his credit is not to be doubted. But as it might do him injury to say who he is, we leave those who are inclined to disbelieve the narration, to account in some better manner for the reduction of our troops at the end of the summer's campaign, from thirty-three to one-and-twenty thousand men.

Saturday evening the body of Miss Wilkes was taken out of the ruins of the late fire near Temple Bar. Some parts of her body were very much burnt.

The maid servant to Mr. Wilkes, who was said to have perished in the flames, at the above-mentioned fire, was found at a friend's house, in Crown-court, Butcher-row.

It is generally reported at the west end of the town, that Lord George Germaine is to succeed Lord North, if his ill state of health should disable him from service: It is also said that Lord

Camden will succeed Earl Bathurst if he should retire.

A court martial sat on Thursday at Whitehall, on a private man of the first regiment of guards, who was found guilty of having deserted to the rebels in America, and sentenced to be shot.

At Bow-street, before Sir J. Fielding, and the Magistrates, ——— Dignam, Esq; was charged by Mr. Clark, with defrauding him of various sums of money, under the pretence of procuring him a place under government. Mr. Clark deposed, that in June 1776, he got acquainted with the prisoner at a bookfeller's on Ludgate-hill, where he (the prisoner) was purchasing a book, and that from his discourse, he understood he was a gentleman in some capital employ under the crown, who had it in his power to dispose of places; and concluded the prisoner might serve him, as he wanted a place in one of the offices; and that being in his company two or three times afterwards, and mentioning his business, the prisoner first mentioned the place of Stewardship to a great gentleman in Ireland, which Mr. Clark objected to, as not being sufficiently permanent, and wanting some employ under the crown. That the prisoner proposed to him a lucrative place in the Irish customs, which he said had been possessed by a Mr. Clutterbuck, who was dead. On firm assurance, that the prisoner had it in his power to procure this place, he gave him, at his, the prisoner's request, 300l. at different times in money and notes, and on the 22d of July, 50l. in cash, and nine notes of hand for 50l. each, which have been since all paid, and especially on Sept. 5, 14l. 1s. for leave of absence from the said place; and in the months of August, October, and December, more cash and drafts on his banker, to the amount of 1200l. 1s. in the whole, 768l. of which were given on the account of the said place, which the prisoner called Clerk of his Majesty's Customs at Dublin. A paper was read produced by Mr. Clark, purporting to be a certificate and warrant of the said clerkship, numbered 24,897 Irish, Harcourt, Lieutenant, directed to John Clark, Esq; entitling him to all profits, &c. belonging to that place; subscribed Weymouth, Cleveland-Row, and witnessed E. Daw, all which former money, Mr. Clark gave the prisoner, in consequence of his receipt of that warrant, which, when he shewed to Sir Stanier Porten, proved to be a forgery.

Mr. Daw, Clerk in the Secretary of State's Office, also swore the name E. Daw was not wrote by him, nor did he believe the name of Weymouth, purporting to be the subscription of Lord Weymouth, was wrote by his Lordship. On close examination, it appeared that the said affixed, and which Mr. Daw knew nothing of, had been ingeniously cut off from another instrument, and artfully put on this warrant.

Sir John F. informed the prisoner what he was charged with, and told him the act of parliament, being the 30 George II. which ranked it as a fraud.

The prisoner in his defence, alledged, that he had been seized at Brixton, as a person suspected of High Treason, and that by virtue of a General Warrant, his papers had been taken from him, which if he had to produce, would clear him of the charge. The papers were immediately mediately sent for, and his boxes and trunks opened, but not one paper offered in vindication. Mr. Daw and Mr. Clark were bound over to prosecute in Westminster. The papers were at the Secretary of State's Office sealed up, and were all delivered to the prisoner, as well as his boxes, &c.

Joshua Browne, Esq; charged the prisoner with another fraud of the like kind. Mr. Brown deposed, that the prisoner was recommended to him by Mr. Clark, and that the prisoner told him he had the disposal of the place of Gazette-writer to the Ministry, which he would procure for him for 1000*l.* which disposal, the prisoner said, was conferred on him for some meritorious service he had then lately done the Government; and that Mr. Frazer, the present Gazette-writer, was to resign. This place Mr. Clark was commissioned by Mr. Browne to treat for, who agreed for 1000*l.* with the prisoner; which agreement Mr. B. ratified, by giving drafts for the money, inclusive of which was 137*l.* as a discharge of the office-fees. Another warrant similar to the former was read, dated 17 George III. durante bene placito, signed also Weymouth. Mr. Daw deposed as before, that it was no official instrument, nor his Lordship's writing: an impression, imitating a stamp, was also on the warrant, which proved to be the reverse of a guinea. The prisoner had also tendered an oath to Mr. Browne to resign all papers in case of dismissal, and purging himself of all felonies, &c. by way of qualification.

Mr. Browne, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Daw were again bound over to prosecute; and the prisoner committed till he could find sureties in at least double the sum.

[If common fame says true, Dignam was one on the pension list of Lord Weymouth, and received, for the benefit of his secret services, 300*l.* per annum, clear of all deductions. That he might appear deserving of the encouragement he met with, he is reported to have laid an information against the celebrated Mr. Beaumarchais, charging that gentleman, during his residence in England, with being a spy from the court of France. Not proving altogether successful in his charges, he abandoned the political line, and had recourse to expedients which afforded a greater latitude for the exertations of his genius. A regular establishment was found indispensably necessary. A chariot, and servants were therefore hired.]

Saturday 15.

The Hellsport, Capt. Lister, a transport from New York, that sailed 12 days after the packet, brings an account that the transports from Rhode Island, with 2700 troops on board, were arrived there; that the Continental Congress had established an order, called the Order of Independence; the badge which the members wear, is a green ribbon, with a star of six points, with America making offering to the shrine of liberty; and that they have likewise voted Mr. Washington protector of the United States.

D U B L I N.

Agreeable to the humane resolutions of the King's County Infirmary, 461 persons were in the course of last month inoculated by their surgeon at Birr and Shinroan, and not one died. If such noblemen and gentlemen whose estates lie contiguous to those other towns, where the like useful undertaking, of said county is to be carried on, in the course of this and the next year, do not subscribe to this charity, they must blame themselves if their tenantry feel the fatal effects of such their refusal. We have the happiness to hear 4 or 5 other counties are forming schemes of a similar nature, and we not doubt but it will soon be adopted by every county in the kingdom.

A duel was fought between two gentlemen, on the road in that part of the Phoenix Park which leads from the Ring to Sir Henry Cavendish's Lodge. Each gentleman fired without any disagreeable effect; the seconds then interposed and the affair terminated amicably. It is to be wished that gentlemen who take this method of deciding quarrels, would consider the danger that passengers are in from a pistol being fired in the middle of the day on a public road. The ball from one of their pistols was very near killing a countryman who was above one hundred yards from the scene of action, it lodged in a tree within a few inches of the poor fellow's head.

The following melancholy transaction happened at Kilkenny a few nights since: A dispute arose in a public company between two friends, (one a young man not more than 19 years old) which grew to such a height that the company were obliged to interpose and use every means to reconcile the parties, and at length the quarrel to all appearance subsided: the young man immediately left the room and went home; the other waited for some time, and then went homeward with two or three of the company; in his way thither he was unfortunately to pass by the door of the former, at which place the young bravo lay in wait for him with a small sword, and on his passing by called to him by name, expressed his sorrow for the disgracement, and requested he would give him his hand as a token of forgiveness; the other, not suspecting any ill, gave his hand, when the young villain plunged the sword through his friend's body, and then made his escape; shortly after this shocking act, the gentlemen associated for preserving the peace of the county Kilkenny happened to pass by where the wounded man lay, and learning the particulars, divided into different parties, pursued the villain, overtook him about nine miles from the place, and lodged him in the jail of that city. The man died about three o'clock next morning.

The 26th of February last died at Munich, in Germany, Peter Fierville, comedian, aged 107 years: he remembered to have seen Moliere in his infancy, was cotemporary with Baron, and had played as a comedian before Charles the Second of England, and Christina queen of Sweden. He was entered among the King's comedians at Paris in 1735, among whom he remained till 1741.

Last week a poor tradesman, whose business led him to this city from the county of Cavan, was on his arrival pressed on board a tender. The poor man being questioned as to his knowledge of maritime affairs, declared himself totally ignorant, having never in his life been at sea; on this a man hackneyed in the trade appeared, and deposed he had been his ship-mate for above three years. This fellow's evidence outweighed every argument in favour of the unfortunate man, who was confined for three days on board the tender, at a distance from his home, his friends, and every kind of relief. At last his condition, supported by the credit of a respectable gentleman, reached the ears of the right hon. the lord mayor, who immediately procured his enlargement, and advised the poor man to prosecute the fellow on whose evidence he was confined; but he informed his lordship that he was utterly incapable, being stripped of his entire stock (three shillings) in three days confinement; on which his lordship generously supplied his necessities, and also enabled him to carry on the prosecution against his kidnapper.

HIBERNIAN MAGAZINE:

O R,

Compendium of Entertaining Knowledge,

For M A Y, 1777.

Having in our Magazine for February last, Page 109, given some Particulars of the Person and Family of his Excellency the present Lord Lieutenant of this Kingdom, we here subjoin an elegant Engraving of that Noble Personage, to adorn the above Article.

Narrative of the Trial of Joseph Stacpoole, Esq; William Gapper, Attorney at Law, and James Lagier, Bailiff, before the Hon. Judge Aston, at Maidstone Assize, March 20, 1777.

THE indictment charged Joseph Stacpoole with willfully, maliciously, and feloniously shooting at John Parker, Esq; and wounding him with three leaden bullets, in a certain dwelling-house at Dartford, in the county of Kent; and William Gapper and James Lagier, with being present, aiding, and abetting the said Joseph Stacpoole while he the said felony did commit.

Mr. Sylvester, Counsel for the prosecution, opened the indictment; and Mr. Serjeant Glynn proceeded to explain the nature of the offence, which, he said, was such, if fully proved, as rendered the prisoners liable by the statute to capital punishment.

He then stated the facts as set forth in his instructions. Mr. Parker, he said, is a gentleman of fortune in Ireland; Mr. Stacpoole, a gentleman of the profession of the law, who negotiates the advance of money by commission, and was so employed, 1777.

employed by Mr. Parker; Mr. Gapper is an attorney connected in the suit; and Mr. Lagier a bailiff for the purpose of arresting Mr. Parker.

Mr. Parker, having embarrassed his affairs, found it necessary to leave the kingdom, till he could retrieve his fortune, and put himself again in cash. In a running account between Mr. Parker and Mr. Stacpoole, there might be a balance due to the latter, and the former might have reasons for not communicating to him his intention of going to France. Mr. Parker, however, took some friends with him to Dartford; and that Mr. Stacpoole should be no loser, he there executed proper securities for the recovery of his money. Mr. Stacpoole being wholly ignorant of this transaction, and apprehensive that Mr. P. meant to defraud him, sued out writs against Mr. P. not only for his own money, but for a debt also of 800l. due to another person. These writs were specially directed to Lagier; and Mr. S. with Gapper, set out from London armed with a design to see them executed.

When they arrived at Dartford, which was on the 17th of August, 1775, they got intelligence that the prosecutor was at the Bull-inn, in that town, and that he was in a certain room with some friends, to which they gained access, by pretending that the company they came in pursuit of were swindlers. No sooner had they entered the room, than the gun in Mr. Stacpoole's hand was discharged, as the Counsel was instructed to say, at Mr. Parker, and Mr. Parker instantly fell down.—So far the Counsel.

The company in the room with the prosecutor was, Mr. Francis Parker, brother to John, a Mr. Ball, and a Mr. Masterfon, who called himself a merchant. Of these, Mr. Francis Parker in the confusion, set out for London; Mr. Ball was so frightened, that he jumped over the rails from the room where the fray happened; and Masterfon ran down stairs: so that the prosecutor appears to have been left for some time to bleed by himself. And it appeared, by the evidence of the surgeon, that three balls had gone through his body, and it should seem that two of the balls had made but one wound in going out, there being three wounds before, and but two behind, one of which was very near the spine.

It were in vain to enter into the particulars of the evidence, as only one of them [Ball] swore positively to the shooting, designedly, at the prosecutor, and he was contradicted by a gentleman of unquestionable credit, who swore, that, at the time of the accident, and the morning after, he declared to him that he did not think the prisoner capable of such an act. This gentleman was Mr. Atkinson, a corn-factor, who, in his way to Margate, with his family, lay at Dartford the night on which the accident happened; and his evidence states, that, hearing it reported that a man was shot, he went from his inn to the Bull, and on entering the room where the prosecutor lay, he addressed himself to Lagier, who, by the singularity of his dress, among many people there assembled, first attracted his notice; that Lagier told him he came there with a couple of gentlemen, and had three warrants to arrest Mr. John Parker and his brother Francis; that upon entering the room, and shewing his authority, he said, I arrest you, Mr. John Parker, in the King's name; that Mr. John Parker (the wounded gentleman) instantly jumped up, and said, Zounds, where are my pistols? that on Mr. Parker's calling for his pistols, he, Lagier, cried out for help; that Mr. Stacpoole and Mr. Gapper instantly entered; and in the mean time one of the company clapped his hand on one candle, and put it out, and threw down the other, there being two on the table, which fell on the ground, and giving a glimmering light, he saw Ball seize Mr. Stacpoole by the collar, and force him back; that in the scuffle a small gun, which Mr. Stacpoole had in his hand, went off, and Mr. Parker fell. That the witness had scarce heard this account, when Mr. Ball, Mr. Masterfon, Mr. Stacpoole, and Mr. Gapper, all impatiently pressed to be heard; but Ball speaking much louder than the rest, was the first who commanded his attention. He said, he would shew how unreasonable such an arrest was, and shewed me a bond in justification on the debtor's part, that they intended to secure Mr. Stacpoole; to which I replied, that I was an entire stranger to all the parties and their affairs; but were it my case I should consider the bond of a man going out of the kingdom as a slender security. This rather staggered Mr. Ball. He said, if they did not like that, they had the money ready at their bankers. The witness thought this more extraordinary still, if the money was ready, to offer a bond for six months, and so he expressed himself. This reply seemed to silence Mr. Ball for a moment, when Mr. Stacpoole seized the opportunity to speak, and, as the witness upon his oath declared, addressed Ball nearly in the following words: "That the moment when Lagier called for assistance, and I entered the door, you flew at me, collared me, and knocked me down; I have a weakness in one knee, which occasioned your blow to have greater effect than it would, for I immediately dropped, and in the fall the carbine went off, of which you are the author." And this Ball did not deny.

This witness said farther, that going next morning to enquire how Mr. Parker did, he entered again into conversation with Ball; and having urged the improbability of Mr. Stacpoole's shooting his debtor at the risk of his own life, as well as the loss of his debt, unless he supposed him to be out of his senses; his answer was, "no, he did not think he was that man neither."

Mr. Stacpoole, in his defence, gave a short narrative of his dealings with the prosecutor, in the course of which, said he, "I was indiscreet enough to suffer his entreaties to prevail on me to enter into engagements for him, by which, as it has eventually turned out, I have sacrificed my own peace to the relief of his necessities. I advanced money for him till I was myself distressed; and when I had it no longer to advance, I pledged my credit in support of his. I accepted bills for his service. I stamp'd credit on others by indorsing them; and thus entangled myself to the amount of near 3000*l.* for the relief of a man who has since appeared unworthy of my services and friendship." Mr. Stacpoole then entered into particulars, in which we want room to follow him. But after recounting a variety of friendships during two years labour and attention devoted to their service, he asks, What did common justice require from both the brothers? at least, he said, a return of the money which he had actually expended in releasing them from confinement; but to his cost, he soon found that he had nothing to hope for either from their gratitude or their justice. He called at their lodgings, which he found they had changed, and with them their very names. At length, after near three months fruitless enquiries after these gentlemen, he was informed, by accident, that they were preparing to decamp for France; and by the vigilance of his servant he procured intelligence of the very day on which they were to set out. It was then that he ordered his attorney, Mr. Gapper, to issue writs against the Parkers, and resolved to accompany the bailiff to see them executed, prevailing, at the same time, on Mr. Gapper to be of the party.

Not to tire the reader with a variety of uninteresting circumstances, all of them material to clear up the character of the prisoner, but of little consequence to the public, we shall just recite the fact as stated by Mr. Stacpoole, and conclude this account.

"The fact is," said he, "that, on our arrival at the Bull, we agreed that the waiter should go first into the room, that Lagier, whilst the door was open, might have a view of the company, to know whether the Mr. Parkers were there; that he should then follow the waiter, and arrest them both; if they resisted he was to call for assistance, and we, who waited in the gallery, were then to enter to his aid. It has been said, and I am ready to confess it, that I did give out, that the persons who were the objects of our pursuit were swindlers, hoping thereby to engage the bystanders in my behalf, well knowing that the people, in general, are not very zealous in assisting in the arrest of debtors.

"John King, the waiter, has told you that he went first into the room; that he was returning to the door with two decanters in his hand when Lagier entered, and that Mr. Gapper and I followed. If Mr. Gapper and Lagier had not been joined in this indictment, which could have been done with no other view than to deprive me of their testimony, and which will show you the complexion of this prosecution, they would tell you what they have already deposed before Lord Mansfield, "that King, the waiter, went first into the room; that Lagier followed, and said to the Mr. Parkers, I arrest you in the King's name; that Mr. John Parker started from his chair, and called for his pistols; that then Lagier demanded assistance, on which I entered the room, followed by Mr. Gapper; that Ball put out one candle, threw down the other, and immediately rushed to the door to prevent my entrance; and that in collaring and pushing me back the carbine went off."—Such was the fact.

The jury, without going out of court, or putting the Judge to the trouble of summing up the evidence, pronounced all the three prisoners not Guilty.

Account of the Death of David Hume, Esq; in a letter from Adam Smith, LL. D. to William Strahan, Esq.

Kirkcaldy, Fifeshire, Nov. 9, 1776.

Dear Sir,

IT is with a real, though a very melancholy pleasure, that I sit down to give you some account of the behaviour of our late excellent friend Mr. Hume, during his last illness.

Though, in his own judgment, his disease was mortal and incurable, yet he allowed himself to be prevailed upon, by the entreaty of his friends, to try what might be the effects of a long journey. A few days before he set out, he wrote that account of his own life, which, together with his other papers, he has left to your care.

He set out for London towards the end of April, and at Morpeth met with Mr. John Hume and myself, who had both come down from London on purpose to see him, expecting to have found him at Edinburgh. Mr. Hume returned with him, and attended him during the whole of his stay in England, with that care and attention which might be expected from a temper so perfectly friendly and affectionate.—As I had written to my mother that she might expect me in Scotland, I was under the necessity of continuing my journey. His disease seemed to yield to exercise and change of air; and when he arrived in London, he was apparently in much better health than when he left Edinburgh. He was advised to go to Bath to drink the waters, which appeared for some time to have so good an effect upon him, that even he himself began to entertain, what he was not apt to do, a better opinion of his own health. His symptoms, however, soon returned with their usual violence, and from that moment he gave up all thoughts of recovery; but submitted with the utmost cheerfulness, and most perfect complacency and resignation. Upon his return to Edinburgh, though he found himself much weaker, yet his cheerfulness never abated, and he continued to divert himself, as usual, with correcting his own works for a new edition; with reading books of amusement; with the conversation of his friends; and sometimes in the evening, with a party at his favourite game of whist. His cheerfulness was so great, and his conversation and amusements ran so much in their usual strain, that, notwithstanding all bad symptoms, many people could not believe he was dying. "I shall tell your friend Col. Edmonstone," said Doctor Dundas to him one day, "That I left you much better, and in a fair way of recovery."—"Doctor," said he, "as I believe you would not chuse to tell any thing but the truth, you had better tell him, that I am dying as fast as my enemies, if I have any, could wish; and as easily and cheerfully as my best friends could desire." Col. Edmonstone soon afterwards came to see him, and took leave of him; and, on his way home, he could not forbear writing him a letter, bidding him once more an eternal adieu, and applying to him, as to a dying man, the beautiful French verses in which the Abbe Chaulieu, in expectation of his own death, laments his approaching separation from his friend, the Marquis de la Fare. Mr. Hume's magnanimity and firmness were such, that his most affectionate friends knew, that they hazarded nothing in talking or writing to him as to a dying man, and that so far from being hurt by this frankness, he was rather pleased and flattered by it. I happened to come into his room while he was reading this letter, which he had just received, and which he immediately shewed me. I told him, that though I was sensible how very much he was weakened, and that appearances were in many respects very bad, yet his cheerfulness was still so great, the spirit of life seemed still to be so very strong in him, that I could not help entertaining some faint hopes. He answered, "Your hopes are groundless. An habitual diarrhœa of more than a year's standing, would be a very bad disease at any age: at my age it is a mortal one.—When I lie down in the evening, I feel myself weaker than when I rose in the morning, and when I rise in the morning weaker than when I lay down in the evening. I am sensible, besides, that some of my vital parts are affected, so that I must soon die."—"Well," said I, "if it must be so, you have at least the satisfaction of leaving all your friends, your brother's family in particular, in great prosperity." He said, that he felt that satisfaction so sensibly, that when he was reading a few days before, Lucian's Dialogues of the Dead, among all the excuses which are alledged to Charon for not entering readily into his boat, he could not find one that fitted him; he had no house to finish, he had no daughter to provide for, he had no enemies upon whom he wished to revenge himself. "I could not well imagine," said he, "what excuse I could make to Charon in order to obtain a little delay. I have done every thing of consequence which I ever meant to do, and I could at no time expect to leave my relations and friends in a better situation than that in which I am now likely to leave them; I therefore have all reason to die contented." He then diverted himself with inventing several jocular excuses, which he supposed he might make to Charon; and with imagining the very surly answers which it might suit the character of Charon to return to them. "Upon further consideration," said he, "I thought I might say to him, Good Charon! I have been correcting my works for a new Edition. Allow me a little time, that I may see how the public receives the alterations." But Charon would answer, "When you have seen the effect of these, you will be for making other alterations. There will be no end of such excuses; so, honest friend, please step into the boat." But I might still urge, "Have a little patience, Good Charon! I have been endeavouring to open the eyes of the public. If I live a few years longer, I may have the satisfaction of seeing the downfall of some of the prevailing systems of superstition."—But Charon would then lose all temper and decency. "You loitering rogue, that will not happen these many hundred years.—Do you fancy I will grant you a lease for so long a term? Get into the boat this instant, you lazy, loitering rogue!"

But, though Mr. Hume always talked of his approaching dissolution with great cheerfulness, he never affected to make any parade of his magnanimity. He never mentioned the subject but when conversation naturally led to it; and never dwelt longer upon it than the course of the conversation happened to require; it was a subject, indeed, which occurred pretty frequently, in consequence of the enquiries which his friends, who came to see him, naturally made concerning the state of his health. The conversation which I mentioned above, and which passed on the 8th of August, was the last, except one, that I ever had with him. He had now become so very weak, that the company of

of his most intimate friends fatigued him ; for his cheerfulness was still so great, his complaisance and social disposition were still so entire, that when any friend was with him, he could not help talking more, and with greater exertion, than suited the weakness of his body. At his own desire, therefore, I agreed to leave Edinburgh, where I was staying partly upon his account, and returned to my mother's house here, at Kirkaldy, upon condition that he would send for me whenever he wished to see me; the Physician who saw him most frequently, Doctor Black, undertaking, in the mean time, to write me occasionally an account of the state of his health.

On the 22d of August the Doctor wrote me the following letter :

" Since my last, Mr. Hume has passed his time pretty easily, but is much weaker. He sits up, goes down stairs once a day, and amuses himself with reading, but seldom sees any body. He finds that even the conversation of his most intimate friends fatigues and oppresses him ; and it is happy that he does not need it, for he is quite free from anxiety, impatience, or low spirits, and passes his time very well with the assistance of amusing books."

I received the day after a letter from Mr. Hume himself, of which the following is an extract.

Edinburgh, Aug. 23, 1776.

" My Dearest Friend,

" I am obliged to make use of my nephew's hand in writing to you, as I do not rise to-day. * * * *

" I go very fast to decline, and last night had a small fever, which I hope might put a quicker period to this tedious illness, but unluckily it has, in a great measure, gone off.—I cannot submit to your coming over here on my account, as it is possible for me to see you so small a part of the day ; but Doctor Black can better inform you concerning the degree of strength which may from time to time remain with me. Adieu, &c."

Three days after I received the following letter from Doctor Black :

Edinburgh, Monday, Aug. 26, 1776.

" Dear Sir,

" Yesterday about four o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Hume expired. The near approach of his death became evident in the night between Thursday and Friday, when his disease became excessive, and soon weakened him so much, that he could no longer rise out of his bed. He continued to the last perfectly sensible, and free from much pain or feelings of distress. He never dropped the smallest expression of impatience ; but when he had occasion to speak to the people about him, always did it with affection and tenderness. I thought it improper to write to bring you over, especially as I heard that he had dictated a letter to you, desiring you not to come. When he became very weak, it cost him an effort to speak, and he died in such a happy composure of mind, that nothing could exceed it.

" Thus died our excellent, and never to be forgotten friend ; concerning whose philosophical opinions men will, no doubt, judge variously, every one approving or condemning them, according as they happen to coincide or disagree with his own ; but concerning whose character and conduct there can scarce be a difference of opinion. His temper, indeed, seemed to be more happily balanced, if I may be allowed such an expression, than that perhaps of any other man I have ever known.—Even in the lowest state of his fortune, his great and necessary frugality never hindered him from exercising, upon proper occasions, acts both of charity and generosity. It was a frugality founded, not upon avarice, but upon the love of independency.—The extreme gentleness of his nature never weakened either the firmness of his mind, or the steadiness of his resolutions. His constant pleasantry was the genuine effusion of good-nature and good-humour, tempered with delicacy and modesty ; and without even the slightest tincture of malignity, so frequently the disagreeable source of what is called wit in other men. It never was the meaning of his raillery to mortify ; and therefore, far from offending, it seldom failed to please and delight, even those who were the objects of it. To his friends, who were frequently the objects of it, there was not perhaps any one of all his great and amiable quantities which contributed more to endear his conversation. And that gaiety of temper, so agreeable in society, but which is so often accompanied with frivolous and superficial qualities, was in him certainly attended with the most severe application, the most extensive learning, the greatest depth of thought, and a capacity in every respect the most comprehensive. Upon the whole, I have always considered him, both in his life time and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man, as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit.

ADAM SMITH."

Authentic Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Rev. William Dadd, DD. LL.D.

THE many private virtues, and the eminent literary abilities of the unfortunate subject of these memoirs, made it long thought thought that the public would not have been presented with any anecdotes of his life, till the period of it had been closed in peace, and he had left the pious odour of a good name to have adorned his memory; but such is the instability of human affairs, and the frailty of the most upright of us, that nothing permanent is to be expected. The greatest and wisest of mankind have fallen into errors, nay into crimes; which ought to teach all men not to confide in learning, or a continuance in the paths of rectitude, without a constant and earnest application for divine assistance, to support their feet, lest they deviate from the straight line of virtue: and, to use the words of Scripture, let him that standeth take heed lest he fall.—And whilst they preach to others they are not themselves cast away, a melancholy example of which we have in this gentleman.

Doctor Dodd descended from a very antient family, which was originally Danish, the first ancestor coming to England with Harold the first, and settled in Cheshire, where in the visitation in 1307, Jasper Dodd was found possessed of thirteen hides of land. He had a numerous progeny, which in process of time, settled in divers places; the eldest branch in Cheshire, the second in the counties of Sligo and Fermanagh, in Ireland, and the third at Dumfries in Scotland.

From the Cheshire branch descended the Dodds of Northumberland, Lincolnshire, and Berkshire; in which last county, at present, lives John Dodd of Swallowfield, Esq; lieutenant colonel of the Berkshire militia, and member in the present parliament (as well as in the two last) for Reading in that county. Of the Northumberland Dodds, was Humphrey Dodd, Esq; page of the presence to his royal highness the late Duke of Cumberland, and Doctor Pierce Dodd, late physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. From the Lincolnshire branch came the present subject of our enquiry, and from the Dodd's of Dumfries descended Mr. Robert Dodd, now first surgeon to his Majesty's Royal Naval Hospital at Haslar, near Portsmouth. In short, every branch of this very antient family hath produced men, respectable for their virtues, their learning and their abilities in their several professions.—Alas! that one of them should be so unhappy as to stain a long line of virtuous ancestry.

The immediate ancestor of Dr. William Dodd, was the Rev. Mr. Dodd, rector of Bourn in Lincolnshire, where William was born, in the year 1726. He received the first tinctures of learning from his father, and at Grantham school, in the same county. His early love for literature gave pleasure to his parents and preceptors, who beheld in him a quickness of apprehension, and an earnestness of application, which gave certain presages of the rank he held afterwards in the republic of letters. From his infancy he imbibed a knowledge of the sublime truths of our holy religion, which is now his only support under affliction; the example of his father made him, when very young, turn his thoughts to the church, and in the year 1734 he was matriculated in Clare-hall, in the university of Cambridge.

From his entrance into the college, he redoubled his assiduity, fired with the laudable pride of striving to excel in learning all his fellow students of his standing and age. The hours which many others sacrificed to pleasures and dissipation, he dedicated to study. Besides a thorough knowledge of Latin, he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the Greek and Hebrew; rightly judging that a man who cannot read the sacred scriptures in their original languages, cannot be thought properly qualified to explain them to his flock: His obligations as a clergyman, were ever before his eyes, and he omitted no opportunity to attain to a perfect knowledge of them.

Whilst he was at the university, to unbend his mind from the severer studies, he read occasionally the best of our English poets, and thence derived a taste for composition in verse, as well as prose. But though he frequently paid his addresses to the muses, they never detached him from the time requisite for acquiring a knowledge of divinity and polemics, and he returned from the university in 1746 a learned and accomplished young man.

About the close of that year he entered into holy orders, and was for some time curate at Bourn, when afterwards, on his father's death, he came to London.

As old Mr. Dodd had generally lived to very near the extent of his income, he had not much fortune to leave to his son, but he had spared no expence in his education, and the young man's friends had strong hopes that his natural and acquired abilities would procure him a proper establishment in London, the great mart for literature.

Soon after Mr. Dodd's arrival in town, his merits as a preacher became universally acknowledged. He shunned that cold languid manner of reading their sermons, which some clergymen miscall preaching. After Mr. Dodd had written his sermons, he generally committed them to memory, and altho' he brought his notes with him into the pulpit, to comply with common custom, custom, yet he seldom cast his eye upon them, but delivered himself with that earnestness that could not but gain upon every hearer. Hence the beauty of holiness appeared so enticing in a young man, that it allured many, and wherever he preached the church was crowded.

But tho' he procured reputation, he had not yet got into the road to profit. His first advancement was his being chosen joint lecturer of the parish of St. Olave, Hart-street. But the income he derived from that lectureship was not sufficient to support the necessary expences which the city of London obliges a man in a decent station to incur. Hence, by the advice of some of his friends, he opened an academy for the instruction of youth, at Plaitow in Essex. His learning eminently qualified him for that arduous task, and the character he had justly acquired for piety and morality, made parents readily confide their children to his care.

Still his income, altho' encreasing, required additions, which he strove to gain by an exertion of his literary abilities. He at first published the Beauties of Shakespeare, in two volumes in twelves, which were well received by the public, introduced him to the knowledge of fundry book-sellers, who, in London, are great encouragers of genius: and also displayed his taste to many noble patrons of learning, who began to take great notice of him.

It has been objected by some over-rigidly-pious people, that a divine should spend any part of his time in reading or considering the beauties of dramatic writers. But Mr. Dodd knew well that many are allured to virtue by the charms of poetry; he beheld Shakespeare not only as a dramatic poet, but as a great judge of nature and an excellent moral philosopher. He therefore did not think his time mispent in pointing out the admonitions against vice, which are so liberally strewed throughout all Shakespeare's works; and such strict censurers should remember, that the Right Reverend the present Lord Bishop of Gloucester did not think it any derogation to his sacred character and function to publish an edition of that great author, and write explanatory notes. And some of the earliest attempts in the drama were made by John Bale, bishop of Ossory.

Mr. Dodd's next publication was a new translation from the Greek of the Hymns of Callimachus, with very copious notes. A fresh instance of his taste and learning, and from hence forward he was beheld in a very respectable light by the literati of the age.

Some Account of the famous O'Reiley, Governor of Madrid, and Generalissimo of the Spanish Forces. From Dalrymple's Travels through Spain and Portugal.

AT the battle of Campo Santo, in Italy, he was wounded and left in the field; an Austrian soldier was just going to give him the coup de grace, before he stripped and plundered him, when he prevented it, by telling the soldier, he did not know his prize, for that he was the son of the Duke of Arcos, a grandee of Spain; this declaration held the plunderer's hand, and he conducted his imaginary treasure to Marshal Brown, to whom the artful captive made himself known; the Marshal, pleased with the deceit, ordered physicians to attend him, and sent him back with éclat to the Spanish camp: the Dukes of Arcos hearing the story, ever after patronized him, and hurried him on to a company, and a majority; in the last German war he went a volunteer to the Austrian army, but speaking too freely, he was obliged to quit it; when he joined the French, and served under Broglie; on the breaking out of the Spanish war, he returned to Spain, where he issued a good deal on his knowledge acquired in the German campaigns; was made a Colonel and Brigadier; after the peace, was sent to take possession of New Orleans, where his feats of baseness and cruelty are recorded; however, they only served to ingratiate him with the Sovereign; for his promotion has been, from that time, most rapid; though amongst the youngest of the Major-generals, he was made a Lieutenant-general, and Inspector-general of the infantry, over the heads of many of the first people in the kingdom. Here we may say, with Polybius, "that in an arbitrary state, the zeal and courage of mercenaries are rewarded with new advantages; for a tyrant, in proportion as his honours are increased, has still greater need of such assistance; for by accumulating injuries, he adds to the number of those whom he has reason to fear. The very safety, therefore, of every tyrant, depends wholly upon the strength and attachment of his foreign soldiers." As he has the ear of the Kings he does just what he pleases in his line; the number of things he has to give, cause many to pay him fulsome adulation; but his imperious behaviour must make him hated and despised; and should he once lose the smiles of the Prince, he would soon be hurried from his pinnacle of honour, and precipitated to ruin, without a friend to console him.

To the EDITOR.

I Proposed sending you some Memoirs of the late Mr. Henry Woodward; but looking over your Magazine for October, 1776, I find the task in a great measure done to my hand, in your Tete-a-Tete for that month, under the denominations of Captain Bobadil and Mrs. B—ll—y. I shall therefore only mention a few particulars that have escaped the writer of those memoirs.

Mr. Woodward was born the 2d of October, 1714, and came upon the stage about the year 1738. Although he made his first public appearance in pantomime, in the character of harlequin, he soon displayed theatrical talents of a superior kind; he became one of our best comedians, and remained unrivalled in many characters, such as Captain Bobadil, Marplot, Mercutio, &c. It is true, he was a mannerist, but being constantly perfect in his parts, and entering into the true spirit of his author, he was always a pleasing, and, in his capital parts, the most superior actor upon the stage.

In private life his character was very amiable; he was friendly, sincere, and generous. Regular in his conduct, being neither addicted to gaming or the bottle. The alliance he made with Mrs. Bellamy continued for near ten years, and their friendship subsisted at the time of his death. Being a prudent, economical man, he saved a considerable sum of money, which he has bequeathed this lady, as a testimonial of his great regard for her. To many of his old acquaintance he has left tokens of his friendship, particularly a ring to Mr. Garrick, with whom he had lived near thirty-seven years upon the most cordial terms; this gentleman entertaining a great esteem for Mr. Woodward.

His complaint was a disorder in his kidneys. When he was pronounced much better by his physicians, he relapsed, and survived his last benefit, which he had been incapable of acting in, but a few days.

For farther particulars of the life of Mr. Woodward, your readers are referred to the Tete-a-Tete above-mentioned.

Bon Mot of the celebrated Dr. Franklin.

During the doctor's residence in England, previous to our present unhappy troubles across the Atlantic, a countryman of his own, just arrived from Philadelphia, called to pay his respects to him, and to deliver a few letters with which he had been entrusted for him.

It happened to be one of the doctor's days for receiving company, when, as usual, the room was full of visitors; but unfortunately the footman, in reaching the stranger a chair, threw down, and totally demolished, a curious and most superb weather-glass, which had cost upwards of thirty guineas, and which its owner would not have parted with on any consideration whatever.

Nothing could exceed the concern of the gentleman, who immediately began to apologize for the footman, and to take the whole blame upon himself.

"Pooh! pooh, (interrupted the doctor, with the true spirit of a philosopher) never mind, Sir, to tell you the truth, I think myself much obliged to you. I don't know what weather you have had at sea, but we have had a very dry season in England. We now, I hope, shall have rain; for I protest I never saw the glass so low in my life."

Bon Mot of our Modern Aristophanes.

WHEN Mr. Foote was lately attacked with a paralytic stroke, he happened to fall from his chair, and in that fall strained his thumb a little. A friend of his calling on him a few days afterwards, and seeing him a good deal recovered from the accident, enquired how his thumb was? "O! pretty well! I thank you (says the wit, stretching out the arm that received the paralytic stroke) you see 'tis on the mending hand."

Character of Roscius, by the late Dr. Smollett.

IT is not for the qualities of his heart, that this little Parasite is invited to the tables of Dukes and Lords, who hire extraordinary cooks for his entertainment.—His avarice they see not; his hypocrisy accommodates itself to their humours, and is of consequence pleasing, but he is chiefly courted for his buffoonery, and will be admitted into the choicest parties of quality for his talent of mimicking Punch, and his wife Joan, when a poet of the most exquisite genius is not able to attract the least regard.

The Trial (at large) of James Hill; otherwise James Hind; otherwise James Adzen: for feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously setting fire to the Rope-House, in his Majesty's Dock-yard at Portsmouth. Tried at the Assizes at Winchester, on Thursday, March 6, 1777. Before the Hon. Sir William Henry Ashbursh, Knt. one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench; and Sir Beaumont Hotham, Knt. one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer.

(Concluded from p. 251 in our last.)

Elizabeth Boxell sworn.

Q. HAVE you ever seen the prisoner at the bar before?

Boxell. I have.

Q. When did you see him?

Boxell. The day before the yard was on fire, at my house.

Q. Where is your house?

Boxell. At No. 10, Barrack-street, Portsmouth; he came to me for a lodging.

Q. Did he lodge at your house?

Boxell. One night.

Q. What night was that?

Boxell. The night before the fire happened.

Q. Did you observe any thing particular relating to him, or the room he lodged in?

Boxell. I observed a very sulphureous smell on the Friday, and on the Saturday.

Q. That was when he first came to your house?

Boxell. Yes, on the morning of the Saturday, my house was in a very great smell and smoke; I went up stairs and pushed open the door, and I could not see my hand before me, because of the smoke; there was a sulphureous smell in the room and the grate; I asked him what he was about, whether he was going to set my house on fire? He asked me what I was afraid of? I said I was afraid he was going to set my house on fire, for fire was a thing I much dreaded; he asked me if I had ever suffered by fire? I said no, God forbid I ever should, for fire was very dreadful to me; I was much afraid of fire.

Q. Did you observe what occasioned the smoke in the room?

Boxell. As I was making the bed, I turned round and saw he had been burning something on the hob by the fire-place.

Q. Did you observe any thing else in the room?

Boxell. He had a lighted candle on Saturday morning; he had had a little bit of candle carried up stairs in a candlestick for him, but the candle that I took from him in the room was not the same candle that I carried up stairs for him, for it was about half an eight candle; he had something in a chair which he was doing something with, but I could not tell what it was. I carried the candle down stairs, and went up again immediately, as fast as possible; I opened the window a little before I went down; when I came up again he had shut it; I said I would not have my window shut by him or any other man; that if I chose to have it open it should be open.

Q. Did you observe any thing else, at any other time when you was in the room?

Boxell. On the Friday when he came out of the room I went up, I saw his bundle; I went to carry it to one of the neighbours to wash; when I opened it, I saw part of an old shirt, a pair of leather breeches, a top of a tin case; I viewed the tin case; a quarter of an hour to be sure.

Q. Look at that tin case?

Boxwell. I viewed it from this part (pointing to a particular part of the machine) I think this is the same canister, it is as much like it as one thing can possibly be like another; I really believe it to be the same.

Q. You say you had some dispute with him about filling your room with smoke. Did you tell him he should go away from your house?

Boxell. I ordered him out of my house; he said it was hard he could not be permitted to put his things up; I told him no, he should quit the room; he then said that the candle I carried down in the candlestick was his, and that he wanted it; I told him he might take it as he went down stairs; this was on Saturday morning between nine and ten, then he left my house, and he never returned again.

Court. What became of the bundle?

Boxell. He carried the bundle in his left hand, and I saw him into High-street, for I got into the middle of the road and watched him; I never saw him afterwards.

Q. Do you know whether the canister was in the bundle when he took it?

Boxell. I cannot say; I saw the canister on Friday, I did not see it on Saturday.

James Gambier, Esq; sworn.

Mr. Gambier. I have here the bundle that has been spoken of by the witness; I received it from my first clerk John Jeffereys; it has been in my possession ever since; it is exactly in the same state now as when I received it; I received it on the 21st of February in the morning, about 9 o'clock.

Eliz. Boxell. I believe that to be the bundle; it is tied up in an handkerchief of the same pattern.

Q q

John

John Jeffereys sworn.

Q. Do you know that bundle?

Jeffereys. That is the handkerchief, I believe; indeed I have no doubt of it; Commissioner Gambier gave orders on the evening of Thursday the 20th of February for search to be made in North-street and the neighbourhood, for such a bundle.

Q. Where did you go to make that search?

Jeffereys. I ordered a junior clerk, and a messenger of the office to make that search in North-street and its neighbourhood; they came back in about an hour's time, and told me they had searched that street except a few houses, in one of which particularly the person was not at home; I went next morning, and found this bundle at Mrs. Cole's, in North-street; I delivered it to Mr. Gambier.

Ann Cole sworn.

Q. Look at the prisoner, do you know him?

Cole. I do.

Q. When did you see him?

Cole. On the day of the fire.

Q. Where did you see him?

Cole. At my house in North-street, on Portsmouth Common.

Q. What was the occasion of his coming to your house?

Cole. To take a lodging: he took one.

Q. Did he leave any thing when he went away?

Cole. He left a bundle.

Q. Is that the bundle?

Cole. It looks like it.

Q. What became of that bundle?

Cole. I delivered it to Mr. Jeffereys and Mr. Calden.

Q. Had you kept the bundle from the time the prisoner left it with you, till you gave it to these gentlemen?

Cole. I had.

Q. How long did the prisoner stay in your house?

Cole. A quarter of an hour, not more.

Q. What time of the day was that?

Cole. In the forenoon, I can't exactly tell the hour; it was between nine and twelve; he staid about a quarter of an hour, then he went out.

Q. Did he return again?

Cole. No.

Q. Did you open that bundle?

Cole. It was not tied close, and I saw it a little way open.

Q. What did you see in the bundle?

Cole. I saw some books and other things; I did not untie it, I delivered it to these gentlemen when they came for it.

Q. You took nothing out, nor put any thing in?

Cole. No.

Prisoner. My Lord, I beg Mrs. Boxell may stop.

William Abram sworn.

Q. What are you?

Abram. A blacksmith.

Q. Where do you live?

Abram. At Portsmouth.

Q. Did you ever see the prisoner before?

Abram. Yes, he lodged in the same room with me.

Q. At whose house?

Abram. At Mrs. Boxell's, in Barrack-street.

Q. Had you any particular conversation with the prisoner?

Abram. At first he asked me whether there was any pressing; I told him yes, they press'd very hot; that the constables had press warrants, to take up all the people that could not give an account of themselves; says he, suppose they were to take up such a man as me, I can give no account of myself, only by the writings I have in my pocket; he asked me if I thought if he was to get into the Justice's hands, there was no way of escaping; I said no, there were gates and walls all round; and if he was not taken in Portsmouth town, he would be taken at the bridge; he said was there no way of getting over those walls? I said no, there is water on the other side; he then said again, is there no getting over those walls? I said no.

Prisoner. Was any other thing said?

Abram. Yes, he said he knew one Brooks who was in Newgate; and he was certain sure he would be hanged.

Prisoner. At what time was that?

Abram. I cannot justly say.

Prisoner. Where was it said?

Abram. At Mrs. Boxell's.

Prisoner. In what part of the house?

Abram. The lower room; Mrs. Boxell heard the words as well as me.

Counsel for the Crown. Look at these buckles which were in the parcel?

Abram. There are a great many buckles alike, they are such sort of buckles that the prisoner had, they are the same pattern.

John Baldwin sworn.

Prisoner. I can't embrace you now, Mr. Baldwin, as I did last Monday sen'night.

Q. Look at the prisoner at the bar, when did you first see him?

Baldwin. The 7th February.

Q. Where did you then see him?

Baldwin. At Sir John Fielding's; Lord Temple sent his servant to me the 6th February, to inform me, that I should be sent for by Sir John Fielding, in order to give evidence against a person whom they looked upon to be a painter that had come from America,

America, my Lord knowing that I had been in America.

Q. Was you sent for under an imagination that you might know the prisoner at the bar, having been in America and a painter there?

Baldwin. Yes, I have been in America, at New-York, at Philadelphia, and Amboy.

Q. Are you a painter by business?

Baldwin. I am.

Q. Upon the recommendation of Lord Temple then you went to Sir John Fielding's?

Baldwin. I did; I was asked whether I knew the prisoner; I told Sir John that I had never known him to the best of my memory and remembrance; nor never seen him till I saw him in the other room.

Q. The prisoner heard you say that?

Baldwin. He did; he made me a bow as he stood at the bar, as soon as I had given my evidence to Sir John; I saw him afterwards in another room.

Q. What passed in that other room?

Baldwin. I went to sign my name to the deposition I had made: as I was going away the prisoner beckoned to me with his head; I went and sat down by him; he asked me what part of America I had been in, and who I knew there; I mentioned Philadelphia; he asked me if I knew any painters there; I said I did many; who did I know there? I mentioned several; he said I see that you know the place very well; you are not like evidences that have been brought against me; there was one person said he knew me, but I had changed the colour of my hair; did they imagine that I was aameleon? there was another person said I was transported from Gloucester gaol; but, said he, you are a gentleman, and I wish it was in my power to make you a satisfaction; he told me he would be very glad to see me at a place called New Prison; I said I would come there whenever he pleased, if I could get admission; he said I don't know what time I shall be discharged from here, but if you will come between three and four, I dare say you will see me; I went to New Prison about four o'clock, I saw the prisoner there, he and I walked together; we adjourned to a corner by ourselves between the two gates; he disclosed a great deal about America, mentioning gentlemen's names in America that he knew; and he begg'd I would call upon him the next day when it suited me; I went and acquainted my Lord Temple of what information I had got from the prisoner; my Lord Temple said he thought it was very material, and thought it proper that Lord George Germaine should be acquainted with it; he wrote a line, I carried the letter and was introduced to Lord George Germaine; his Lordship said he was of the same opinion as Lord Temple; and that it should be taken care that I should have admission to see the prisoner, in order to bring him to a confession if possible; I waited upon the prisoner the next day, and we had discourse again about America as before; he found by my discourse that I was an American by principle; he asked me what countryman I was; I said a Welchman; he said he thought at first seeing me he saw in my face that I was a person interested in the cause of America; I told him I married at Amboy, that we removed to Philadelphia and there lived, where I had a son; that that son I had now in London.

Q. However you need not mention every particular; you entered into general conversation, being both of the same trade and of the same country.

Prisoner. I desire the witness will speak every particular, as I am interested in it.

Counsel for the Crown. Be it so by all means, go on then.

Baldwin. I mentioned to him about my family, that I had my son with me now in London; he was desirous to see him; I told him my wife was very much indisposed, which he said he was sorry for; I waited upon him from day to day, till the 15th February; on that day he told me all the particulars; he asked me if I knew one Mr. Deane? I told him no; he said, not Mr. Deane who is employed by the Congress at Paris?

Prisoner. I remark to the witness that there is a righteous Judge, who also giveth righteous judgment; beware of what you say concerning that Mr. Deane, perjure not yourself, you are in the sight of God, and all this company is.

Baldwin. The prisoner said, what not Silas Deane? I told him no: he said he is a fine clever fellow, and I believe Benjamin Franklin is employed in the same errand; he said that he had taken a view o most of the dock-yards and fortifications throughout England, and particularly the number of guns that each ship in the navy had, and likewise the guns in the fortifications, the weight of their metal, and the number of men; and he had been at Paris two or three times, to inform Mr. Silas Deane of the particulars of what he found in examining the dock yards.

Prisoner. Consider in the sight of God what you say concerning Silas Deane.

Counsel for the Crown. You need not be afraid, Silas Deane is not here, he will be hanged in due time.

Prisoner. I hope not, he is a very honest man.

Baldwin. He said that Silas Deane was greatly pleased with what he had done : he acquainted Silas Deane in what manner he was to set the rope-houses and the shipping on fire in England ; that Silas Deane was amazed that he should undertake by himself to execute a matter of that kind, but he told Silas Deane, that he would do more execution than he could imagine, or any person upon the earth ; that then Silas Deane asked him what money he wanted to carry his scheme into execution ? he told him not much ; he expected to be rewarded according to his merit ; that then Silas Deane gave him bills to the amount of 300*l.* and letters to a great merchant or a great man in the city of London. He was very anxious to know whether Lord Cornwallis had been defeated between Brunswick and Trenton, in the Jerseys. He said that he knew Gen. Washington personally, he believed that Gen. Washington's abilities were greater than those of Gen. Howe, and that Gen. Washington would watch Gen. Howe's motions, and would harrafs him ; he was assured that the Provincials would conquer this winter ; that the grand campaign was to be in summer ; that Gen. Washington only wanted a few experienced officers, which he believed would be supplied from France ; and Silas Deane was appointed for that purpose at Paris, to supply them with ammunition and stores ; but as for cannon balls, he said, they could procure a sufficiency to serve all Europe, in America, at a place near Annapolis, in Maryland ; that he himself had seen likewise pitch, tar and turpentine. This was what passed in the course of a great number of visits. I waited upon him from the 7th of Nov. to the 24th. I never missed but one day, and was with him twice on most days.

Prisoner. Remember that this witness says he was with me twice most days.

Baldwin. The prisoner said he arrived at Dover, from Paris, and went to Canterbury ; that he went into a shop, and spoke for a machine to be made.

Prisoner. At what particular place did I call in my way from Canterbury ? I must have called at some particular place.

Baldwin. He said he went into a shop, and ordered a tin machine to be made, which was by some people called a canister ; he said the master was a stupid fellow, and did not understand his directions, but that the boy seemed to be more ingenious and understood it, but he was obliged to stand by the boy while he was making of it to instruct him, and he gave him something to get some drink for his pains ; that then he went into a publick-house, with the canister under the breast of his coat ; that a dragoon saw something under his coat, and opened his coat to see what was under it, and said, which of them are you for ? The prisoner asked, what do you mean ? He said, whether you are a barber or a taylor ? The prisoner said, that was no business to him, and called him an impudent fellow, and told him that he did not mind him, nor none of his master's men ; he said there was another foldier in the room, who was a civil man, and he drank with him ; that he went from thence to Portsmouth, where he took a lodging at one Mrs. Boxell's.

2. All this is the account that he gave you ?

Baldwin. Yes ; in all the conversations, as near as I recollect, word for word. He said at Mrs. Boxell's he tried his preparations, which were matches that he had made, by doubling a sheet of whitish paper into ten or twelve folds ; that then the paper was unfolded, in order to be done over with a composition made of charcoal and gunpowder ; he said, if the paper was not doubled before the composition was laid on it would cause it to crack ; that the charcoal must be ground very fine, upon a colour-stone, in the same manner as painters grind their colours ; but the gunpowder did not require much grinding, he said ; that that might be mashed with a knife, in the same manner as painters mix vermilion : but, he said, they must be very particular in mixing these two bodies together ; that the charcoal is ground in water, and then mixed to the consistence of new milk, and then with a small brush the paper must be painted over on both sides with this composition ; he said, that he had managed the matter so well, that one match would last twenty-four hours. He said, he lodged at Mrs. Boxell's one night, and that Mrs. Boxell was a very impudent woman, for she had opened his bundle during his absence ; he told me, that this tin machine was a very curious construction of his own invention, and that he had a wooden box made which had a hole in the centre, in order to put a candle in, and in that box was tar, turpentine, and hemp ; that the tin canister fitted this wooden box so well, that when the candle was put into it, no person could perceive any light. He said, that on the 6th of December he went into Portsmouth Yard, and got into the Hemp-house ; that there was a deal of hemp there, and it was matted so together that he could hardly get it apart ; he pulled his coat off, and then, after lightening the hemp, he placed this canister over the box, with a small candle in it ;

it; that he sprinkled some turpentine about the hemp that was round it; that he was some time before he found his coat afterwards, and, when he found it, there was a deal of hemp sticking about it, which he endeavoured to take off; that he then went out of the Hemp-house, and got into the Rope-house, and in the Rope-house he placed a quart bottle of spirits of turpentine upon its side, stopped with hemp instead of a cork, and close to the hemp he laid a piece of paper, and in this paper was some dry gunpowder.

Prisoner. Did I go strait out of the Hemp-house into the Rope-house?

Court. You had better wait till he has gone through his evidence, and then you may ask what questions you please.

Baldwin. To this gunpowder there was one of these matches, and over the powder he laid some hemp strewed very light, likewise a quart of turpentine strewed all about; that as soon as the fire of the match touched the powder, it would set it all immediately on a blaze. He said, that by cutting this match which he had made, into short pieces, it would answer any time that he pleased, in order to make his escape; that the next day, which was the 7th of December, he went from Mrs. Boxell's, and took two other lodgings, one at a public house, and the other at a private house, on the Common, he said in the North-street; that he took particular notice before he took these lodgings which houses had most wood about them, for he had his combustibles ready for the purpose of setting his two lodgings on fire on the same day as he set fire to the Rope-house, in order to keep the engines from playing upon the buildings in the Dock-yard; he said, that he told the woman at the lodging which he took on the Common, that he was going to Petersfield, and begged her to take care of his bundle; he said, after that he went into the Dock-yard in order to set fire to both the Hemp-house and the Rope-house; that he first went into the Hemp-house, and struck a light, but the matches which he had were very damp, and he could not get the sulphur to take fire; that he wasted a whole box full of tinder in order to light the candle, and even blowed at the tinder till he had almost burnt his lips; that he went away from the Hemp-house, and procured some better matches; that then he got into the Rope-house, and set fire to the match which led to the powder.

Q. Did he say any thing about buying of the matches?

Baldwin. He said he had bought an halfpenny worth of matches the day before of a woman.—My Lord, there is one matter I forgot: he said, the day that he put his preparations into the Hemp-house and Rope-house, he was so long in the Hemp-house that he was locked into the Rope-house; that when he came to the door which he went in at, he could not get out; he said there were several doors belonging to this building, that he tried many of them, and went the whole length of the building, which was upwards of three hundred and sixty yards. He then went up stairs, pulled off his shoes, and went the whole length there, and could find no possible means to get out, upon which he returned, and got to the same door that he came in at; there he heard some persons voice, upon which he knocked at the door, and said, holloa! They asked, who was there, and what business he had there? He said, it was curiosity that had led him there, that he did not imagine they had locked up the house so soon; he said, the person told him to go strait forwards, and turn to such a door, and he would be able to get out, which he did; he said, when he came out he was much vexed with himself that he could not set the Hemp-house on fire, and was also vexed because he could not go to his lodging on Portsmouth Common, where he had left a parcel, which parcel contained, among other things, a pistol, Ovid's Metamorphoses, the Arts and Dangers of War, or something of that sort, and a Justin; but what vexed him most was a passport that he had left which was signed by the French King, and in that passport was his real name, but it was in French, and he did not imagine that the people at the lodgings could read or understand it, but, he said, he was greatly amazed that they had not found the bundle; he said, he imagined they intended to make a property of him, or otherwise he thought it would be best to take no notice of it, but let it lay; after setting fire to the Rope-house he made the best of his way towards London; he said, that he was so sorry that he could not get the matches to light in the Hemp-house, that he had a good mind to go and shut at the window of the woman's house where he had bought them; he said, that he had burnt the bills and the letter which he had from Silas Deane, on account of the behaviour of Mrs. Boxell, and to prevent any suspicion of the gentlemen that they were for: he said, that soon after he left the Dock-yard he jumped into a cart, and begged of the woman to drive quick: that he rode in this cart two miles, and then gave the woman sixpence for driving quick, for he had near four miles to go before he passed the

the centinels; that a few minutes after he had passed the centinels he looked back, and saw the flames; he said, the very element seemed to be in a blaze; that he walked all night on his way for London; that upon the road between the last centinel and Kingston, two dogs barked at him very much; he said, he shot at them, and believed he either killed or wounded one; that he arrived at Kingston the next morning, which was Sunday, between ten and eleven o'clock; that he staid there till pretty near dusk, and then came in the stage to London, and waited upon this great man in the city of London; he said, he told the gentleman that he had had letters and bills about him that he had received from Silas Deane at Paris, which he was obliged to burn; that the gentleman seemed to be very shy of him, and told him, he had received no account from Paris; he said, he told the gentleman he might think what he pleased, but he was an enemy to Great-Britain, and a friend to America; and that he had set fire to the Rope-house at Portsmouth, which he would see in the papers of Monday; he said the gentleman ordered him to a certain coffee-house.

Court. I suppose, by your repeating the word gentleman so often, he did not mention his name?

Baldwin. No, I could not get his name from him; I wish I had. He said, the gentleman waited upon him at the coffee-house, where they had some little discourse, but the gentleman seemed still to be shy of him; he said, there was another gentleman in the coffee-house, who took very particular notice of him, which he observed, and therefore did not chuse to stop long; he said, he was so angry that this gentleman would not believe his word, that he took his leave of him, and went directly to Hammer-smith; that when he got to Hammer-smith he wrote a letter to this gentleman, and told him he was very sorry that he would not believe what he had told him, but he was satisfied he would receive letters in a few days; that he was going to Bristol, where he should hear of more of his handy works. He said, in his way from hence to Bristol, he called at Oxford.

Court. He is going now to speak about Bristol; if you don't watch him very attentively it is natural he should fall into an account of Bristol, which we have nothing to do with.

Counsel for the Crown. We are not examining about Bristol with a view to impute to him the setting Bristol on fire, but to shew he was actuated by the same motives towards this country, with regard to America, which operated at Portsmouth, which will be material, as it will confirm the design he had in his mind. We shall prove his grinding charcoal upon a painter's stone there, and other circumstances.

Court. Any conversation that he relates of the prisoner's, of what happened at Bristol that will confirm this evidence here, is material.

Baldwin. He said his next scheme was to set a building at Woolwich on fire; he said he arrived at Bristol a few days before Christmas; that he got leave from a painter to grind some charcoal upon his colour stone.

Q. Did he mention to you his reasons for going to Bristol? I don't mean of what he intended to do there; but whether he mentioned any reason why in particular he should go to Bristol, any more than to Worcester, or any other place?

Baldwin. He said that he heard there were three or four ships that were there; that one or two of them were mounted with twelve carriage guns and eight swivels, and that they were going to the West-Indies, and he wanted to see these vessels.

Court. All these questions must necessarily tend to the fire at Bristol.

Baldwin. He said, a painter gave him liberty to grind this charcoal.

Court. When was this? before the fire at Portsmouth, or after it?

Baldwin. After the fire at Portsmouth.

Counsel for the Crown. We shall call that witness to confirm and prove many of these things after the fire; that he called upon the man to grind charcoal. Now I shall call that man to prove that the prisoner did grind the charcoal at that house. I do not mean for the preparation for this particular fire, but only as a circumstance confirmatory that he did hold the conversation that the witness relates, and did make such preparations.

Court. As far as that goes I see no objection to that.

Counsel for the Crown. Let it be supposed that the charcoal was for an innocent purpose; but it is a fact that the witness will prove confirmatory of his having said that he did such a thing.

Baldwin. He said he ground it upon a colour-stone belonging to a painter at Bristol, that he was above two hours grinding it, and the painter took particular notice of that.

Q. He told you he went to Bristol?

Baldwin. He did tell me he went to Bristol; he said he looked upon that to be one of the greatest circumstances against him, the man seeing him make this preparation, grinding this charcoal.

Q. You gave an account of this matter, and in consequence of that enquiries were made of the several people?

Baldwin. I suppose so.

Q. When did you give an account of this conversation?

Baldwin. Day after day to my Lord Temple, and from thence to my Lord G. Germaine; it was on the 15th of February that the particulars came out. I was from the 7th to the 15th before I could get out any particulars. I communicated an account of the particulars day by day.

Prisoner. I should wish to hear the evidence read over.

Mr. Baron Hotham. I certainly will read it over to you, if you desire it.

Prisoner. I wish it to be read, in order to refresh my memory.

Mr. Baron Hotham. If you want to ask any question, you will stop me at the place where you wish to interpose your question.

Mr. Baron Hotham then read over his notes (which were exceeding accurate) of the evidence which Baldwin had given. His Lordship concluded thus. "I have taken the evidence as faithfully and exactly as I could; if there is any difference, I shall be obliged to any gentleman in court who will be pleased to set me right."

Prisoner. It is exceeding well taken down, my Lord. Now is it proper, in the sight of God and in the sight of man, that a man, contrary to the laws of God and man, should come with deceit in his heart as an emissary from other people to insinuate to me, or any person, what they can in that deceitful manner? If they are deceitful enough to deceive one in such a distressful situation, they must certainly have deceit enough in their heart to speak lies of them.

Court. That is matter of observation, which will come in with propriety in the course of your defence; it is better for you to apply yourself now to asking any questions that you may think proper.

Prisoner. I would rather ask him some questions after all the witnesses are examined.

Counsel for the Crown. Well, he shall stay in court.

Edward Evans sworn.

Q. Was you at Canterbury at any time?

Evans. Yes, from the month of January till the latter end of February.

Q. Did you ever see the prisoner at Canterbury?

Evans. I think I have; the man is altered a great deal since I saw him, but, to the best of my judgment, he is the man, that was either the latter end of October or the beginning of November, in November to the best of my knowledge, we had some words.

Q. Did you see any thing about him?

Evans. My comrade was present; he said he saw something under his coat.

Q. How was he dressed?

Evans. In a brown duffel furtout coat, rather shabby.

Q. Did you observe what was inside the furtout?

Evans. I did not.

James Wilson sworn.

Q. Do you remember seeing the prisoner at Canterbury?

Wilson. I really think he is the person; but I had never seen him before nor since he had a dispute with my comrade Evans. To the best of my opinion he was dressed much as he is now; I observed something bright under his coat that glistened like tin.

Q. Did you see much of it?

Wilson. I did not make much observation upon it.

Q. Was there any quarrel or words between either of you?

Wilson. There had been a fighting or a scuffle between him and my comrade.

Prisoner. (To the Counsel.) Sir, I have one thing to remark: Are you his Majesty's Counsel?

Counsel. I am. What then?

Prisoner. I only wanted to know if you was his Britannic Majesty's Counsel, and if you had done with the examination.

John Fisher sworn.

Q. Where do you live?

Fisher. At Mr. Lawrence Tuck's at Canterbury.

Q. Do you know the prisoner?

Fisher. I think I have seen him before.

Q. When?

Fisher. About six or seven weeks, I believe, before Christmas.

Q. Where did you see him then?

Fisher. At my master's shop; he came and ordered two tin canisters of me. My master is a tin-man.

Q. What were his directions?

Fisher. To make two canisters of a long square. I have got one here. [Producing it.]

Q. Was that canister made by the prisoner's directions?

Fisher. Yes.

Q. How came he not to take it away?

Fisher.

Fisher. I cannot tell; there were two of them left in my hands.

Q. Did he call afterwards for them?

Fisher. He called once and they were not compleated, after that he called no more. [The machine or canister was exactly upon the same construction with that found in the Hemp-house.]

William Baldy sworn.

Q. Look at the prisoner. Did you ever see that man in the Dock-yard at Portsmouth?

Baldy. I have.

Q. In what part of it?

Baldy. I saw him about a hundred yards from the east end of the Rope-house upon the lower floor where the cordage is made.

Q. Upon what day did you see him there?

Baldy. On Saturday the 7th of December, which was the day of the fire.

Q. At what time of the day did you see him?

Baldy. Between eleven and twelve, it might be nearer twelve than eleven; I saw him come down on the south side of the house, and cross from that to the north side towards where I was sitting by myself.

Q. Did he speak to you?

Baldy. Yes, he pick'd up a small smooth stone which he held up in his fingers in this manner [describing it.] Pray, Sir, says he, Do you make use of this in making cables? The oddness of the question made me look fully at him; I thought he appeared very ignorant. I said, we do not make use of this; this is, I suppose a stone that is come out of the clay that those barrels are filled with; there were then about threescore and ten barrels of clay there; he staid five or six minutes, and then he left me.

Q. When did you see him again?

Baldy. In about ten minutes, or it might be a quarter of an hour after.

Q. Where did you see him then?

Baldy. I saw him the second time at the east end of the same floor; he had been up stairs, I saw him come down; there was one William Weston in company with me; the prisoner address'd him with How do you do, how do you do? holding out his hands to him; they fell into a conversation, which I thought was a matter that did not concern me, supposing by his address'ing him in that manner that they knew each other, I went off.

Q. Are you or are you not certain that he is the man whom you saw in the Rope-house, the day of the fire?

Baldy. I am certain.

Court. What is your business in the Dock-yard?

Baldy. I am a rope-maker.

William Weston sworn.

Q. Look at the prisoner. Have you ever seen that man before?

Weston. To the best of my knowledge I have.

Q. Where?

Weston. In the Rope-house the day that the fire was; that is the man that I saw to the best of my knowledge.

Q. You had some conversation, I believe, with him?

Weston. Very little.

Q. Had you seen him there before, or did you know him before?

Weston. I saw him walking there, about seven weeks before the fire; he said he had been round the Dock then, and that he had never been in the Dock in his life before.

Q. Did you see what part of the house he came from, on the 7th of December?

Weston. I cannot say I did.

Q. Did you see him come down stairs?

Weston. No.

Q. What is your employment in the yard?

Weston. I am a shipwright's apprentice.

Edward Carey sworn.

Q. Was you at Portsmouth at the time of the fire?

Carey. I was.

Q. Was you there the day before the fire?

Carey. I was.

Q. Do you remember whether any person was shut up in the yard?

Carey. Yes, the night before the fire, a person was shut up in the Rope-house.

Q. Did you see him?

Carey. No; I heard a man make a rumbling noise at the door; I went up to the door, and asked him what he wanted; he said, he was locked in and could not get out, and he would be glad if we could let him out; I told him we could not let him out, he must abide there all night, we left him in the house.

Prisoner. Was it the night of, or the night before the fire?

Carey. The night before the fire.

Ann Hopkins sworn.

Q. Look at the man behind you (the prisoner) did you ever see him before?

Hopkins. Yes.

Q. Where?

Hopkins. I saw him last Saturday.

Q. When did you first see him?

Hopkins.

Hopkins. The day that the Dock was on fire.

Q. At what time?

Hopkins. At four o'clock, or half after, I cannot be exact as to the time, I had been at the market; I was coming home in a little cart; between the Flying Bull and Kingston, he stopped my cart.

Q. Did he overtake or meet you?

Hopkins. I cannot tell, it was a close tilted cart, I did not see him till he came close to me; he stopped my cart, and asked me how far I was going? I said but a little way; he said he would give me any thing to give him a lift, for he was going to Petersfield and should be benighted; he jumped up into the cart, and said, do ma'am drive as fast as you can; as I was coming out of Kingston, I called at a shop.

Q. Was he or not, heated when he came up to you?

Hopkins. He was very much out of breath when he came up to me; I called at a shop at Kingston to buy a pair of pattens; when I was taking out the money to pay the woman, the prisoner took sixpence out of his pocket and gave her, and I gave her another.

Q. Why did he do that?

Hopkins. It was to make haste. I told him before I called, that I must stop at a shop; he desired me not to stop there, then he said, you won't wait long, and, he said, he would give any thing for a returned chaise, for he must get to Petersfield that night if he was alive; I drove on till I came in sight of my own house, I stopped to let my horse drink, and he jumped out of the cart and ran away as fast as he could.

Q. Had the fire burst out at the time he left the cart?

Hopkins. No.

Q. How soon was it afterwards?

Hopkins. I cannot pretend to say; he ran the main London road, and I saw no more of him.

Elizabeth Gentell sworn.

Q. Where do you live?

Gentell. I live at Portsmouth Common.

Q. Look at the prisoner, you saw him yesterday I believe.

Gentell. I did.

Q. When was the first time that you saw him?

Gentell. The day before the fire at the Rope-house; I saw him at my own house in Havant-street, Portsmouth common; he came to my house and asked for a halfpenny worth of matches; I took down two bunches and put them upon the counter; he asked me if they would take fire quick;

May, 1777.

and he desired me to change one of the bunches, which I did; he pulled some silver out of his pocket, and gave me a halfpenny.

Q. Are you sure that the prisoner is the same person?

Gentell. I am.

Prisoner. How can you be certain from so small a time as you have now taken to look at me; how should you know my physiognomy?

Gentell. (looks at him again.) I am sure he is the man.

John Illenden sworn.

Q. Did you ever see the prisoner at Canterbury?

Illenden. As far as there is human possibility of knowing a man, I have seen him there.

Q. What are you?

Illenden. A surgeon and apothecary; I was lately an apprentice.

Q. On what business or occasion did you see him there?

Illenden. Upon his coming to buy two ounces of spirits of turpentine, and a quarter of a pound of salt-petre, what we call nitre.

Q. About what time was that?

Illenden. As far as I can recollect, it was either three or four days before or after the 20th of November.

Mary Bishop sworn.

Q. Did you ever see the prisoner before?

Bishop. Yes.

Q. Where?

Bishop. At my house in Canterbury.

Q. Do you recollect at what time you saw him there?

Bishop. It was between Michaelmas and Christmas; but I cannot recollect the particular time.

Q. Had he any conversation with you when he was at your house in Canterbury?

Bishop. He told me he had been interrupted by a dragoon at the White Horse; he told me he came from America on account of the disturbances.

Q. Do you recollect whether he applied to you to direct him where he might get any thing made?

Bishop. He asked me afterwards where he might get a wooden thing made?

Prisoner. Is that a proper question to put?

Counsel. If I was to put an improper question the judge would stop me.

Court. No improper question will be put; and you ought to see by this time that the candour of the counsel for the crown will prevent them putting an improper question.

R r

Q Did

Q. Did you see any thing that was made for him ?

Bishop. I saw a wooden thing which the apprentice of Mr. Overhaw, to whom I directed him, brought into my house for him; the prisoner put it under his coat, wishing not to have it seen.

Q. Did you see that wooden thing ?

Bishop. I saw the wrong end of it; the shape of it was a long square.

Q. Was it at all like this (shewing the witness the wooden part of the machine found in the Hemp-house.)

Bishop. Yes.

Q. What is become of the apprentice who made and brought this machine ?

Bishop. He is since dead.

Q. You say it was like this wooden machine ?

Bishop. As nigh as I can guess it was like this; it was of the same shape.

Court. How long was it after he asked you where he could get such a thing made, that you saw it brought to him by the apprentice ?

Bishop. Sometime in the afternoon, I think, of the same day.

John Dalby sworn.

Q. I believe you apprehended the prisoner ?

Dalby. I did.

Q. What did you find upon him when you apprehended him ?

Dalby. I found upon him a Bath metal seal; a pair of steel buttons; a snuff box with tinder; a small powder horn with gunpowder; a large nail piercer; a striking tinder box primed; a screw barrel pocket pistol loaded with shot; two bundles of matches dipt in brimstone; a phial bottle half-full with spirits of turpentine, and a small pair of scissars.

Thomas Mason sworn.

Q. Where do you live ?

Mason. In the Parish of St. Philip and Jacob in the County of Gloucester, near to Bristol.

Q. Look at the prisoner, did you ever see him before ?

Mason. He was in my house the morrow after Christmas day.

Q. What business had he there ?

Mason. He came to my house about 11 o'clock; he asked me to let him grind a lump of charcoal upon my colour stone.

Q. What business are you ?

Mason. I am a tyler and plaisterer, and a house painter; I told him yes sure, and welcome; I shewed him my colour stone.

Q. What did the prisoner tell you he was ?

Mason. I talked with him a good while afterwards; when I was in my room, I saw him pull a hanger from under his coat when he began grinding, and lay it down, and lay his great coat upon it; I said, why you are one of the press gang; no, Sir, said he, I be not.

Q. What did he tell you ?

Mason. I asked him when he was sitting in my house, what he did think of the American affairs; he said he wished that affair had never happened; that he had lost a plantation there, and he hoped when that affair was over he should have it returned to him.

Prisoner. Is it proper that this man's evidence should be invalidated or not, from his own downright contradictions ?

Court. I did not observe any contradiction; the witness does not seem to be very quick of apprehension, and did not immediately understand the question put to him; it is nothing but relating a discourse which does not appear to be material.

Counsel for the Crown to James Gambier, Esq. Have you, Sir, translated the passport ?

Mr. Gambier. This is the translation as well as I understand the English of it.

Prisoner. I object to the passport being read.

Court. State your objection.

Prisoner. That they who shall be called to witness for or against me, may not hear the contents of it.

Counsel for the Crown. We shall call no more witnesses.

The passport was read as follows :

Exhibited
at the Office of Marine at Calais.

This present passport to be valid for one month only, for such is our pleasure.

Given at Fontainebleau the 13th of November, 1776.

LOUIS.

Gratis

By the King,

De Vergennes.

Counsel for the Crown. Now it will be material for the officer to tell your lordship what those books are.

Officer. The books are Ovid's Metamorphoses, morphoses, a Treatise of the Arms and Engines of War, of Fire Works, &c. and the other is the History of Justin.

Counsel for the Crown. My Lord this is all our evidence.

Court. Prisoner, the evidence against you is now closed; this is therefore the time for you to make your defence.

PRISONER'S DEFENCE.

I understand, my Lord, that that French passport was not found out till a few days ago, and since my first apprehension, a great part of the kingdom has been sought, and persons have been brought from many different places to give evidence who I was, or what I am, or so far as they knew about me, and every particular thing that has been witnessed respecting the late fire in the Dock-yard, from these evidences given, and the communication of them to all the people in the kingdom, by news-papers, and other ways, I think it is possible, and may have been possible for Mr. Baldwin, or for any other person that is any way at all intelligible, to bring every evidence against me that that person has done, by the said knowledge from public papers and conversation; nevertheless, whether it is a false accusation, that is upon me, or whether it is a betraying of trust, through the treachery of the heart, God Almighty, the great judge of all, only knows; if it is the former, I pray God Almighty may forgive him! if it is the latter, I pray the same! but in that case I should like to know, whether it is proper, that a person possessed of such a disposition as that, should come from emissaries unknown to me, and do all that lies in him to insinuate any thing out of me, unknown to me, and daily to come and go, and give information to the said Lord George Germain? I should like that your Lordship would take it into your consideration, as in the sight of God, whether such a person has a right in the sight of God, and according to the laws of man, and of this kingdom, to give evidence against a man, that his evidence ought to be regarded? He that may have been able to betray me, and speak things in the dark of me; he is able also, I think, to give the lie to any man, through motives of gain, or any other motives whatsoever; your Lordship can consider that in your own mind, much better than I can speak it, as I am not endowed with oratory.

Court. Do you rest your defence on that observation, or do you intend to call any witnesses?

Prisoner. With respect to any other witnesses that may be called against me, if there is any positive fact can be proved against me, I will then prove the negative, or otherwise the court will proceed according to the laws of the country. I have one thing more to say; I would put a few questions to this man, Mr. Baldwin.

Prisoner. I think you gave evidence, that I should have said to you, that on Friday the 6th of December last, I went into the Hemp-house, belonging to his Britannic Majesty's yard, in Portsmouth?

Baldwin. I did.

Prisoner. And that I went in there with some combustibles, and lighted some hemp?

Baldwin. Yes; in order to set fire to the combustibles.

Prisoner. Do you speak of lighting a flame, or laying the thing lighter?

Baldwin. You said it was matted, that it was to make it lie light.

Prisoner. It is not my business to deny going to Canterbury, or confess it; do you say, that I said, I went to Canterbury and had the tin machine made?

Baldwin. Yes.

Prisoner. You also say, that I said, that I went into a house on Portsmouth Common, and left the passport?

Baldwin. Yes; among other things.

Prisoner. There are some other evidences say, that I was at Canterbury, one says, about six weeks before Christmas, another says, about six or seven, another between Michaelmas and Christmas, another, before or after the 20th of November; of the other three, two speak of it as sooner: respecting the French passport that has been found at Portsmouth, it seems to me inconsistent how it can be my passport, and at the same time, I to be at Canterbury, or any where in England at the time mentioned; the date of the passport is the 13th of November; if I can bring these two articles to bear, it seems very unintelligible to me, for it is sworn, that I said, that is my passport, and again it is sworn, that I was in England at that time; that is equal to the good gentleman, that said I had power to alter the colour of my own hair; if there is any thing brought against me that is positive, I am ready with the greatest pleasure, by the help of Almighty God, to receive the punishment of the laws of the country, be what it will: there are other things surprize me more than that. I have nothing more to say, my Lord.

Counsel for the Crown. We have done with our evidence.

Court. Will you call any witnesses?

Prisoner. For what end? till something is proved positive against me, I intend no defence in the world. I am ready to live or die according to justice.

Mr. Baron Hotham then summed up the evidence in a very accurate and circumstantial manner; which, as our readers have the depositions before them, we shall omit repeating; and shall only insert such observations as he made on parts of the evidence. Before he began, he made the following humane remarks to the Jury. "Though it is impossible for any language to aggravate this offence, yet it is not for you now to feel the magnitude of that crime; you are to divest yourselves entirely of all the horrible consequences of the perpetration of it, and apply your consciences to this single fact; is this prisoner guilty or innocent of this offence? What the consequences of it are, or might have been, I wish you not to think of; because it is in human nature to feel prejudices, that one wishes at such a moment as this, juries should forget. I am sure, therefore, you will now think of nothing but the plain simple fact itself; and whether it is, or is not, supported by the evidence you have heard."

On the evidence of William Tench, (p. 251) the Judge remarks, "The observation which the Prisoner has made in his defence is very true; namely, that all the witnesses from Canterbury give rather a different account about the time; they are none of them very particularly precise; they all speak, rather at large about it. But it does not seem to me to weaken that evidence, because five or six different people do not all concur in their recollection of the very day when the person was at Canterbury; and when they speak cautiously, it is not to be wondered at, that they differ a little, a few days or a week in their account. This witness says, that it was a month or six weeks before Christmas, and that he himself made the tin machine for the prisoner; the first time he was applied to upon this business was on the Monday before last, and that was particularly asked him in order I suppose to shew you a material circumstance that this was after the Prisoner had confessed the whole himself to Baldwin. But when I use the word confession, it is proper now at the outset to make one general observation to you upon the evidence of Baldwin. I do not look upon this as being strictly a confession of the prisoner: but it was evidence which the man himself chose to disclose to Baldwin without any solicitation whatsoever, and without any promise or engagement of secrecy. It seems to have come from the prisoner himself spontaneously; and as far as we have the evidence before us, Baldwin does not seem, in any one of these conversations, to have sought a discovery from the Prisoner; but it has all come from the Prisoner, and not from Baldwin, and therefore what the Prisoner has said in his defence by way of objecting to Baldwin's evidence, does not, in my apprehension, weigh much in the consideration of this question."

On the deposition of Elizabeth Boxell, (p. 305) he observes "her evidence, abstracted from bringing it home to the Prisoner that he was at Portsmouth at the very time, is extremely material, if you give her credit; inasmuch as she speaks to particular work and operations, upon which she found him employed.—I say, gentlemen, this is material; because as this case is to depend entirely upon a chain of circumstances you must lay all of them attentively together; and circumstances may form such a body of evidence, as shall be abundantly stronger than where two or three witnesses swear to a positive fact. If you should think this case stands upon such circumstances, you will draw your own conclusion: if you think the circumstances are not strong enough to bring the charge home to the Prisoner, you will then discharge your consciences by saying so: but upon every little circumstance you must hang. This, therefore, is material to recollect.—The Prisoner is employed visibly in some preparation of combustible matter over night, and next morning; the fire happens that very day. That, therefore, you will take as one circumstance. She then mentions another, which turns out to be also material, which is, that on the Friday, looking into the Prisoner's bundle, she found in it part of an old shirt and a pair of leather breeches upon a tin case; now, you have had it in evidence, that a tin case was found in the Hemp-house; she says, she viewed this tin case a quarter of an hour, and therefore is very particular in swearing that it is as much like the case, which has been produced to you, as any thing can be: she says, she was so much alarmed at his proceedings, that she ordered him out of her house, and indeed she says, that she would not quit the room. He said he wanted his candle; she bid him take it as he went down; that, by and by, may turn out also to be a circumstance fit to be remembered. She says he took away the bundle, but she does not know whether the canister was in it at that time; she had seen it on Friday, and this was on the Saturday. Then Mr. Commissioner Gambier produces the bundle which he received received from his clerk, John Jeffereys, on the twenty first of February; it is shewn to Mrs. Boxell, who says, she does believe that to be the same bundle."

In regard to what William Abram, (p. 306) swore, Mr. Baron Hotham said upon this evidence, "I would make this observation; that Abram proves the identity of the Prisoner;—he proves too his lodging at Mrs. Boxell's house, so that he confirms her evidence, and to his lodging there at that particular time; and then the bent of the Prisoner's conversation with him, (for you are to take the whole evidence together) you may perhaps, think, implies that he then had something in contemplation, which might induce him to wish to make his escape."

The next witness is John Baldwin; this, you see, is the material witness, upon whose account very much will depend. I did read over his evidence before to the Prisoner, as he wished to hear it; but I will repeat it now to you. [He then repeated it again.] After which he observed:

"Now, gentlemen, you see from this man's evidence, there is an exceeding clear, intelligible, and consistent history given; but if this account, clear and consistent as it is, were unsupported by other evidence, one might perhaps entertain some doubts about it; but where you find it confirmed in almost every material passage, where you find it not contradicted in any one circumstance, you must then, I think, feel it, when so authenticated, to be a very strong body of evidence indeed."

After repeating John Fisher's evidence, (p. 311) he said, "Gentlemen, upon this man's evidence you will naturally make this observation, that the person, be he who he may, that wanted this tin box, certainly wanted more than one, why he did not bespeak them all at the same shop, cannot well be accounted for, unless it be that he thought so many at one place might lead to some suspicion. However, the fact turns out to be, that he did not stay for these two being made, they were left behind, and he only carried off that which has been found."

The Judge's observations on the evidence of Ann Hopkins, (p. 312) were in these words, "With respect to this evidence, to be sure, any person, totally unconcerned in any guilty deed, might be anxious to get to Petersfield; might be afraid of being benighted; might wish her to drive very fast; all that might happen very naturally without any imputation upon the party; but, as I said before, you are to take this case with all its circumstances together; and every little circumstance weighs something; and if you should trace the Prisoner to the very place, almost to the moment of the fire, if you trace him leaving the place immediately after, and being in this state, out of breath, eager to get off, pressing the woman to drive on, anxious to get a returned chaise, jumping out, and running forward when she stopped; laying these circumstances together, with all the others, to be sure you will be justified if you entertain some suspicions about his motive. But all this you will weigh, together with the many various circumstances of the case."

On what Elizabeth Gentell (p. 313) said, he remarked it is for your consideration whether a man, going to buy matches, would or would not shew such an anxiety about their being particularly well made; and there is one more observation, which I would make to you, that the man who goes to buy a halfpenny worth of matches for his own use, is hardly such a man as could afford to express a desire of meeting with a post-chaise to carry him to Petersfield."

John Illenden, (p. 313) a surgeon and apothecary, swore, that as far as human possibility can go, the Prisoner is the person whom he saw at Canterbury, three or four days before or after the twentieth of November; and that he is particularly clear that he is the man, because he came to his shop to buy two ounces of spirits of turpentine, and a quarter of a pound of saltpetre, on this he observes, these things you will feel a man might innocently buy, at the time you are recollecting that these materials have been found upon the spot, and that they are materials necessary for combustion.

The Judge concluded thus:

"The Prisoner has called no witnesses, but he has rested his defence chiefly upon the credit that you ought to give to the evidence of Baldwin; because he says, that a man who was capable of drawing out this evidence from him, ought not to receive credit in a court of justice. Gentlemen I have told you before, and I ought to tell you now, that, in point of law, there is no objection to this man's testimony; and from the manner in which he came by the knowledge, which he has now furnished us with, I do not see that there was any thing which can lead you to suppose that Baldwin was the first mover with him, or that he prevailed upon the prisoner to disclose the secret; but it should seem as if it came from the prisoner himself, though it was undoubtedly upon the idea that this man was his friend: because, if you do not suppose that, you must suppose him madder than any man that ever was born. He certainly thought him his friend, and he therefore did disclose all this to him.
it

Gentlemen, one has only to say farther, that if this point of honour was to be so sacred, as that a man who comes by knowledge of this sort from an offender, was not to be at liberty to disclose it, the most atrocious criminals would every day escape punishment; and therefore it is, that the wisdom of the law knows nothing of that point of honour; if the man is a legal witness, you are bound to receive his testimony; giving it, however, that weight only which you think it deserves: for it is always in the breast of the jury, to consider of the degree of credit they will give to every witness. Let him be in all lights a legal witness, you are still to be judges of his credit; if you think that a man, because he listened to this tale so many days, and disclosed it as he heard it, to the great officers of state, and has disclosed it now in a court of justice, is a man to whom belief cannot be given, in that case to be sure you will set aside his testimony: but if you see no ground to suppose that the man has spoke untruth, you cannot then reject his testimony.

Gentlemen, the trial has lasted already very long. I have endeavoured, as I have gone on, to lay together some of the many circumstances of this case for your consideration; and I do assure the prisoner, as well as you, that if I had found myself enabled in my conscience to have stated any thing more favourably for him, I would have been the first to have done it. But I am sitting here to do equal justice between the public and the prisoner; and I was therefore bound to make those observations which I have done, because they strike my conscience, as being necessary and material. I thank God, however, gentlemen, that you are to judge of these circumstances, you are to lay them all together, and draw your conclusion from them; and if you believe that there is such a train following one another, I had almost said so irresistibly, as that you cannot doubt that in the first place the fire did happen by these combustibles, and then that the prisoner was the person who laid those combustibles there, I should suppose you can have no doubt but that he set this building on fire wilfully and maliciously. If on the other hand you should feel, though there are a great number of circumstances tending in some degree to the proof of the fact, that your minds are not satisfied that it comes home to the prisoner, if you are of that opinion, you ought to exercise the jurisdiction which you have, and acquit the prisoner.

I will say one thing more, and only one; you are bound by your oaths to give a true verdict; and if the circumstances of the case appear to you decidedly strong, you will of course give your verdict on that side on which they preponderate; but if you should think that they are still so doubtful, as that you cannot satisfy your minds this was the very man who did the fact, in that case, in favour of life, you ought to acquit him.

The Jury almost immediately pronounced the Prisoner, GUILTY.

The prisoner was then asked, in the usual form, what he had to say why sentence of Death should not be passed upon him, to which he replied, "I have nothing to say."

Sentence. Mr. Baron Hotham.

Prisoner,

YOU have been indicted, tried, and convicted of a crime, which the law of this country has thought fit to make capital, and now the most painful moment that I have undergone in the course of this trial is arrived; for it is my duty to pass upon you that dreadful sentence. I shall not interrupt those feelings, which I trust you have, by talking to you of the enormity of the offence, which you have committed, because it is impossible for me, or any man who hears me, to add a word by way of aggravation to it: and it has this in particular about it, that it cannot have been committed from any motives of private malice, revenge, or lucre. It can have proceeded only from a general malignity of mind, which has broke out in a desire and a design, not only to ruin one devoted individual, but to involve every one of this audience, nay the whole English nation, perhaps, in immediate ruin. You cannot therefore be surprised that the law has thought fit to punish such a crime with death. You can as little be surprised, if, after you have been convicted upon the clearest evidence of this offence, I can give you no hope of pardon*. It is impossible for me to say a word in your behalf: and therefore I must entreat and conjure you, in the most solemn manner, to prepare yourself during the few days you have to live, to meet the great God in another world, and to ask him there for that pardon, which you could not receive in this:

N O T E.

this; there it will be worth receiving: and atrocious as your crime has been, short as the time is that you have to live, a sincere repentance now on your part, may, and I hope in God will procure you mercy at his hands. I say all this not to taunt or distress you in your present unhappy situation, but merely from motives of humanity and religion. For you cannot be suffered to live in this world; you must die, and that within a very few days. And therefore, before you go into eternity, for your soul's sake, do what you can, that that eternity may be an eternity of bliss instead of misery. I have only now to pronounce the painful * sentence of the law which I am bound to do, and I accordingly adjudge and order that you be hanged by the neck until you shall be dead, and the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

Prisoner. My Lord, I am exceedingly well satisfied.

The following account is furnished by Mr. Commissioner Gambier.

THE prisoner was carried from Winchester Goal on the 10th to Portsmouth, where it was appointed he should be executed at the Dock Gate; and the following is an exact account of his behaviour from the time of his arrival to the time of execution.

Having been carried in an open cart by the Hemp-house and round the ruins of the Rope-house, when he came opposite the Commissioner's house, he desired to speak with the Commissioner who thereupon went up close to him: he said,

"SIR,

"I acknowledge my crime, and hope for forgiveness from God, through the merits of my Saviour Jesus Christ."

"I ask pardon of you, Sir, and hope your forgiveness"; upon the cart's moving, he said, "I had one thing more to observe as a caution to all the Commissioners of the Dock-yards throughout England; to be more vigilant and strictly careful of them for the future, because it is in the power of a determined and resolute man to do a great deal of mischief."

As the cart stopped at the end of the Rope-house, he looked attentively at the place of his perpetration, and said, "I acknowledge my crime and am sorry for it."

Just before he returned out of the Dock-yard, upon being asked there if he had any thing more that he wished to say to the Commissioner, he said, "No, only I recommend great care and strict vigilance at the Dock-yards at Chatham, Woolwich, Deptford, Portsmouth, and Plymouth; and particularly of the Rope-house of the latter."

Just before he was turned off, he said, "I acknowledge the justice of my sentence, and hope for forgiveness, as I forgive all the world; I wish success to his Majesty King George and his family, and all his loyal subjects; and I hope for forgiveness for all the transactions that I have been guilty of from the year 1772, since my apprenticeship, and that the world would be satisfied about him, as his life would be very soon in print."

LA Plata, the capital, which had its name from the mines in its neighbourhood, stands about two hundred and fifty miles from the nearest sea-coast to the east, and seven hundred and eighty from Lima, towards the south-east. The inhabitants, including Indians, are said to exceed fourteen thousand. Here is the seat of the governor of the province, of the archbishop, an university, and court of inquisition, subordinate to that of Lima; but there is a great scarcity of water.

Potosi, so famous on account of the rich silver mines in its neighbourhood, stands about sixty miles from La Plata to the south east. The Spaniards and Creolians here are possessed of immense riches. All their cloaths are of gold and silver stuffs, and their kitchen furniture and plates of silver, which is not to be wondered at in a country where that metal is as common as copper and iron are elsewhere. They have great frosts and snows here in May, June, and July; and the neighbouring country is barren and uncouth, especially the mountains, that contain the mines. The town is said to be near two leagues in compass, and consequently the largest in Peru. There are four principal mines of silver, besides other smaller ones. Notwithstanding the barrenness of the country, the town is well provided with every necessary, some provinces sending the best of their grain and fruit, others their cattle, and others their manufactures. Those who trade in European commodities, resort to Potosi, as to a market, where they are lure of converting their merchandize into silver. Another species of commerce, carried on by a set of people called Aviadores, consists falls

sifts in exchanging coin, towards paying the necessary expences of the workmen, for ingots and pinnos. As for the article of quicksilver, it is wholly engrossed by the crown. Though the mines do not yield a fourth part of what they did formerly, yet from the wealth of the galleons, and the number of wedges and bars of silver on board, we may conclude, that the treasure extracted at this day is very considerable, and would be more so, were the Spaniards as skilful in metallurgy as some other nations. From the year 1545, when the mines were first discovered, to 1574, the king's fifth is said to have amounted to seventy-six millions of pesos, or pieces of eight.

The discovery of the mines is said to have been owing to the following accident : An Indian, called Hualpa, pursuing some wild goats upon the mountains, and coming to a steep place, laid hold of a shrub to assist his ascent, which yielding to his weight, came up by the roots, and disclosed a mass of silver. At the same time he observed large lumps of the metal in the earth, which adhered to the roots of the plant. With the first fruits of his discovery, the Indian, who lived at Porco, about 20 miles from Potosi, hastened home, washed the silver, and made use of it, repairing, when his stock was exhausted, to the mountain for a new supply. In course of time, an intimate friend of his observing the extraordinary change in his circumstances, was desirous of knowing the cause ; and urging him closely upon this head, obtained an ample discovery of the whole secret. For some time they maintained a kind of partnership ; but Hualpa refusing to disclose his method of purifying the metal, so offended his comrade, that he immediately revealed the whole to his master Villareal, a Spaniard, who lived at Porco.

Besides the silver mines near Potosi, there are many others in the audience, especially towards Chili. There are also some of gold.

La Paz is a considerable town, situated near the spring-head of a river, about two hundred and twenty miles from La Plata to the north-west ; and one hundred and twenty-five from the sea-coast to the east. The mountains of the adjacent country are said to abound in gold, and the plains and vallies in grain, fruit trees, and fields of maize. About thirty miles to the north-west of this town lies the lake of Titicaca, which is said to be eighty miles in circumference, and to have a communication with the lake of Paria, distant above one hundred and twenty miles to the south, and almost as large.

Atacoma is a small place, forty leagues up the country from Cobija, a village on the coast, where there is a small creek or harbour. Atacoma gives name to a desert of great extent, and very wild and hideous, lying between it and Copiapo in Chili.

Arica stands on the sea-coast, near three hundred miles from Potosi, and has a good harbour, but contains only about one hundred and fifty families. Formerly most of the silver of Potosi was shipped here for Lima, but now it is chiefly sent by land as the safest, though most expensive conveyance. Agi, or Guinea pepper, is much cultivated near this town.

Ylo is a small port, at the mouth of a river, in the 18th degree of south latitude.

Santa Cruz de la Sierra, or the Holy Cross of the mountain, is the capital of a little province, situated about fifty-five miles from La Plata to the north-east.

The coast of Peru, in South America, was first discovered by some ships sent from Panama, by Vasco Nunnes de Balboa, in the year 1514.

There is a cluster of island called the Gallipagos, lying four hundred miles west of Peru, under the equator.

According to Ulloa, the audience of Los Charcas comprehends also the province of Tucuman, with Paraguay.

TUCUMAN.

Although the Spaniards possess only a few cities, in the extensive province of Tucuman, they have nevertheless the dominion of the whole. Ulloa expressly calls it a government within the jurisdiction of Los Charcas ; but neither he, nor any other writer, ascertains its exact limits, or describes the country with any degree of accuracy. It lies westward of Paraguay, and south of the river of Plate ; but where it begins or ends we cannot precisely determine. According to the latest geographers, it does not extend beyond the 37. of south latitude. Ulloa says it reaches from north to south, above one hundred leagues. The cities possessed by the Spaniards, are St. Jago del Estero, so called from a river on which it is situated, whose inundations greatly contribute to fertilize the adjacent land, St. Miguel del Tucuman, Nuestra Sennora de Talavera, Cordova de la Nueva, Andalusia, Rioja, and the large village of San Salvador. The two first of these are the most considerable ; the two last are small, and built without order or symmetry. The chief design of the court of Madrid in maintaining settlements here, is to secure a communication cation between the colonies on the south and North Seas ; for the commodities of the country of themselves would hardly reimburse the expence of keeping garrisons : they consist chiefly in honey, wax, sugar, wine, cotton, woollen stuffs manufactured by the natives ; and mules, much admired for their strength and agility, on which account, great numbers of them are exported to the other provinces of South America.

PARAGUAY.

Paraguay, or La Plata, is bounded by the country of the Amazons on the north ; by Brazil on the east ; by Patagonia on the south ; and by Peru and Chili on the west ; extending, it is said, fifteen hundred miles in length, from north to south, and almost as much in breadth. It takes the names of Paraguay and La Plata, from the rivers so called. The land, generally speaking, is very rich and fruitful, producing plenty of wheat, and other European grain, rice, Indian corn, sugar-canes, some vines, and whole woods of peaches, almonds, figs, &c. together with cotton, indigo, pimento, ipecacuanha, a great variety of other drugs and herbs ; among which is that called Paraguay, which probably gives name to the river, and is an excellent emetic, used not only by the Indians, but by the Spaniards and Portuguese, all over Peru, Chili, and Brazil. As this is the only country where it is produced, the demand for it is so great, that it would suffice alone to form a very flourishing trade, were there no other article of commerce ; but, besides the above mentioned, here are also vast herds of cattle, with horses, mules, sheep and goats, hogs wild and tame, and plenty of fish, fowls, and venison. The Portuguese and Spaniards kill great numbers of the cattle merely for their hides and tallow. There is a kind of boars, whose navel is said to grow upon their backs, and whose flesh is not only very wholesome and nourishing, but of a most delicate taste. Of wild beasts, here are baboons very tall and strong, lions, tigers, leopards, foxes, &c. some of the snakes are said to be of a monstrous size, namely twenty or thirty feet in length, and several feet round. The rivers breed great numbers of alligators and crocodiles, which are said to be harmless, and very good to eat, especially roasted. Mines not only of iron and copper, but of gold, silver, and the finest amethysts, we are told, have been discovered in this country.

To the west of the great river Paraguay, are vast plains, extending some hundred miles, with very little wood upon them, May, 1777.

and scarce a hill to be seen ; but in that part of the country which lies to the east of the river, and is divided from Brazil by a ridge of mountains.

The chief river of this country is the Paraguay, from which it takes its name ; and which, after issuing from the Laguna de Los Xarayes, in 15°. south latitude, it runs through it from north to south, and is joined by several other rivers. About the 28°. it is joined by the Paranas, and about the 30°. by the Uragua, a large river, and near Buenos Ayres, by the river of Plate, which rises in Peru, and at its junction gives name to the river, till it falls into the Atlantic Ocean, fifty leagues below Buenos Ayres. There are also many lakes in Paraguay, the chief of which are the Xaraya, Caracoraes, and Venoras.

The climate of Paraguay is very little different from that of Spain ; and the distinctions between the seasons much the same. In winter, indeed, violent tempests of wind and rain are very frequent, accompanied with such dreadful claps of thunder and lightning, as fill the inhabitants, though used to them, with terror and consternation. In summer, the excessive heats are mitigated by gentle breezes, which constantly begin at eight or nine in the morning. In short, for the enjoyment of life, especially with regard to the salubrity of the air, a finer country cannot be imagined.

Almost every forest of this country abounds with bees, which make their hives in the hollow of trees. There are here ten different species of these useful insects. That most esteemed for the whiteness of its wax, and the delicacy of its honey, is called opemus, but is very scarce. The cotton-tree is a native of the country, and grows in thickets, as in Louisiana. The Spaniards sow and use hemp in pretty large quantities.

Besides maize, manioc, and potatoes, which thrive very well in several places, and in which the food of those Indians who cultivate the earth chiefly consists ; there are in this country many fruits and simples not known in Europe. In particular, there are some fruits, of which the Spaniards make excellent sweetmeats. Some have planted vines, which do not thrive equally well in every district. Wheat has been sown in some places, but it is seldom made use of but for cakes, and other things of that kind. There are every where venomous herbs, with which some Indians poison their arrows ; but the antidotes are equally common ; and among others, the herb called Sparrows herb, which forms pretty large bushes, and was discovered, and obtained its name, in the following manner.

Among the different kinds of sparrows found in these provinces, most of which are of the size of our black-birds, there is a very pretty one called Macagua. This little creature is very fond of the flesh of vipers, against whom, for this reason, he wages a continual war. As soon, therefore, as he spies one of these reptiles, he whips his head under his wing, and gathers himself up into a round ball, without the least appearance of life or motion; he does not, however, cover his eyes so entirely, but that he may peep through the feathers of his wing, and observe the motions of his game, which he suffers to approach without stirring, until he finds it near enough to receive a stroke of his bill, which he then suddenly discharges at it. The viper immediately returns the compliment with another of his tongue, but the minute the sparrow finds himself wounded, he flies to his herb, eats some of it, and is instantly cured. He then returns to the charge, and has recourse to his herb every time the viper stings him. This conflict lasts till the viper, destitute of the same resource, has lost all his blood; as soon as the reptile is dead, the sparrow falls to work upon the carcase, and concludes the feast with a new dose of his antidote.

There are few countries which breed so great a number, and so many different species of serpents and such other reptiles; but there are a great many of them no way poisonous, or whose poison is any way dangerous. The Indians know these innocent though frightful reptiles, take them up alive in their hands, and make girdles of them without any bad consequence. There are some of these creatures twenty two feet long, and proportionably thick. Among those that are oviparous, there are some which lay very large eggs, and make use of incubation to hatch them.

The rattle-snake, so common in several provinces of North-America, is no where more so than in Paraguay. It has been observed in this country, that this reptile suffers greatly when its gums are too much distended with venom; and that, to get rid of this venom, it falls upon every thing in its way with two crooked fangs, pretty large at their roots, but terminating in a point, and, by means of a hollow in these fangs, pours into the wound it makes all the humour that tormented it. The effects of the bite of this and many other kinds of serpents is very sudden; sometimes the blood issues violently at the eyes, nose, ears, gums, and roots of the nails; but there are antidotes to be found every where against this poison. The most successful are, a stone to which they have given the name of St. Paul, bezoard, and a poultice of chewed garlick. The very head of the animal, and its liver, which is likewise eaten to purify the blood, are equally efficacious. The surest method, however, is to begin by making an incision directly in the part that has been stung, and then apply brimstone to it; nay, this drug alone has been often found to make a perfect cure.

There are here, likewise, some hunting serpents, which climb up the trees to discover their prey, and from thence dart upon it when within reach, squeeze it so tight that it cannot stir, and then devour it alive at their leisure.

Many of these reptiles live upon fish; and Father Montoya informs us, that he happened one day to espy a huge snake, whose head was as big as a calf's, fishing on the banks of a river. The first thing that the monster did was to discharge by its mouth a great quantity of foam into the river; he then thrust his head into the water, and kept it very quiet, till a great many small fishes, attracted by the foam, had gathered about it; when, suddenly opening his jaws, he laid about him, and swallowed the fish in great numbers.

Paraguay was first discovered by Sebastian Gaboto, who passed from Rio de la Plata, in 1526, to the river Parana, in small barks, and thence entered the river called Paraguay. Don Pedro de Mendoza, the first governor of Buenos-Ayres, gave Juan de Ayolos a commission, and a body of forces, to complete the reduction of it; but it was the Jesuits who first brought a considerable part of it into actual obedience.

The natives of Paraguay are of a moderate stature, and well proportioned, their faces flat, and rather round than oval, their complexion olive; and they have long black hair, as strong as horse-hair; they now conform to the Spanish fashions. They are a brave people, but lazy and indolent, and dull at invention; but imitate almost any thing, and are become excellent mechanics, since the Europeans furnished them with patterns.

Some of the unconverted tribes are said to fatten the prisoners they take, and to feast on them. Dead bodies among some are laid up in great pots, which, from a notion that the souls are buried with them, they take care to cover with hollow or concave lids, to prevent their being stified. The wives of the caciques, or petty princes, wear a kind of triple crown made of straw, and their lords hang doe-skins over their shoulders, the rest wear only a piece wrapped have stated the charge and the defence, and very cheerfully commit the whole to the judgment of our intelligent readers, to decide upon what from us can deserve no public opinion.

From the months of April and May, 1774, the history of this gentleman's political character may be contained in a nut-shell. He has, from that period to the present, held up the highest tone of opposition; and has frequently made the Minister uneasy on his seat; sitting at the same time the whole Treasury Bench with terror and dismay.

Colonel Barre's oratory is manly, nervous, and convincing, and such as may be supposed to have actuated the breast, and have fallen from the mouth of a Grecian or Roman General, when the Legislator, Archon, or Consul, were able to carry into execution those plans and operations of war, which they proposed or supported in the senate or their popular assemblies. He is generally well informed, particularly in the way of his profession, and never fails to deliver his sentiments in open, bold terms, seemingly without any predilection for his friends or his opponents, from the former of whom he frequently differs. His matter is not various, but generally selected and well chosen. He never speaks on any subject of which he is not well informed, and usually deals in truths too clear to be controverted, and too severe to be palliated or defended. The Minister of War*, as well as the Minister of the Finances†, frequently feels the weight of those truths, and the energy of expression with which they are accompanied and enforced; and that in a manner too pungent and mortifying to be ever forgotten, or perhaps forgiven. He is well acquainted with the whole detail of the military establishment, with the arrangements dependent on it, and with the proper ordering of the troops, whether directed to operations of war, or in times of domestic tranquillity. In short, as he is one of the most pointed forcible speakers in the House, though perhaps far from being the greatest orator, if we were to hazard a conjecture on mere appearance, we are inclined to think that Administration would esteem him the most valuable acquisition they could at present obtain; and that he is the individual in the House of Commons, on the side of opposition (Messrs. Burke, Dunning, or Fox, not excepted) in the present state of things, whose defection would deserve most to be regretted.

On the other hand, Colonel Barre,

N O T E.

* Lord Barrington. † Lord North.

though a man of letters, does not possess the extensive funds of knowledge for which some of his partizans are so eminently distinguished. The early part of his days was passed in camps, and learning the rudiments of his profession, not in Courts or Senates. His oratory has few of those graces which recommend even trifles. He seldom directs his elocution so as to gain the avenues to the heart; and when he makes the attempt, he always misses his way; he never studied the graces; or if he did, he made as unsuccessful a progress as Phil. Stanhope. He speaks like a soldier, thinks like a politician, and delivers his sentiments like a man. On the whole, he may and ought to profit from the sneers of his antagonists. They call him the Story Teller, and with great justice; for whether it be the salvation of a great empire, or a skirmish with a few wild Indians, the Colonel is never at a loss for a story in point, in which he himself had the fortune to be one of the Dramatis Personæ.

We will close this rude sketch, by affirming, that we have heard him interlard some of his most pointed speeches on the most important occasions, with anecdotes that would disgrace a school-boy at the Christmas recess; or a garrulous old woman, when she takes it into her head to be most narrative, uninteresting, and loquacious.

Cautions concerning Marriage; with a remarkable Story.

THE many misfortunes arising to interrupt the joys and destroy the peace of conjugal felicity, generally derive their source from not duly weighing, beforehand, in what the comforts and conveniences of matrimony consist.—In order to secure as far as human prudence is capable, happiness in a wedded state, it is first to be mutually considered, whether the mind of the party we are about to engage with in this important affair, is formed on the principles of virtue, without which, the duties of conjugal affection and friendship cannot long subsist.

Secondly; that riches are not to be looked upon as the only incitement to such engagement; because when that is merely the motive—lasting felicity can never be expected.

Thirdly; that the charms of a good face, without the beauties of the better part (the mind), should not bewitch us so far, as to entail misery and disquietude, as long as life endures, which is too frequently the case, when appetite is sated.

Fourthly; It should be the mutual resolution of those who are about to enter into that state, or are already engaged in it,

it, to confine themselves according to their stations in life, to such sort of pleasures only, which their circumstances will admit of, and which are consistent with the duty of rational and virtuous beings.—A contrary behaviour will be attended with dreadful consequences,—whereas the conduct above recommended, will lead us to true happiness.—The following story may help to illustrate what is here advanced.

Eugenio was a young gentleman, from the nature of his education, addicted to gaiety and expence, which he supported by the assistance of good sense and a plentiful fortune, without injuring his reputation or estate. Having no family of his own, he made a visit to a friend in the country, with design of passing the summer with him.—Sempronia happened to be there at the same time, by the invitation of the lady of the house, with whom she had been always educated: Her person was nothing remarkable, but a sweet disposition and a good natural understanding, made her conversation agreeable.—Upon his first arrival, Eugenio was too well-bred not to shew a particular civility to one, who was so much respected by the family, and Sempronia knew how to return it by a suitable behaviour.—They had not been long acquainted, before the sprightliness of his conversation, and the amiable innocence of her's, begot a mutual desire of rendering themselves agreeable to each other. Eugenio's education had been too ingenuous to harbour a wish that was dishonourable; and Sempronia willingly encouraged an inclination that was so much to her advantage. She knew he possessed no ill quality, and thought he would be easily weaned from a love of shew and expence by a more settled way of life. But his desire to live splendid got the better of his passion:—He would not throw himself away upon one who had but 300*l.* for her portion; so determined to return to Dublin, to obliterate his fondness by the diversions of the town.

Theana came up about the same time to spend the winter with her aunt—She was the only daughter of a gentleman of fortune, by whose death she was lately come into the possession of 1500*l.*—She was determined never to marry a man who could not support her in the magnificence that such a fortune might expect, and for that reason only had refused Euphorbus, a young gentleman, bred up to a profession in which his natural abilities, joined to steady application, promised him the greatest success.—They had long been acquainted, and so perfectly agreeable to each other, that Euphorbus had just reason to believe he would prevail over her desire for grandeur, which was the only failing she possessed;—but that passion was predominant—she was afraid it would be said she had acted imprudently, and that she would not be able to withstand the reflections of the world, for having only one footman behind a chariot and pair of horses—when she might have half a dozen powdered valets behind her coach and fix!—

Upon her coming to Dublin, Eugenio made his addresses among the rest,—and as his fortune enabled him to make a suitable settlement—Preliminaries were soon agreed on;—before they had been ten times together, the lawyers were bribed not to be dilatory—Several thousands were expended in plate and jewels!—The gay livery and gilded car proclaimed them the happiest couple of the season;—but they soon found happiness did not consist in shew. Little contrarieties of temper were the cause of continual differences, which at length, in two years, rose to such a height, that they were in a manner parted.—To avoid the uneasiness of home, Eugenio indulged himself in his amours,—and Theana was only more private;—his money was thrown away at bazard—her's as religiously devoted to quadrille;—he was regardless of the education of his sons, because he was not sure they were his own;—she instructed her daughters in nothing but cards and romances.

But it is time to make enquiry after the other two:—The next winter after her disappointment, Sempronia came to Dublin, with her female friend—Euphorbus accidentally fell into her company; frequent meetings created an acquaintance; that acquaintance encreased gradually into a mutual esteem, which as it was not founded upon interest, but a thorough knowledge of each other, they had good reason to believe would continue. The smallness of her fortune was compensated by tenderness and economy;—the desire of providing for his children, made him double his application to his profession, and she was in the mean time agreeably entertained in taking care of their education—He was daily adding to their fortune, she to their virtue!—In the decline of life they retired to a country-house and estate, which his profession and her economy had enabled him to buy of Eugenio, whose extravagance and ill-management had obliged him to sell part of his estate, as soon as his booby son was old enough to be bribed to cut off the entail.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

Lisburn, March 20, 1777.

HAPPENING lately to make a visit to a relation of mine in Cork, I could not help taking notice of its excellent situation for commerce, its delightful neighbourhood, and the polite behaviour, good manners, affability, and great hospitality of its inhabitants. The following is as true and exact an account of these particulars, as at present I can recollect.

This city is situated about 123 miles S. W. of Dublin, partly on several islands, formed by the river Lee, which are quayed in, like the towns in Holland, and partly on rising grounds on each side of the river. The situation of the greatest part of the city is very low, and built on marshy ground, but the environs of the city for beauty, are scarcely to be equalled; the lands rise in gentle hills, ornamented with many country-houses, gardens, and plantations, with woods and fields of variegated verdure. The hills immediately adjoining the city, are so thick set with beautiful villas, which rise gradually above each other, that the prospect is hardly equalled, but not exceeded, in Europe.

The city and suburbs are nearly two miles long and one broad, being almost as large as Bristol, but much better situated in regard to trade, its harbour being esteemed one of the best in Europe. Large vessels do not come up to the town, but anchor at a place called Passage, about five miles lower down; but by means of several canals, which are cut through the principal streets, small vessels, under 150 tons burthen, can come up to the merchants ware-houses in most parts of the town, and unload before the very doors.

In number of houses and inhabitants, Cork is supposed to contain nearly one-third as many as Dublin, or about nine thousand houses, which is a greater number than in any three lesser cities in Ireland, or any one in England, except London and Bristol.

In this city are one cathedral and seven parish-churches: Christ-church is the largest, and esteemed the handsomest church in the city, but on account of its leaning greatly on one side, by some part of the foundation giving way, the steeple was obliged to be taken down in the year 1748. The inside work of this church is very beautiful:—It has a fine organ.

The cathedral church of St. Finbarry, is the second in the city for size and magnificence; it has a high steeple, with a fine ring of bells, and a good organ.

Upper Shandon and Lower Shandon churches are fine buildings, each having an excellent ring of bells and a good organ. The rest of the churches are only plain buildings, having no organs.

There are five or six meeting-houses for Dissenters of various sects; among whom the Quakers form a numerous body. The French Protestants and Jews have each their place of worship here, and the Roman Catholics, who are supposed to form two-thirds of the inhabitants, have seven chapels and two nunneries in the city and suburbs.

In the ~~southern~~ liberty of this city, is situated St. Stephen's, or the Blue-coat-hospital, founded chiefly by Dr. Worth, bishop of Killaloe, and dean of Cork, about the year 1700; at which time the number of boys maintained and educated in the house were but eight, which number are now increased to forty-two; who are boarded, clothed, and educated, and when of a suitable age, are apprenticed to proper trades, or to the sea-service.

The Green-coat hospital in the North liberty, was erected in 1716, and at that time designed for the reception of fifty boys, and as many girls; but by the decrease of contributions, and insufficiency of the original fund, the present number maintained and educated on this foundation are but thirty boys and ten girls, who are apprenticed when of a proper age.—In an apartment adjoining, are lodging for eighteen reduced housekeepers: Two wings are built to this hospital on stone columns, which are called Bertridg's Alms-house, in which seventy aged persons of both sexes are lodged, having sufficient firing provided, and an allowance in money.

In St. Peter's parish, in 1719, Captain Thomas Dean built a large and handsome house adjoining the church, with school-rooms, &c. and endowed the same with 52*l.* per annum. In this school twenty boys and twenty girls are clothed and educated. There are several other parish-schools and alms-houses in the city, which I shall not particularly mention.

There are also two infirmaries here, attended by the most eminent physicians, gratis; where the wounded and infirm have proper assistance afforded them.

T t

The

The work-house, or house of industry, is just finished, and open for the reception of the vagrant poor, of which there are now near an hundred in the house, and others daily taking up : The use and convenience of this institution is so very obvious, that 'tis a matter of surprize, that several very opulent towns in this kingdom are without such houses.

In 1774, some of the principal inhabitants of this city, formed an association, for the relief and discharge of those confined for small debts. As a full account of this institution is given in your Magazine for May, 1775, p. 279, 'tis needless to say more, than that from June, 1774, to June, 1776, 112 prisoners have been discharged, whereby 74 wives, and upwards of 300 children, have been redeemed from a state of indigence and misery.

A society was lately formed here for the recovery of persons apparently drowned. One guinea is paid to any person who shall take another out of the water, who has not been two hours in it ; half a guinea is given to any one who shall receive such person into his house, and those assisting are in proportion rewarded.

There are two charitable loans established here : The first was set on foot in June, 1772, from which time to October, 1775, 785 industrious tradesmen have been assisted, with 2*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* each, which is repaid at a British shilling per week.

The other was established by the profits arising from a musical debating society, in 1772 ; 100 poor people have been assisted with various sums, which is repaid at 6*d.* halfp. per week by the borrower.

The Exchange, situated in the centre of the city, is a handsome building of hewn stone, having five arches in front, supported by pillars. Here the public courts of the city are held.

The Market-house, near the Exchange, is a very large and good building, supported by a great number of stone pillars.

The Mayoralty-house is situated near the Red-house-walk, which is a full mile long, and planted with trees at each side : This is a magnificent building, but appears rather heavy in the outside ; however the apartments are convenient and commodious. In this house is a fine statue of Lord Chatham, of white marble, which cost 500*l.* On one of the stone bridges over the river Lee, is an equestrian statue of his late Majesty, which was erected in 1761.

The Old Barrack is a very large square, but the building low ; on the contrary the new barrack is built very high, but the area is narrow and inconvenient : In both together are convenient lodging for two regiments of foot.

In this city is an elegant theatre, built by the late Mr. Barry, in which plays are performed by the Dublin actors, during the summer vacation, but 'tis a general complaint, that there are few diversions in this city in winter, to enable the inhabitants to pass agreeably that unpleasant time of the year : there are also assembly-rooms, and private balls and concerts at times in this city.

The streets in general are narrow, and very dirty in winter, and of late years there have been no public lights here ; but from a Corporation remarkable for their public spirit, every thing is to be hoped, and perhaps soon these complaints may cease.

The trade of this city is very great, particularly in the export of beef and other provisions, in which it exceeds all the other ports in Ireland put together. A great quantity of wool is smuggled from hence to France, to the great detriment of our home manufacture.

In and near the city are several very fine public walks, which in fine weather present us with a sight of as much gaiety and beauty as any public places in Europe, if we except capitals and their environs. The Ladies here are deservedly esteemed the greatest beauties in this kingdom, or perhaps in that adjoining ;—by the charms of their minds, they add a lustre to that of their persons.

The inhabitants in general are genteel in their behaviour, polite and affable in their conversation, noted for their hospitality to strangers, in which they exceed their neighbours, Irish hospitality being now almost confined to this city. As to their being possessed of the great virtue of Charity, I appeal to the many charitable institutions above.

Description of the City of Londonderry.

THIS city is situated on the river Foyle, three miles S. of Lough Foyle, and 114 N. W. of Dublin. It consists of two principal streets crossing each other at right angles, and dividing the town into four equal parts, besides several lesser streets and lanes : The houses are several stories high, and well built, of hewn stone, and the streets well paved ; the number of houses in the city and suburbs are about 1500. In the centre of the city is a handsome exchange, or tholiel, and a market-market-house. The cathedral, which is the only church in the city, is a very fine building, with a high steeple, on which a fine spire, 85 feet high, is now erecting, at the expence of the bishop, which when finished, will be one of the finest spires in the kingdom, making the whole 171 feet in height, which is higher than any spire steeple in Ireland, St. Patrick's in Dublin excepted.—Besides the cathedral and exchange, the city is ornamented with several handsome buildings, as meeting-houses, custom-house, barrack, &c. A considerable manufactory of linen is carried on here, but the imports and exports are small, when compared with Belfast, or even with Newry.

This city is a county of itself, and governed by a mayor, aldermen, &c. who with the freemen, return two members to parliament.

The walls of the city are yet standing, but the greatest part of the town lies without the walls.

Description of Drogheda.

DROGHEDA is situated about twenty-three miles N. of Dublin, at each side of the river Boyne, near the counties of Meath, east, and Louth, but is of itself a co. independent of either, governed by a mayor, sheriffs, aldermen, &c. who with the freemen, return two members to parliament. The two principal streets, which are well built of brick, cross each other at right angles, and divide the town into four equal parts; these are intersected by several lesser streets and lanes, several of which are well built of brick or stone. Near the centre of the town is a handsome tholsel, or town-house, where the assizes are held: over the centre arch is a handsome clock and a high steeple: The barrack is a pretty good building, in which two companies of foot are constantly quartered. In the town are two parish churches, a Presbyterian and Methodist meeting-house, and four or five Roman Catholic chapels.—St. Peter's church is a fine large building, beautifully situated on a rising ground, in one of the principal streets; the spire is very high, and the inside work very grand, having an excellent organ. St. Mary's church is a large building, without a steeple, and no way remarkable for the elegance of its architecture. The meeting-houses and chapels are pretty good buildings.

There are for public amusement a good theatre and assembly-rooms in the town.

Drogheda is a walled town, but great part of it lies without the walls. The number of houses in the town and suburbs are not exactly known, but must certainly exceed 2000 considerably.

In this town is a great free-school, as it is called, with a considerable foundation, but the scholars pay pretty well for their education. Were the numerous foundations of this sort in this nation properly applied, according to the original intention of the founders, it would be of great service to the offspring of the lower class of people in the kingdom.

The triennial custom of riding the franchises is still kept up in this town.

The town-goal is over one of the gates. The length of the town and suburbs is just a mile, in breadth it is about half as much, and about two one-half circumference.

The trade of this town is very considerable in imports and exports, and in shop-keeping, as also the manufacture of a coarse kind of linen cloth, of which a great weekly market is held here on Saturday.

Description of the Town of Downpatrick.

DOWNPATRICK is situated at the S. W. corner of the lake of Strangford, about 72 miles N. E. of Dublin. It is the shire town of the county of Down, and except Newry, the largest town in the county; consisting of four principal streets, centering near a point, besides several lanes and lesser streets, and may contain about six or seven hundred houses, some of brick and others of stone. The town is distinguished into several quarters, as the English, Irish, and Scotch quarters, &c. The old cathedral of Down stands within about 200 paces of the town, on the ascent of an hill, and is yet venerable in its ruins.—The roof was supported by five handsome arches, and compose a centre ayle of twenty-six feet broad and two lateral ayles, each thirteen feet wide; the whole structure is 100 feet long; the heads of the pillars and arches, the tops of the windows, and many niches in the walls have been adorned with variety of sculpture in stone, some part of which yet remain, and over the east window are three handsome ancient niches with pedestals, on which stood statues of St. Patrick, St. Bridget, and St. Columb, who are said to have been buried here in one tomb.

The present church of Down, being 90 feet by 40 in the clear, stands in another part of the town; it was rebuilt in the year 1735, 'tis a very neat and handsome building; on the inner wall of the north side is a handsome monument of black marble, erected to the memory of John M'Neal, dean of Down.

The session-house was designed and well executed by Mr. Hugh Darling, of Dublin. Here are two handsome court-rooms, one for carrying on the business of the crown, and the other for the dispatch of civil causes, with rooms for grand juries, petit juries, and juries of matrons. In the area of the court-house, near the entrance, are placed in niches, two very fine statues of Justice, and Plenty, represented by Ceres; opposite to these are correspondent niches, not yet filled; on each side of the bench for crown business, are the pictures of King William III. and his late Majesty, at full length, and well painted. The building cost about 3000l.

On a rising ground, near the session-house, are accommodations for three clergymen's widows, who each have a convenient house and garden, with twenty pounds yearly, raised by subscription.

On the declivity of an hill, near the town, stands an handsome hospital, extending 245 feet in front, and is divided into a middle range, and two contiguous projecting wings, a handsome clock and cupola are raised over the great gate-way, in the centre of the principal front. The building is of brick, ornamented with free-stone, and executed in an elegant manner. In this hospital are maintained twelve old people of both sexes; and about twenty children, besides several children get their education and cloathing from the foundation. The master and mistress have good apartments in the house.

Besides those structures, the town is ornamented with several other handsome buildings, as a Diocesan-school, a large market-house, 62 feet by 32, Dissenters meeting-house, a handsome custom-house, the county infirmary, and a barrack for a troop of horse.

This town has a great manufacture of linen-cloth, and a pretty considerable import of foreign merchandize, but the exports are inconsiderable.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principles and refined Improvements.

BY the first letter we are informed, that Mr. William Trenchard (eldest son of Sir William, and heir to near 9000l. per annum) was at the university of Leyden—this was in the year 1746, where he staid three years, and then went on his travels—intending to go through France, and Italy, to visit the politest courts in Europe, and if his father did not recall him, to proceed as far as Constantinople.

But, when he had gone through France, and was just arrived at the borders of Italy he was ordered home, on account of his mother's threatening illness—No sooner had he the summons, than he hastened to return; he found her better, and as we have heard, was often hours in her chamber—There he ordinarily found Nancy Pelham, who, as has been observed, was handsome in person, genteel in manners, modest in deportment, ingenious in business, and all attentive to her lady. The young gentleman saw those qualities, and could not but pay some attention to them; he saw her not much during the first three months; for when he paid his visits to his mother, Nancy seldom staid in the room—Sometimes, when she rose to go Lady Trenchard would bid her stay, but she was always modestly silent, and as Mr. Trenchard was heir to such a family, and had been long absent, and he was by all the servants treated with much the same deference as Sir William himself, and with great respect by all the neighbouring gentry, she looked on him as a sort of master in the house, and the expected head of the borough.

He always admired her looks and behaviour, and once or twice when he entered his mother's room, found her reading to her lady, who would bid her go on, if Mr. Trenchard had no particular point of conversation in view—He took notice of the propriety of her accents, and that she was capable of entering into the spirit of an author.

After about ten months, he thought he felt a something playing about his heart, like a peculiar passion; but he would not allow the thought to lodge there. Nancy was very intimate with Miss Collet, and Miss Liarmel, whose brothers were educated with Mr. Trenchard, under the care of Dr. Brice. These young gentlemen were acquainted with her, she being frequently at Miss Collet's house, as her lady gave leave. With these and other young persons of virtue, she met, when their conversation was on books and ingenious topics. After Mr. Trenchard came home, as she knew he visited there with freedom, she was more backward to go, fearing he would think her assuming. She therefore proposed to Miss Collet to correspond by letter, giving as her reason, her lady's growing infirmities, that it was not proper to leave her for a visit. Miss Collet was pleased with the motion, for she delighted in Nancy's writings. When Mr. Trenchard spent an afternoon with those agreeable young ladies and gentlemen, they several times mentioned Miss Nancy Pelham, as a fine sensible girl, and charming company, adding their regret that they could not have more of it; to which, he would would only say, "she seemed to be a clever girl, and behaved well." Miss Collet and Miss Harmel imagined he was haughty in temper, because he did not praise, and seemed to speak so coldly of her. The judgment of these his acquaintance, naturally led him to observe her more exactly, and the more he saw, the better he liked her. He found in himself a wish that she was not so handsome, as she had no fortune, nor was of a family equal to one he was entitled to be connected with; he was at times vexed with himself, that he should be so foolish, as he then called it, to think so much about the girl; but whenever he saw her, he could scarcely take his eyes from her, and his feelings were all softened: this alarmed him, and he absented himself more from his mother's room, which the good lady observing to him, he told her, "He hoped she would excuse him, but he thought it not so proper for a lady's woman to be witness to all their conversation." She said, "that should not be a hindrance, for Nancy should take her work and sit in her closet when he came in." This method was observed till Lady Trenchard needed close attendance, and Nancy's presence could not be dispensed with; but in the interim, an occurrence happened that helped to increase his regard for her, and kindled a passion that never decreased after.

One afternoon her lady having Madam Masham and Mrs. Brice with her, desired Nancy to go abroad and divert herself; Nancy went to visit Miss Collet, where were Miss Harmel and the Miss Brices; after a little space, Mr. Collet and Mr. Harmel, the brothers of the young ladies, joined them. They were all free and sociable in conversation, in which Nancy bore her part, for she had something judicious to say on every point, and they always were pleased with her remarks. In about an hour Mr. Trenchard entered the room; the conversation was not interrupted, for he joined in it with his usual ease, nor were the ladies under any restraint; he was intimate at the house and free with all his friends. But Nancy the remainder of her time sat silent, except when she was particularly spoken to, then she briefly replied. Mr. Trenchard was observed to colour when the other young gentlemen were complaisant to her, or make her a polite compliment; but he never spoke himself to her. She thought he did not like for her to be of the company, and shortened her visit, alledging that she must call at Mr. Butler's; the ladies, tho' reluctantly, complied. They were the more confirmed now in their suspicions, that he was haughty, and they determined, after the manner of girls, to mortify him the first fair opportunity.

Not long after, one occurred, that gave Miss Collet high pleasure, and as she thought, ample revenge. Miss Collet had called on Nancy, and they agreed their next letters should be wrote in poetry. While with her, she asked "why she was silent when Mr. Trenchard was at her house, as she was so sociable before?" and added, "every one spoke of it afterwards." Nancy replied, "she never changed twenty words scarcely with Mr. Trenchard, except by way of necessary occurrences; she always felt an awe of persons so much her superior, and she could not talk in his presence; he never took much notice of her at home, and she thought would not like her to join in a conversation where he had a part." Miss Collet laughed, and merrily replied, "You are a simpleton, Miss Pelham; I had as soon talk to him as to any one else; what if he has more money, and is to be Sir William? he is only Billy Trenchard now, and I don't know he has more sense or more knowledge than some other folks." "Than Billy Harmel you mean?" replied Nancy, who was Miss Collet's humble servant—"Ay, or Peter Evelant, Dick Jones, or Bob Digby; and if their pride was gratified as much by the girls as you do Mr. Trenchard's, by your very humble demeanor, they would take state on them too; but this won't do—their poor heads cannot bear it. You will make the young gentleman prouder, if possible, than his father. I tell you, Nancy, these men can't balance themselves, 'tis the women that must steady their helm, or they'll overset in the tempest of ambition; but, thanks to good steerage, we can, and will turn their little barks as we please, unless through the intervention of clouds we lose sight of our pole-star, reason and prudence." Miss Nancy only said, "it would not become her to do and say what might be proper and well taken in Miss Collet. She was but a servant, and she prided herself in the title, since Lady Trenchard was her mistress, and she should always look on Mr. Trenchard in the light of a master, while she staid there, as the rest of them did, though she had no sort of dependance on, or connexion with him." "Mighty well, said Miss Collet, and call him master, my dear, I'd have you, and that will crown all." Nancy only smiled, and said, "No, that implies dependance and subjection, and I am not the one, nor do I mean the other. I have no business with him at all."

A few days after, Miss Collet received a poetical epistle from Nancy. She was charmed charmed with the sentiments and poetry. The subject was on the Pleasures of Contemplation. She was fired with emulation, and sat down to make a return; but nothing equal could she form, though at liberty to chuse her own subject—She wrote and burnt—She mus'd till she felt vexed, and was essaying a return in praise of friendship, when by mistake of a servant, Mr. Trenchard entered her parlour, instead of her brother's, and seeing her table spread with writings, he in a cheerful humour snatch'd up one, and put it in his pocket. She endeavoured to get it from him; but could not, till she begged very submissively; it proved to be Nancy's poetical epistle. She wanted he should know it, yet was loth to break the rules of friendship; but on his saying, it would be obliging in her to let him read it, as he saw it was poetry, she told him, if he did not know the handwriting, she would read it to him. He averred upon his honour, he did not see it, so as to notice the hand. She then told him, 'twas an epistle from a young lady of her acquaintance, that she was to write in the same way, but could not write to her mind—had been hard at it ever since yesterday; had knocked at her brain till she had displaced every cell, and now she had given over—He told her if she would let him have a copy, he would do his best to court the muses for her, and with her leave, write an answer. On this she read it to him; he was charmed! "What happiness, madam, said he, to have such an acquaintance!" "I am sensible of it, replied she; some folks cannot distinguish merit, unless it stands forth in scarlet, or is robed in ermine:" looking at him, as she own'd, with severity. "They must be forbid souls indeed, madam, replied he, if they cannot value such a mind as your friend's—pray oblige me by letting me know, who your Amanda is, that I may know whether she cannot be my Amanda." "No, said she, the writer can never be your Amanda, for she is not worthy your notice." "What mean you? dear Miss Collet, said he; do you think me so poor a wretch, such a paramount of vanity, as to think the author of this piece unworthy my notice? Believe me, madam, I should think myself honoured by her notice, let her be who she will, provided her virtue is proof as her genius, and if Miss Collet did not know it to be so, she would not think the acquaintance a happiness." Miss Collet having so far gained her end, rejoined, "I cannot tell you without the seal of secrecy." He promised to observe it sacredly; but she, willing to teize him, said, "you will not believe me, when I tell you the person." "I never doubted Miss Collet's judgment, much less her veracity. You are very severe on me to-day, pray have I ever disguised you?" She was silent; he added, "I would not, madam, knowingly; if I have, pray let me know how? and I'll sue your pardon." She said, "he was not quite polite the last week to her company, for when the author of this piece was by, Mr. Trenchard did not treat her like a gentleman." He cried out, "How? Why? Dear Miss explain! I'll ask her pardon on my knees; was it Miss Harmel?" "No; Miss Harmel could not be slighted, and my brother sit by and not resent it." "Miss Brice?" said he; "No Sir, Miss Brice knows herself better than not to resent an indignity, and if she did not, she has a father that would let Mr. Trenchard know, he was once that father's pupil. No, Sir, not Miss Harmel, nor Miss Brice, nor any lady in this parish, is capable of composing such lines, except the real author, Miss Nancy Pelham!" He was struck into silence and wonder, and made no reply. She enjoyed the triumph; and told him, she desired no more acknowledgment; since she knew he censured himself, she would spare him any farther penance if he would but write an answer equal to the epistle; he said, he would attempt it—if she would let him have a copy, he would safely return it, and not take one, or show it to any other person. She complied, and sent him one; before he left her, he begged she would not expose him to her Amanda, by letting her know any thing that had passed, since he should be fond of gaining her esteem, and if things were not circumstanced as they were, her friendship. She assured him she would not tell Nancy a word, for her own sake; for that it would sink her in Nancy's opinion, who had no low ambition to satisfy, and had no desire to seek acquaintance with such great folks; they parted politely, she repeating when he was gone out, "things so circumstanced—wretches that have narrow souls, think merit, sense, genius, all meet offerings to be sacrificed to their shrine, because the altar is gilt with yellow metal, and the top is adorned with a feather."

Mr. Trenchard, full of what had passed, kept out of the way of seeing Nancy a day or two, all which time he was trying at an answer, but could not please himself, nor bear she should appear his superior to Miss Collet. The third day, his mother sent Nancy down to desire him to come to her; he was much confused, when she with such an humble mein delivered the message; but he said not a word, and went immediately up—Nancy was retiring tiring to her closet, but her lady bade her not leave her; she went on with her work at the other side of the room, and he sat by his mamma an hour: fearing, now, every moment, that Nancy would leave the room, he eyed her—and eagerly followed her steps whenever she passed the room; his mother, he thought, looked well pleased, but he did not know she observed him—he once asked Nancy, how long she had been acquainted with Miss Collett? she told him three years; whether she was intimate? she said Miss Collett was so condescending as to be familiar with her, or she should not have aspired to it; for she was greatly her superior on all accounts. “That is a mistake, charming creature, said he to himself, I don’t know where you will find your superior—O Miss Collett, well might you triumph!” He asked her, whether she went there often? “No, Sir, I have not been there but once these two months, and I don’t expect to go again in a great while;” (he was disappointed, for he wanted to meet her there again, that he might treat her with more respect before Miss Collett.) Her lady asked her, why she did not go? she was surprized to hear this! intimate as they were. Nancy told her, that she had rather stay with her; she was never easy when she left her, and Miss Collett and she had contrived a way to be social without her going; (meaning by writing). His passions were now afloat, and on the gentle tide Urania wafted him.

As soon as he left his mother he went to his closet and wrote an epistle to Amanda in praise of friendship, ending with high encomiums on her genius and virtue, and an ardent desire of her farther friendship. He waited on Miss Collett with it, together with the copy she had lent him, and desired her not to mention a word that had passed to any person. She told him she scorned to betray private conversation, she had more honour; she read the lines and owned they were pretty, but not quite equal to Amanda’s. This was evilent, he said, nor was it a mortification to him (whatever she thought) to be reckoned second to such a pen. Her triumph now was complete, and she wished all her class knew it, yet she had too much virtue to forfeit her word.

[Scene, Strawberry Hall, the Seat of Sir Gilbert.]

Though critical expectation is much disappointed at the general run of those petit pieces that are exhibited for the benefit of performers, this little dramatic morceau has merit sufficient to be excluded this catalogue: The plan of it is briefly this. Some strollers playing in a barn near Sir Gilbert’s, have left the theatrical contagion amongst the family; particularly amongst Dilberry the Butler, and Miss Sprightly, the latter of whom writes to her cousin, Captain Carleton, to come down and perform the part of Captain Macheath in the Beggar’s Opera: this Lady having 30,000*l.* in her own power, he accepts the challenge, takes down his friend along with him, and persuades Sir Gilbert (who is at first averse to the foolery, as he calls it) to give his permission; but instead of performing Macheath, he performs the real lover, marries the Lady privately, and after some humorous incidents, which retard the catastrophe, the uncle gives his consent, and the Opera, with cludes, so far like the World’s a Stage. a dance called, All the World’s a Stage.

Mr. Jackman wrote The Milefan, is the Author of this Piece. Mr. Garrick’s Prologue, ridiculing the present taste for spang, &c. is in his usual style of Satire, and was archly spoken by Mr. King.

Masquerade Intelligence.

The Festino rooms on Friday night, the 11th ult. were resorted to by about 200 masks, the chief of whom wore fable dominos. The only characters that distinguished themselves were a German Limner, a Tallow candler, a Pille-de-Joye in dishabille, a Devil, and a Fryar; the first of whom said an infinite deal of nothing; the second talked less, but said more; the third shewed her profession by her brazen deportment; the fourth looked horribly, but was infernally dull; and the fifth, like a true Jesuit, appeared to have more sense than all the rest put together.—Besides these, these, there were the dumb Representatives of two Oxford Scholars, a Blue-coat Boy, a Sailor, a House-maid, and a Match-woman. The latter expressed their mirth in dancing, and therefore may properly be said to have shewn some little sensibility.— There were many of the nobility and persons of rank.

Little Theatre, Hay-market.

The Ridotto, at this Theatre, on Monday evening the 14th inst. served at once to display the taste of the Director of the evening's entertainment, and the insufferable dulness of the Polite World, when unmixed with souls of less refined composition. Nothing could be more splendid than the disposition of the lights, and the stile of the Theatre, which was wonderfully converted into a large, elegant, and commodious room, capable of receiving at least four times the quantity of persons present, whose gross number could not have exceeded two hundred, or two hundred and fifty. It was at the same time hardly possible for the insipidity and want of cordiality observable in the company to have been exceeded. The only way of accounting for this latter circumstance, is the recollection, that they were mostly persons of title and ton, there being only half a dozen ladies of known cracked characters, and very few of the bourgeois discoverable.

Confectionary, wines, and music, were provided. The first was good, the second but very la, la! and the third not only scanty, but most careless and indifferent.

THOUGH I staid in this city, longer than I could have wished, I was extremely well entertained with the sight of a Regatta, which is a sort of rowing match, with boats of different kinds, not performed in any other part of the world, and very seldom here, on account, I suppose, of the vast expence to which it subjects the young noblesse. This diversion seems to have taken its rise from a custom introduced by the doge Pietro Landi, in the year 1539. The States were always under the necessity of having a great many gallees at sea, and they were often in want of rowers: to remedy this inconvenience, the senate ordered four hundred of the lower, but robust, citizens to be enrolled; these were obliged, four times a year, to man a number of gallees, and were taught to manage their oars in a particular manner, which was called Regattere: a certain allowance being annually paid to them for this service, they became expert in rowing, valued themselves upon their skill and dexterity, practised often, and the State never wanted a proper supply of hands for their navy, this proving an admirable nursery for those times. It was my good fortune to see four of these regattas: the first consisting of nine skiffs, with one man and one oar in each; the second of eight skiffs, manned in the same manner; the third of nine gondolas, with two men, and two oars in each; and the fourth like the third.

There is no difference between the gondola, and what I call the skiff, but the size. Particular dimensions are assigned for each, and followed with the most scrupulous exactness; which dimensions, before they start, are examined as nicely as the weight of our riders at Newmarket. The stern, stem, and waist, are bound as it were together, by a double rope twisted, and the sides are furnished with cross beams.

I went with Messieurs Guyon and Jami-neau, in their gondola, to the Motta del sancto Antonio, where I saw them first measured, draw lots for their places, and start. A rope was stretched across that end of the Canal Grande, to which, at proper distances, nine small cords (each about ten feet long) were made fast: the rowers, who stand in the stern, were ranged along it, each having the end of the small cord under his foot, which he slips upon the firing of a pistol, and gives the first stroke. They were very soon out of our sight, though we followed as fast as we could, and reached the turning-post time enough to see it turned by the rowers of the second race, for there was an interval of an hour between the beginning of every regatta. The turning they performed with inconceivable dexterity, for they have no rudder, or any thing to help them in their course, but the expert management of the oar; yet they turned as close, and lost as little way, as any race-horse I ever saw. Then we went, upon Sir William Smart's obliging invitation, to a window hard by the Palazzo Foscari, where a triumphal arch was erected, and the flags of victory delivered to the conquerors; they are marked with gilt letters, first, second, third, and fourth, on which last is also painted a pig; and over and above the money, those rowers who obtain the fourth prize of every regatta, receive likewise a live pig, whence the name of Porcello generally sticks to them ever after. The course from Santo Antonio to La Croce, and back to the Palazzo Foscari, is about five English miles; and this, I am told, the single oars rowed rowed in about fifty minutes, and the last of the two years performed it in forty-five minutes, by my watch; so that their velocity is almost incredible.

The Canale Grande, including the windings, extends to about five miles in length; the houses on each side are almost all palaces; every story, or floor, is furnished with a balcony; all these together, with the windows, were hung with tapestry or velvet, and so crowded with people, that every other part of the city was left in a manner quite desolate.

So here earth and sea seemed to vie with each other in exhibiting the most numerous and the most beautiful appearance. I own, a great many people differed from me in opinion, and gave it in favour of the watry element, on account of the glaring figure made by the barges belonging to the gay young noblemen: they were covered from stem to stern with silks of different colours, laced with gold, or silver, or both: the liveries of their boatmen were of the same stuff, and these coverings being scalloped, fringed, and tasseled, hung over the sides. A few gondolas were rowed by four, some by six, but the greatest number by eight oars, which were gilt or silvered; on the stems and sterns were erected large plumes, painted like the liveries, which were of such colours as were most agreeable to the respective mistresses of the young gentlemen: while others had nothing but tinsel made up in the form of plumes, which had a very pretty dazzling effect when the sun shone upon them. One boat of eight oars decked in this manner, with liveries of green and gold interwoven, charmed the eyes of every body, and mine amongst the rest; but I never could obtain a second sight of it. Upon enquiry, I found it belonged to signor Morosini, who changes his whole equipage every Regatta; a very simple piece of extravagance, as all these fineries are the perquisites of the boatmen for the labour of the day: and I am well assured that the foppery on this occasion will cost those youngsters from five hundred to two thousand zequins; that is, from about two hundred and fifty pounds to one thousand pounds. The young fellows lie in the bows of the barges, being provided with cross bows, and gilt baskets full of earthen balls, which they shoot at those who, continuing too long in the open passage, may hinder or obstruct the prize-rowers. These balls were formerly of lead, and did abundance of mischief, so that they were forbid; but even those of clay, which are now in use, will knock a rower down. According to the best information I could obtain, there were about twenty thousand barges and yachts of different kinds upon the water, a great number of which were most magnificently adorned. Notwithstanding all this pomp of pageantry, I preferred the land shew, which comprehended all the beauties of the fair sex.

The Speech of Mr. Wilkes in the House of Commons, on the Motion of Lord North to refer to the Consideration of the Committee of Supply his Majesty's Message respecting the Civil List.

Mr. Speaker,

THERE is not a gentleman in this House, or in the kingdom, more anxious than I am to see the splendor and dignity of the crown of England maintained in its truest lustre, although for above a course of fifteen years I have received from the crown only a succession of injuries, and never in any moment of my life the slightest favour. I had the honour, sir, of a seat in this House, when the affair of the civil list was first agitated in parliament, in the beginning of his present Majesty's reign, when every good subject hoped to have more than the idea of a Patriot King. I then heartily acquiesced in the proposed grant. The acceptance of an annuity of 800,000*l.* and the giving up to the public the ancient, hereditary revenues of the crown, originated from the throne, and was proposed to this House in the usual mode by Mr. Legge, then chancellor of the exchequer. Parliament adopted the proposition, and it was accepted with gratitude by the King. The Ministers of that time declared to this house the King's entire satisfaction, and that his Majesty should be happy to be delivered from the disagreeable necessity of ever applying to parliament, like his predecessors, to make good the deficiencies of the civil list. It was admitted that the allowance was competent, ample, most fully adequate to the wants, and even to the splendor of the crown. Parliament granted all the Sovereign asked, and made the grant in the very mode proposed by the Minister. The civil list act expressly declares in the preamble, that 800,000*l.* was "a certain and competent revenue for defraying the expences of his Majesty's civil government, and supporting the dignity of the crown of Great Britain. The nation thought themselves assured of not paying more than 800,000*l.* per annum to the civil list, and gave that sum cheerfully for the trappings of loyalty. In the speech at the close of that session our gracious young monarch told us from the throne, that he could not sufficiently thank us, and that he thought himself much obliged to us for what more immediately concerned himself. By this bargain, sir, with the public it was generally understood, and indeed admitted at that time, that his Majesty would be a gainer of near 7000*l.* per annum. The noble Lord with the blue ribbon has unfairly drawn his calculations from only the last eight years of the late King's reign. He ought to have taken the whole of that reign together. In some years the civil list was very deficient; in others it greatly exceeded the sum of 800,000*l.* As this is peculiarly a day of dry calculation, I will observe that from the accounts delivered into parliament, it appeared that in the 33 years of George the Second's reign, from Midsummer 1727 to Midsummer 1760, the civil list produced only 26,182,981*l.* whereas 800,000*l.* for 33 years amount to 26,400,000*l.* so that there is a deficiency of 217,018*l.* The gain therefore on a nett revenue of 800,000*l.* is on an average above 6576*l.* a year. The sum of 800,000*l.* was at that time thought abundantly sufficient to support the splendor of the crown, and the Majesty of this great people. His Majesty has received beside 172,605*l.* the arrears of the late King's civil list, 100,000*l.* on account of Somerset House, and an additional grant of 513,511*l.* in the year 1769 to discharge all incumbrances. The death of the Princess Dowager of Wales was a saving of 60,000*l.* a year, and of the Duke of York 12,000*l.* a year. Yet, sir, we are now told of another debt of 618,340*l.* and called upon to pay that likewise, notwithstanding the former bargain with the public. The very proposal implies another violation of public faith. Sir, I will venture to say, if we are indeed just trustees for the people, if we conscientiously reflect that their wealth is intrusted to our care, that we are the guardians of the public purse, we ought to stop this growing evil, and to reprobate the idea of suffering their money to be thus squandered, as well as the country drained by a variety of taxes to supply a profusion, which arises from a violation of a solemn compact with the nation, and renders the limitation of the expences of the crown by parliament the most vague and absurd of all propositions. The power of controul of the expences of the crown is the very being and life of parliament. Are the accounts on our table proofs of our boasted œconomy? and is meanness thus nearly allied to prodigality?

There is at present, sir, a peculiar cruelty in thus endeavouring to fleece the people, when we are involved in a most expensive, as well as unnatural, and ruinous, civil war, and burdened with an enormous load of national debt, the interest of which we are scarcely able to stand under. Is there no feeling for the sufferer; or of this impoverished country? Are the people really nothing in the scale of government? The principal of the national debt is stated to us at Midsummer 1775, to amount to the astonishing sum of 135,943,051*l.* and the interest to 4,440,821*l.* Is this the time, sir, that a Minister can with an unembarrassed countenance come to parliament to lay additional loads on an exhausted nation, and to ask more of the people's money? When the greatest sources of our commerce and wealth are destroyed by his folly and wickedness, when we have already spent in this unjust war above nineteen millions, when above half our empire is lost, and those American friends, who have assisted us so frequently and so powerfully, are forced by our injustice to become determined enemies, and for their own safety to endeavour our humiliation? Are we at such a moment as this to talk of the greatness of the crown, shorn of half its beams, when we have lost more than we have retained of this divided empire, when new taxes, and additional burdens on the people, are the sole objects of government? Is the civil list to encrease in proportion to the loss of all those resources of trade and riches, by which it is fed and flourished? Is the nature of the civil list in the body politic analogous to what Lord Bacon says of the Spleen, that it increases in proportion to the waste, decay, and rapid consumption of the other parts of the human body?

Sir, we ought to look back to what former Princes and parliaments have done. I will take the consideration only from the glorious Æra of the revolution, and I will state it fairly and fully. The civil list was not granted to King William for life till the year 1698, when 700,000*l.* a year was settled on him. The distractions of his government, and of all Europe at that period, are well known. His most generous views for the public were thwarted at home during the greater part of his reign by the Tories, as the friends of liberty are now harrassed by them in America, according to the spirited letters of General Washington to the Congress. Queen Anne had the same revenue settled upon her. She gave yearly 100,000*l.* towards carrying on the war, against France, besides 200,000*l.* at least towards the building of Blenheim-house, and above 100,000*l.* for the support of the poor Palatines. We have a resolution of this House, sir, on a report from a Committee which states this very fully. It is in the journals of May 13, 1715, and in the following words, "Resolved, the sum of 700,000*l.* per annum was settled upon his late Majesty King William during his life, for the support of his Majesty's household, and other his necessary occasions; and, at the time of his Majesty's demise, after the reduction of 3,700*l.* a week, that was applied to the public uses, was the produce of the civil list revenues, that were continued and settled upon her late Majesty Queen Anne, during her life." The deduction for public services of 3,700*l.* a week, or 192,400*l.* a year, from that part of the civil list revenue called the hereditary and temporary excise was first made in the last year of King William. Notwithstanding this deduction the civil list funds produced in that very year 709,420*l.* In the first of Q. Anne the same funds with the same deductions were settled on her for her life, and declared to be for raising 700,000*l.* a year for the support of her household, and the dignity of her government. In the 9th of her reign the old post office act was repealed, and a new general post-office with higher rates was established, in consideration of which another deduction was made from the civil list revenue of 700*l.* a week, or 36,500*l.* a year. Both these deductions have ever since been continued.

George I. had the same revenue settled upon him as Queen Anne, but if 300,000*l.* paid him by the Royal Exchange and London Assurance Companies, and a million granted in 1726 towards paying his debts, are included, his income will appear to have been nearly 800,000*l.* per annum. In the first speech to his parliament he took notice, "that it was his happiness to see a Prince of Wales, who may, in due time, succeed to the throne, and to see him blessed with many children." Yet the establishment of the civil list at the beginning of that reign was only settled at 700,000*l.* a year. It was not till after the great expences consequent on the rebellion of the Earl of Mar, and the other perjured Scots, who, although they had taken the oaths to his government, traiterously waged open and impious war against a mild and just Sovereign, that the parliament paid that King's debts. In the reign of George I. the Prince of Wales had an establishment of 100,000*l.* per annum.

George II. had a very numerous family, and 800,000*l.* were at first settled upon him with whatever surplus might arise from the duties and allowances composing the civil list revenues. In 1736 that part of the hereditary and temporary excise, which consisted of duties on spirituous liquors, was taken from the civil list, in consideration of which 70,000*l.* were transferred to it from the aggregate fund. The income of George II. including 115,000*l.* granted in 1729, and 456,733*l.* in 1747, towards making good the deficiencies, which had arisen in the civil list duties, was 810,749*l.* per annum for 33 years. His late Majesty likewise had in his reign a Scottish rebellion, carried on by many of the same traitors, who had been pardoned by his father. The expence of that rebellion to the King and kingdom was enormous, for it was not confined to the extremities of the island, but raged in the heart of the kingdom, and the rebels advanced to within a hundred miles of the capital. Such an event, sir, not unforeseen, because foretold, was a just ground for the parliament's discharging a debt contracted by the securing to us every thing dear to men and Englishmen.

The establishment of the present King, at the yearly rent charge to the nation of 800,000*l.* was a measure at the time equally pleasing both to the prince and the people. The minister boasted that there was not a possibility of any future dispute about the hereditary revenues, or concerning accounts suspected to be false, wilfully erroneous, or deceitful, kept back, or anticipated, to serve a particular purpose. I am aware, sir, that the civil list revenues have been increasing for many years. The mean annual produce for the last five years of George II. was 829,150*l.* and for the first six years of his present Majesty it would have been, had the establishment in the late reign continued 894,000*l.* In 1775 it would have been 1,019,450*l.* Near 90,000*l.* per annum of this great increase have been produced by an increase in the post office revenue, occasioned chiefly by the late alteration in the manner of franking, and by the falling of the cross posts to the public by the death of Mr. Allen; but these profits would probably, at least certainly ought to have been reserved to the public, had the establishment in the late reign been continued. At the foot of one of the accounts on our table it is stated, "the amount of 800,000*l.* granted to his Majesty from the 25th of October 1760, to the 5th of January 1777, is 12,965,517*l.* 48*l.* 9d. three farthings. The produce as above exceeds the annuity by 2,581,241*l.* 9*l.* 1d. three farthings. But parliament granted to pay off the civil list debt, on the 5th of Jan. 1769, out of the supplies for the year 1769, 513,511*l.* which being deducted shews the gain to the public to be 1,867,730*l.* 9*l.* 1d. three farthings." The bargain concluded for the public was of an annuity to the King of a clear 800,000*l.* subject to no deductions or contingencies, for his life, on a solemn promise of that being made to bear all the expences of the civil list, and the royal household. It was a fair compact.

of finance between the King and the subject, ratified by both parties. The most explicit assurances were given by the chancellor of the exchequer, in the King's name, that no more should be asked, and that now his Majesty could never be under the disagreeable necessity of importuning this House with messages of personal concern.

I have, sir, carefully examined the accounts laid before this House, by his Majesty's command, the eight folio books and the other papers, and I will venture to say they are as loose, unsatisfactory, perplexed and unintelligible as those delivered in by the noble Lord with the blue ribband in 1770, a year after the former demand to pay the debts on the civil list, and more loose, unsatisfactory, perplexed and unintelligible no accounts can be. Their defectiveness and fallacy is highly culpable. The coming to parliament with such a demand, but without any account whatever, was an insult to this House, and the laying before us such accounts as those on the table is a solemn mockery. Many gentlemen in the House declared the last week their opinion, that, after the strictest examination, they could make nothing of those former accounts. It was not intended they should. One particular only fixed my attention as an individual. Under the head of secret and special service, I find that between October 1762, and October 1763, a most memorable year, there was issued to Samuel Martin, Esq; 41,000*l.* We have indeed, sir, had a week allowed to go through these accounts, but I will venture to affirm that a year would not be sufficient to clear them from their studied perplexity, to give order and light to such a chaos. The most able accountants do not pretend to understand them. They would puzzle a Demoivre. Ægyptian darkness hangs over the whole. There is not one friendly ray of light to lead us through this labyrinth.

No account, sir, whatever is given parliament of the other considerable revenues of the crown, besides the annuity of 800,000*l.* I do not mean the income of the electorate of Hanover, or Bishoprick of Osnaburg, but what his Majesty enjoys as King of England. That is a fair consideration with us, when the House are providing for the support of the lustre of the crown, which I hear is at present a little tarnished. The extraordinary revenues of the crown are, the revenue of Ireland, the Duchy of Cornwall, the land revenue within the principality of Wales, the revenue of Gibraltar, American quit rents, now generally lost, irredeemably lost, the plantation duties of 4*l.* one half per cent. from the Leeward Islands, fines, forfeitures, and many other particulars, which certainly carry the royal income to much above one million a year. We may form some guesses from the grants we find made. From the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall it appears that 17,000*l.* issued to Mr. Bradshaw in one year, and 11,000*l.* in another. From the 4*l.* one half per cent. in 1769, for his Majesty's special service, 14,724*l.* to Sir Grey Cooper. In 1771 John Robinson, Esq; received 10,000*l.* of the Virginia quit rents, the last payment I believe of that nature. Sir Grey Cooper in 1769 received 2144*l.* from the revenue of Gibraltar, and in 1765, 13,804*l.* were issued thence for special service. Such copious streams must flow from rich and abundant fountains. The plantation duties of 4*l.* one half per cent. produced in 1753 27,377*l.* Fines and forfeitures are a very considerable addition to the royal revenue. I was plundered in one year of 1000*l.* in two fines, one 500*l.* for a pretended libel, and another of the same sum, because I had a laughable poem locked up in my bureau, which administration hired a rascal of a servant to steal, and then contrived to have published.

The business of this day, sir, is naturally branched out into two parts, which claim our attention. His Majesty's message points out both of them to us. The first is the out-standing debts, the second the increase of the establishment of the civil list.

Before we proceed, sir, to take into consideration the payment of the King's debts, we ought to know in what manner they have been contracted. The King has enjoyed the greatest unappropriated revenue of any Prince in Europe, and the expences of the whole royal family have never exceeded 160,000*l.* a year. A committee should be appointed for both the purposes mentioned, and papers very different from those before us, ought to be submitted to parliament. It is impossible for us now even to guess from these accounts in what way so enormous a debt as 618,340*l.* has been contracted, and that there should remain in cash in the exchequer on the 5th of January last, only 35,640*l.* The Queen has indeed 50,000*l.* a year regularly paid; but the expence of the Prince of Wales and Bishop of Osnaburg, is charged from 1769 to 1777, only 42,242*l.* Prince William Henry and Prince Edward, for the same period, 5017*l.* The King's message, sir, leads us to consider the state of the royal family. His Majesty has two brothers, universally beloved by the nation. I find no trace of any debts contracted by the crown on their account; no princely grants to either of the King's own brothers. As an Englishman, I regret the scantiness of their incomes. The Duke of Gloucester seems doomed to pass his life abroad; and it is certainly neither from choice, nor from the ill state of his health. The Duke of Cumberland is happier, and lives in England. He possesses all the virtues, and supports with dignity the rank, of a private, benevolent, amiable nobleman. His income is by no means adequate to the splendor of a Prince of the blood, of a Prince of the blood so near to the King as his Majesty's own brother. How then, sir, has this enormous debt been contracted? No outward magnificence has dazzled our eyes; no internal, domestic profusion has been imputed to the Lord Steward of the household, who almost alone has continued in office this whole reign. We have scarcely the appearance of a court, even in the capital. Former Kings, with very inferior revenues, were generous and splendid, their courts pompous and brilliant. His Majesty's residence at Windsor the last summer did not quite revive all the ideas of the magnificence, and even hospitality of the Plantagenets; nor fully the glories of our Henries and Edwards. No stately buildings, or proud palaces, no imperial works, and worthy Kings, have excited our wonder, or called foreigners from the continent to our island to admire our taste and magnificence. An honourable gentleman, sir, tells us of the King's houses. The former Kings of England, sir, lived in palaces, not in houses. His Majesty has not yet had a Scottish rebellion to quell. The royal revenues have not been expended against the Scots, but surrendered up to them, an idea little suspected by the people of England, when they gave at first with such a liberal, and even prodigal hand. How then, sir, has this debt been contracted? There are no outward and visible signs of grandeur and expence. I will tell the House what is said without doors, what the nation generally suspects, and therefore it becomes our duty to investigate. The nation, sir, suspects that the majorities in parliament are bought by these very grants; that in one instance we attend to the evangelical precept, give, and it shall be given unto you, and that the crown has made purchase of this House with the money of the people. Hence the ready, tame, and servile compliance to every royal edict issued by the Minister. Inward corruption is the canker, which gnaws the vitals of parliament. It is almost universally believed, sir, that the debt has been contracted in corrupting the representatives of the people, and that this public plunder has been divided among the majority of this House, which is allowed to be the most corrupt assembly in Europe, while the honest and fair creditors of the crown have been reduced to the greatest distress. Compassion for them is only made the pretext of the present message. This, sir, is a fit object of parliamentary enquiry.

The alarm has spread though the country. The charge is taken up by almost every independent man in the kingdom. It is asked, did the last parliamentary grant of 513,511*l.* so lately as 1769, to pay the King's debts, give satisfaction to the honest tradesmen and inferior dependents of the crown, or was it diverted another way? The majority of this House, sir, ought not to lie under this suspicion, nor will they, if they are innocent. They ought likewise to vindicate the honour of our Sovereign from the foul suspicions, which are gone abroad. A heavier accusation can scarcely be brought. Mr. Locke, sir, in the chapter "on the dissolution of Government," says, "he [the supreme executor] acts contrary to his trust, when he either employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society, to corrupt the representatives, and gain to his purposes, or openly pre-engages the electors, and prescribes to their choice, such, whom he has by solicitations, threats, promises, or otherwise won to his designs; and employs them to bring in such, who have promised before-hand what to vote, and what to enact." What, sir, was the case of Hine's Patent Place in the collection of the customs at Exeter, publicly sold, and the money given, not to a needy public, but to General Burgoyne, to reimburse him the expences of the Preston election, and the subsequent prosecution and fine of 100*l.* by a court of law, for the outrages committed in Lancashire against the sacred rights of election? That instance alone merited an impeachment from parliament against the profligate minister of that day.

If there is, sir, a spark of virtue left among us, we cannot sit down contented with such loose general accounts, that secret and special service, the privy purse, treasurer of the chamber, the cofferer of the household, royal bounties, pensions and annuities, should swallow up almost the whole civil list. There is a general charge of pensions to the amount of above 438,000*l.* The pension list is the great grievance. From 1769 to 1777, there is a single line of 171,000*l.* secret and special service issued to Sir Grey Cooper. In the same period, under the same article, 114,000*l.* to John Robinson, Esq; exclusive of enormous sums on the same heads to the Secretaries of State, and the Secretary of the Post Office, generally in one short, single line. When we know, sir, what prosecutions have been carried on, an article of 60,000*l.* in one year, as law charges, ought to alarm us no less for the liberty of the press than the private property of individuals by unfounded claims of the crown. Under the head of Contingencies of divers Natures, we are lost and bewildered in a rambling account, of which it is impossible to guess the least particular. We find Messieurs Amyand and Siebel receive 38,692*l.* to pay bills of Exchange; and in another line, Thomas Pratt, Esq, 8,139*l.* to pay another bill of Exchange. For what purpose? Such accounts, sir, are only calculated for such a servile parliament. Pensions, annuities, and royal bounties, shall with much caution be touched by me, even in this House. One word only of literary patronage, as it seems to be a favourite subject. We are, sir, hourly told, that genius and learning are now fostered by the propitious beams of royal favour, and the polite arts encouraged and patronized. I shall just mention a specimen of the choice made of literary pensioners, with a slight animadversion on the apparent absurdity of four literary pensions. The two famous doctors, Shebbeare and Johnson, are pensioners. The piety of our Sovereign to the memory of his grandfather, as well as gratitude to that of our glorious deliverer, should surely, sir, have prevented the names of these two Doctors from disgracing a civil list, which both of them had repeatedly and publicly declared the King's family had no right to, but they considered, as a flagrant usurpation. These two Doctors have in their writings treated the late King, and King William, with the utmost virulence and scurrility, and they are the known pensioned advocates of despotism. The two other instances are ridiculous enough. David Hume was pensioned in this pious reign for attacking the Christian religion, and Dr. Beattie for answering him. In this manner is the public treasure lavished; but these, I own, are mean objects, and of trifling concern. The great mass of the debt remains unaccounted for, and is suspected to be contracted for the most criminal purposes. It is necessary to satisfy the people that the enquiry should be made, and therefore I hope the House will instruct the Committee to that purpose.

Let me now, sir, suppose, that parliament acquiesces with the present claim, what chearful ray of future hope have we to comfort us that future demands will not succeed? Will this be the last court job, even of the present Minister? No assurances whatever are given, not a hint of oeconomy, or frugal management, or the least care of the public treasure in future. Surely such a mode of proceeding is highly unbecoming, indecent, and contemptuous. May I, sir, pass the invidious streights of Calais, and consider the state of the neighbouring monarchy with respect to the King's household and debts? By two new edicts for the regulation of the King's household expences, of pensions, and royal bounties, all arrears are to be discharged within six years, and a fixed resolution is declared pour concilier avec une sage economie les depenses que l'eclat de sa couronne peut exiger. From the first of last January all future expences whatever respecting the household are to be paid in the course of the current year. The very first article is, "l'annee revolvee de toutes les depenses de la maison du Roi, tant par entreprises que par fournitures, sera a l'avenir paiee comptant au Tresor Roial, dans le courant de l'annee suivante, a raison d'un deuxieme par mois." Would to God, sir, such a spirit of justice and reformation crossed the channel to this capital! We alas! have not a gleam of hope of any reformation. The French King, sir, has likewise two brothers, Monsieur, and the Comte d'Artois. They have found in their Sovereign an affectionate and generous brother, not a gloomy tyrant, like — Louis the XIth. They are an united and happy family. What the King has given them in important grants, and en apanage, as it is called, enables them to support with eclat their high rank. The new regulations of the French King's household expences and debts are founded in justice, and are no extraordinary burden on the people. The first Prince of the Hanover line observed the same conduct, for the message of Geo. I. to this house of July 11, 1721, is that, "being resolved to cause a retrenchment to be made of his civil list expences for the future, and finding that such a retrenchment cannot well be effected, without discharging the present arrears, his Majesty has ordered the accounts to be laid before the House, and hopes he may be empowered to raise money for that purpose, on the civil list revenues; which, to avoid the laying any new burden on his people, his Majesty purposes shall be replaced to the civil list, and reimbursed, by a deduction to be made out of the salaries and wages of all offices, and the pensions, and other payments, from the crown." The prostitute Parliament of 1769 gave the money out of the current expences of the year, without a line of any account.

When

When we are repeatedly told, Sir, of the present splendor of the British diadem, of the extent of our empire, and the greatness of the sovereign, I own the diminished rays of the crown occur to my painful imagination. It brings to my recollection what was said of Philip the fourth of Spain, when Louis XIV. was taking all the towns, one after another, in the Netherlands, Sa grandeur est comme celle des fosses, a proportion des terres, qu'on leur cte.

The noble Lord near me, [Lord John Cavendish] has said, that he wished a strict review of the whole establishment of the crown as to the civil list. I perfectly approve the idea. Almost the whole requires a new regulation. I think the Judges in particular ought not to be paid out of the civil list, but by the public. They cannot be now displaced, but they may be starved by the crown. The spirit of their independence ought to extend as well to their salaries, as to their commissions. I observe, Sir, in the civil list accounts on the table, an article, "Lord" and Sir William Howe, commissioners "for restoring peace in America, 100l. per week each, arrears 1742l." The noble Lord with the blue ribband has just called them ambassadors. Have we then already acknowledged the United Colonies of America as a sovereign state, like the United Provinces of Holland? If we have not, the event must happen. The peaceful mode adopted by the two brothers, according to my calculation, will not soon restore peace in America, but it will possibly be the period of the Trojan war, ten years at least, so that we may compliment the Howe family with above 100,000l. free gift, at the rate of 100l. per week each brother, besides settled pay as officers. But, Sir, what connection has such an article as this with the civil list, with his Majesty's household?

Let us not now, sir, rashly proceed in the iniquitous method, of deciding on these two important questions, the expenditure, and the increase of the civil list, without hearing the evidence, or hearing it only in part. We have not sufficient data to proceed. By such injustice we lost America. We proscribed the inhabitants of Boston without hearing them, and in the same manner adopted coercive and sanguinary measures against the other colonies. Let us not now advance a single step but with caution, with fear, and trembling. We are asked to furnish the ministers with weapons, which may be employed to our own destruction, against the liberties of our country. An increased undue influence must necessarily be created, and the overgrown power of the crown enlarged.

They only want what are called the sinews of war. The doctrine is now avowed of the legality of introducing foreign troops into the British dominions. The minister has the power of the purse, and therefore of the sword. How many nations have totally lost their liberties by internal corruption, and by mercenary armies? There is an affected false alarm about faction and civil discord, but it is well known that civil dissensions have often been even favourable to freedom. Montesquieu observes of England, On voit la Libertie sortir sans cesse des feux de la Discorde de la Sedition, le Prince toujours chancelant sur un trone inbranlable.

I desire, Sir, to submit to the noble Lord near me [Lord John Cavendish] whether, in point of form and precedent, instead of discharging the order for referring the King's message to the committee of supply, which his Lordship has moved, it would not be more proper to instruct the committee on the two important points of the message, the paying his Majesty's debts, and the addition to the standing revenue of the crown. If his Lordship and the House adopt that mode, I shall then move, "that it be an instruction to the said committee, that, before they proceed to consider of his Majesty's most gracious message, they do consider of the causes of the debts due on account of the civil list, and likewise what further provision may be necessary to support the splendor and dignity of the crown of Great Britain."

The Teacher's Birth Day, a solemn CANTANA.

By a Clergyman of Philadelphia.

R E C I T A T I V E.

CLEAR was the sky, and deep the new fall's snow,

The keen North wind blew swiftly o'er the plain;

Old Del'ware's gentle current ceas'd to flow,

Fast bound in rigid winter's icy chain.

Nor yet the shady curtains of the night

Were open'd on Aurora's blushing face,

The stars all twinkled—and, serenely bright,

The moon mov'd on with mild majestic grace.

Whilst, stretch'd at ease upon a downy bed,

A rev'rend priest his slumbers did prolong,

Old Time with nimble footsteps thither sped,

And thus address'd his monitory song:

A I R.

I.

Rise, teacher, rise,

Lift up thine eyes,

Awake thy drowsy heart;

Attend, attend,

To thee, my friend,

A lesson I'll impart.

II.

'Tis gone ! another fleeting year
Of thy frail life is flown ;
Of all its deeds may none appear
But such as Heav'n will own.

III.

Rise, teacher, rise,
Lift up thine eyes,
And life's swift progress trace ;
How oft the sun
Round thee hath run
His annual rapid race.

IV.

Behold, behold, with twelve times three,
I come to mark thy natal morn ;
The years that still remain to thee
Let virtue's fairest fruits adorn.

V.

With solemn knell,
The passing bell
Hath oft alarm'd thy breast ;
The warning's giv'n,
Prepare for Heav'n,
Be virtuous, and be blest.

RECITATIVE.

The teacher wakes—half rais'd he looks around,
The lamp burn'd dim, 'twas silence most profound ;

Again, with head reclin'd, his eyes he clos'd,
Whilst slumbers sweet his drowsy frame compos'd.

When lo ! descending from the realms of day,
Enrob'd in light, religion wing'd her way ;
With aspect mild and soft persuasive tongue,
The Heav'n-born maid approached and sweetly sung.

A I R.

Cease to slumber, child of earth,
Wake, thou offspring of the skies ;
Know'st thou not thy two fold birth,
Son of Christ, of Adam, rise.

II.

Rise from doubt and darkness free,
Let not sloth thy pow'rs restrain ;
Heav'n and Earth contend for thee,
Grace and sin the war maintain.

III.

Would'st thou glory's garland win ?
Would'st thou end the painful strife ?
Feed the child of God within,
Feed thy flock with bread of life.

IV.

Let thy bright example prove,
Every truth thy lips proclaim ;
By the living law of love,
All thy thoughts and actions frame.

V.

Thus shall ev'ry birth day yield
Joys which earth can ne'er bestow
Joys by Heaven alone reveal'd,
In the breasts of saints below.

RECITATIVE.

Again he wakes, but wakes not as before,
Sleep's balmy charm can seal his lids no more ;
His heart expands with joy, serene he springs,
And thus on bended knees his mattin sings :

A I R.

God of life ! and God of love !
Aid me with thy pow'r divine,
Send thy spirit from above,
Save, an helpless child of thine ;

From Nature's gloom to thee he cries,
From Nature's gloom, O bid him rise !

II.

Jesu ! name for ever dear !
Prosper every pray'er I make !
God of mercy, lend thine ear,
Answer all for Jesu's sake.

Father, Son, and Spirit blest,
Thy triune Godhead I address.

III.

Thanks to thee for mercies past,
Thanks unfeign'd thy vot'ry pays ;
Let those mercies ever last,
Let them crown my future days !

Be every thought to thee inclin'd,
Be every wish to thee resign'd !

IV.

Give me comfort in distress,
Give me patience under pain ;
Give me strength when dangers press,
Human virtues are but vain.
Of all the gifts thou hast in store,
Give me THYSELF—I ask no more.

Verses on BANBRIDGE.

FOR themes less worthy, whilst my lyre is strung,
Shalt thou, fair village, still remain unsung ?
Because proud pomp, sorbooth, despises thee,
Must thou be therefore too despis'd by me ?
No ; dumb be my ungrateful Muse, that day,
When I despise thee, or deny the lay.

What, tho' no Lord thee condescends to grace,
With the distinction of his—dwelling place ?
'Tis not the lordly residence can boast
The bliss of social happiness the most.
Near the proud mansions of the haughty great,
Oft stern oppression reigns in guilty state ;
And like some despot, if her tyrant nod
Be disobey'd, corrects with iron rod :
Hence cringing fears and flatteries there prevail,
And mean self-interest sways the partial scale ;
Each neighbour jealous of his neighbour grows,
Discord abounds, and malice overflows.
Not so in thee, Banbridge, society !
Hath fix'd her smiling residence with thee ;
No envious jars thy neighbourhood annoy,
But all is friendship, harmony and joy.
Then rest content, nor e'er repine that fate
Hath not decreed thee for some great man's seat.

How oft rejoice'd thy sloping streets I walk,
And with thy friendly people cheerful talk ;
The various news the day affords repeat,
Or lend attention while they it relate.
How oft along thy beauteous river stray,
And contemplate the charms its banks display ;
Here art and nature both their pow'rs unite,
The heart to ravish, and the eye delight.
Thick interchanging views of white and green,
On every side contralt the splendid scene :
Here, o'er the mead, in dazzling prospect flow,
Bright bleaching webs that vie with driven snow ;
There lawns array'd in all the pride of spring,
A grateful change of alter'd colour bring.
Hibernia's boasted wealth and trade, appear
In sweet perspective, represented here.
Long may the lovely prospect bless our sight !
And Bann be fam'd for bleaching linen white !

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Containing the Lives of the most eminent Natives of Great-Britain and Ireland, in an alphabetical Series. With a succinct Account of their Writings. (Continued from our last, p. 284)

The Life of the Rev. Dr. Richard Busby.

BUSBY (Richard) the most eminent school-master of his time, was born at Lutton in Lincolnshire, the 22d of September, 1606. Having passed through the classes of Westminster-school, as a king's scholar, he was, in 1624, elected a student of Christ church. * He took the degree of bachelor of arts, October 21, 1628; and that of master, June 18, 1631. On the first of July, 1639, he was admitted to the prebend and rectory of Cudworth, in the church of Wells. December 13, 1640, he was appointed master of Westminster-school, and by his skill and diligence in the discharge of this most laborious and important office for the space of almost fifty-five years, bred up the greatest number of learned scholars that ever adorned at one time any age or nation. After the Restoration, king Charles II. conferred on him a prebend of Westminster, into which he was installed the 5th of July, 1660; and on the 11th of August following, he was made treasurer and canon residentiary of the church of Wells. On the 19th of October, 1660, he took the degree of doctor in divinity. After a long and healthy life, the consequence of his chastity, sobriety, and temperance, he died on the 6th of April, 1695, at the age of 89; and was interred in Westminster-abbey, where there is a monument erected to his memory. He gave 250l. towards repairing and beautifying Christ-church college and cathedral; and founded and endowed two lectures in the same college, one for the oriental languages, and another for the mathematics. He composed several grammatical treatises for the use of his school.

The Life of James Duke of Ormond.

Butler (James) duke of Ormond, one of the ablest statesmen and most accomplished courtiers of the age in which he flourished, was the son of Thomas Butler, Esq; and was born on the 19th of October 1610, in Newcastle-house, Clerkenwell, London. His grandfather, on the death of Thomas earl of Ormond, assuming that title, and his father being unfortunately drowned in Ireland, he obtained that title on the old earl's decease, in 1632. Being made lieutenant general of the forces in Ireland, he distinguished himself by his bravery against the rebels in that kingdom, over whom he gained some considerable victories, on which account he was created marquis of Ormond. Some time after, he was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; but Crom-

NOTE.

* At the university he was considered as a complete orator, and a very good actor, having performed with great applause a part in the Royal Slave, a play written by William Cartwright, which was represented before king Charles I. and his queen at Christ-church, by the students of that house, on the 30th of August, 1636.

well landing at Dublin with a strong body of forces, the marquis was under the necessity of retreating to France, where he was reduced to great difficulties, and might have fallen into still greater, if the French nobility had not shewn him many civilities, inviting him to their houses, and treating him with all possible kindness and respect. The marquis, after performing some services for king Charles II. abroad, with infinite hazard to himself, came to England, to obtain an exact account of the state of affairs in this kingdom, and returned safely, after running through almost incredible dangers. In short, he engaged in several schemes for his majesty's service, and had a great share in the transactions which immediately preceded the king's restoration; soon after which he was sworn of the privy council, made lord-steward of the household, lieutenant of Somersetshire, high steward of Westminster, Kingston, and Bristol; created baron of Lanthony, and earl of Brecknock. Before his majesty's coronation, he was raised to the dignity of duke of Ormond, and in 1662 was declared lord lieutenant of Ireland, when, by his vigilance, he disappointed Blood's plot of seizing both his person and the castle of Dublin; and was some years afterwards out of his coach in St. James's-street by the same villain, who, it is believed, intended to have hanged him at Tyburn, if he had not been happily rescued. His grace died on the 21st of July 1688, in the 78th year of his age. He was not only an excellent soldier, and an able statesman, but also a good, humane, and benevolent man.

The Life of the Earl of Offery.

Butler (Thomas) earl of Offery, son of the former, was born in the castle of Kilkenny, July 9, 1634. He distinguished himself by a noble bravery, united to the greatest gentleness and modesty, which very early excited the jealousy of Cromwell, who committed him to the Tower; where falling ill of a fever, after being confined near eight months, he was discharged. He afterwards went over to Flanders, and on the restoration attended the king to England; and from being appointed colonel of foot in Ireland, was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general of the army in that kingdom. On the 14th of September, 1666, he was summoned by writ to the English house of lords, by the title of lord Butler, of Moore-park. The same year, being at Euston in Suffolk, he happened to hear the firing of guns at sea, in the famous battle with the Dutch that began the 1st of June. He instantly prepared to go on board the fleet, where he arrived on the 3d of that month; and had the satisfaction of informing the duke of Albemarle, that prince Rupert was hastening to join him. He had his share in the glorious actions of that and the succeeding day. His reputation was much increased by his behaviour in the engagement off Southwold Bay. In 1673, he was successively made rear-admiral of the blue and the red squadrons; and on the 10th of September, the same year, was appointed admiral of the whole fleet, during the absence of prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the British troops in the service of the prince of Orange, and at the battle of Mons contributed greatly to the retreat of marshal Luxemburg, to whom Lewis XIV. was indebted for the greatest part of his military glory. The earl of Ossory, on this occasion, received the thanks of the duke of Villa-Hermosa, governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and also the thanks of his Catholic majesty himself. This noble lord, who was distinguished by his probity, capacity, and courage, died on the 30th of July, 1680, in the 46th year of his age. The duke of Ormond, his father, said, "that he would not exchange his dead son for any living son in Christendom.*"

The Life of Mr. Samuel Butler.

Butler (Samuel) a celebrated poet of the last century, was the son of a reputable farmer, and was born at Strensham, in Worcestershire, in the year 1612. As he discovered an early inclination to learning, his father placed him at the free-school of Worcester; and having passed thro' the several classes there, he was sent to Cambridge, but was never matriculated in that university. After having continued six or seven years at Cambridge, he returned to his native county, and became clerk to Mr. Jefferies of Earl's Croom, an eminent justice of the peace. From the service of this gentleman, he passed into that of Elizabeth, countess of Kent; in whose house he had not only the opportunity of consulting all kind of books, but also of conversing with the learned Mr. Selden. He afterwards lived with Sir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of an ancient family in Bedfordshire, and a famous commander under Oliver Cromwell; and it was during his residence in this family that he wrote his imimitable poem, called Hudibras, under which character, it is generally supposed, he intended to ridicule Sir Samuel. After the restoration of king Charles II. Mr. Butler was made secretary to Richard earl of Carbury, lord president of Wales, who appointed him steward of Ludlow-castle; and about this time he married one Mrs. Herbert, a gentlewoman of a very good family. Though it is said in his life, prefixed to some editions of his Hudibras, that he was neglected by Charles II. yet the learned and ingenious Dr. Zachary Pearce, late bishop of Rochester, was many years ago informed by a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, that Mr. Lowndes, then belonging to the treasury, and, in the reigns of king William and queen Anne, secretary of it, had declared, in his hearing, that by order of Charles, he had paid to Butler a yearly pension of 100l. to the time of his decease †. Our poet died on the 25th of September, 1680, and was interred, at the expence of a friend, in the church-yard of St. Paul's Covent-Garden: a monument was afterwards erected to his memory in Westminster-abbey; by Mr. alderman Barber. He was a very modest, worthy man, and did not shine in conversation till he had taken a cheerful glass, tho' he was not given to drinking. He saw but little company, except what he was in some measure forced into; his Hudibras having gained him such reputation, that most persons of dis-tion at that time were extremely desirous of his company; and yet not one of them contributed to the advancement of his fortune. He was not, like the generality of wits, profuse in his disposition; his circumstances indeed were always so narrow that he never had an opportunity of being so.

Mr. Granger observes, that "Butler stands without a rival in burlesque poetry. His Hudibras is, in its kind, almost as great an effort of genius as the Paradise Lost itself. It abounds with uncommon learning, new rhymes, and original thoughts. Its images are truly and naturally ridiculous: we are never shocked with excessive distortion or grimace; nor is human nature degraded to that of monkeys and yahoos. There are in it many strokes of temporary satire, and some characters and allusions which cannot be discovered at this distance of time."

The posthumous works of Butler were published in three vols. 12mo. but Mr. Charles Longueville, who had all his genuine remains, declared that many of the pieces in that collection were spurious.

The Life of Lord Viscount Torrington.

Byng (George) lord viscount Torrington, and rear-admiral of Great Britain, was born in the year 1663, and at the age of fifteen went a volunteer to sea, with the king's warrant. But in 1681 he quitted the sea service, upon the invitation of general Kirk, governor of Tangier, served as a cadet among the grenadiers of that garrison, and arrived to the rank of lieutenant. However, in 1684, after the demolition of Tangier, he was appointed lieutenant of the Orford, from which time he constantly kept to the sea service. The next year he went lieutenant of his majesty's ship the Phoenix, to the East Indies, where engaging and boarding a Ziganian pirate, who maintained a desperate fight, most of those who entered with him were slain, himself dangerously wounded, and the pirate sinking, he was taken out of the sea, with scarce any remains of life. In 1702 he was raised to the command of the Nassau, a third rate, and the next year was made rear-admiral of the red. In 1708 he was made admiral of the blue, in 1711 admiral of the white, and in 1715 was created a baronet. He performed the most important services, with the most remarkable courage, fidelity, and success. In the wars which raged so many years in the reigns of king William, queen Anne, and king George I. wars fruitful of naval combats and expeditions; there was scarce an action of any consequence in which he did not bear a principal part. In the reign of queen Anne he prevented an invasion in Scotland, and rescued Edinburgh from the threatened attack of a French squadron: in that of George I. when the discord of princes was on the point of embroiling Europe again in a war, he, with singular success, interpolated, and, with a British fleet, crushed, at one blow, the laboured efforts of Spain to set up a power at sea, advanced the reputation of our arms in the Mediterranean to such a pitch, that the British flag gave laws to the contending parties, and enabled us to settle the tranquillity that had been disturbed. For this latter important service, king George I.

wrote

and five comedies, viz. 1. The Country Captain: 2. The Exile: 3. The Humorous Lovers: 4. The Triumphant Widow: 5. The Variety.

This truly noble lord resigned his breath on the 25th of December, 1676, in the 84th year of his age; and was interred in Westminster-Abbey, under a most spacious and magnificent tomb, which a little before his death he had caused to be erected to the memory of his dukes. "He was a nobleman (says Dr. Smollett) of a most dignified character; a liberal and munificent patron of the ingenious arts, of unflinching loyalty, invincible courage, and extensive influence." His grace's titles descended to his son Henry, earl of Ogle, who dying without issue in 1691, the title of Newcastle in the line of Cavendish became extinct.

The Life of William Duke of Devonshire.

Cavendish (William) the first duke of Devonshire, one of the ablest statesmen and most distinguished patriots of his time, was born on the 25th of January, 1640. He was attended in his travels by Dr. Killigrew, afterwards master of the Savoy, who inspired him with a true relish for poetry, and all the refinements of sense and wit. On the 21st of September, 1663, he was created master of arts. In 1665 he went a volunteer, and exposed his person extremely in his attendance upon the duke of York, who that year commanded the British navy. In the spring of the year 1669, he accompanied his intimate friend Mr. Montague in his embassy to France; and being accidentally at the opera at Paris, met with an adventure, which, though it endangered his life, gained him a very high reputation. He was standing upon the stage, when three officers of the king's guard came also up. They were intoxicated with liquor, and one of them walking up to him with a very insulting question, his lordship gave him a blow on the face, upon which they all drew, and pushed at him with great fury: setting his back against one of the scenes, he made a stout defence, receiving several wounds, till a sturdy Swiss, belonging to the lord ambassador Montague, caught him up in his arms, and threw him over the stage into the pit. In his fall his arm caught upon an iron spike, and was grievously torn. The three officers were by the king's order sent to prison, where they remained, till by his lordship's intercession they were discharged. He afterwards served as member for the county of Derby in several parliaments. In 1679 he was chosen one of the king's new privy-council; but finding his attendance ineffectual, he with several others desired leave to withdraw, which was granted them. He vigorously promoted the bill of exclusion, and carried up to the lords an impeachment against the lord chief justice Scroggs, for his arbitrary and illegal proceedings in the court of King's Bench. At the lord Ruffel's trial he appeared as a witness for him; and, when his noble friend was under sentence of death, gave him a proof of his friendship, by sending him a message that he would come and change clothes with him in prison, and stay there to represent him, if he thought that in such disguise he could make his escape. In 1684, by the decease of his father, he became earl of Devonshire; and two years after was fined 30,000l. for striking colonel Culpepper within the verge of the court. His abhorrence of popery made him one of the earliest in inviting over the prince of Orange, at whose landing he appeared in arms for him. In the debates of the house of lords concerning the throne, he was very zealous for declaring the prince and princess of Orange king and queen of England. He was afterwards appointed lord-steward of their majesties household; installed knight of the garter; and in 1691 was created marquis of Hartington and duke of Devonshire. These and his other honours he enjoyed in the reign of queen Anne, and died on the 18th of August, 1707.

His grace's genius for poetry shewed itself particularly in two pieces, written with equal spirit, dignity, and delicacy: these are, an ode on the death of Queen Mary, and an allusion to the Archbishop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer. He had great skill in the languages, was a true judge in history, and a critic in poetry; he had a fine hand in music, and elegant taste in painting, and in architecture had a genius and skill equal to any person of the age in which he lived.

The Life of Lord Burleigh.

Cecil (William) lord Burleigh, was the son of Richard Cecil, Esq; matter of the robes to king Henry VIII. and was born at Bourn in Lincolnshire, on the 13th of September, 1521. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school at Grantham, from whence he was removed to Stamford. In 1535, he was entered of St. John's college, Cambridge, where he distinguished himself by the regularity of his life, and an uncommon application to his studies. At sixteen years of age he read a logical lecture in the university, and at nineteen a Greek lecture; and this he did entirely from choice, and for his own pleasure, without any pay or salary.

When he had sufficiently prosecuted his studies at Cambridge, and laid a good foundation of solid and useful learning, his father thought proper to send for him up to London, and about the year 1741, placed him in Gray's Inn; where he applied himself to the study of the law with the same assiduity and diligence that he had before exerted at the university. And while he was thus employed, an accident introduced him to the notice and favour of his sovereign. O'Neil, a famous Irish chief, coming to court, brought with him two of his chaplains, who were bigoted Papists; with whom Mr. Cecil, who was come from Gray's-Inn to the palace to see his father, chanced to have a very warm dispute in Latin, which was managed with so much acuteness and vivacity on the part of Cecil, that the two priests, finding themselves utterly unable to cope with him, broke from him in a rage. This being reported to the king, he had the curiosity to see the young man, and was so much taken with his abilities, that he directed his father to find out a place for him: but as there was none vacant, the old gentleman asked the reversion of the office of Custos Brevium in the court of Common Pleas, which the king readily granted. About this time Mr. Cecil married Mary Cheke, sister to the celebrated Sir John Cheke, by whom he had one son. He was recommended by Cheke to the earl of Hertford, uncle to king Edward VI. and afterwards duke of Somerset, and lord protector. In 1547 that nobleman appointed him master of requests. In the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. he came into possession of his office of Custos Brevium, which brought him in 240*l.* a year: and his first wife being now dead, he espoused Mildred, daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, a lady of great merit and considerable learning.

When the protector set out upon his expedition into Scotland, Mr. Cecil attended him, and was present at the battle of Musselburgh, where his life was very narrowly saved by the interposition of one of his friends; who, in pushing him out of the level of a cannon, had his own arm shattered to pieces by a shot, that would otherwise have dispatched Cecil. Upon his return to court, he grew into favour with the young king; and, in 1548, was appointed secretary of state. But the following year a party being formed against the protector, our secretary was involved in the troubles of that nobleman, and committed prisoner to the Tower, where he is said to have continued three months*. But he was afterwards set at liberty, and restored to his office of secretary; and on the 11th of October, 1551, he was knighted and sworn of the privy-council. In April 1553, he was made chancellor of the order of the garter. On the accession of queen Mary, he was dismissed from his offices; notwithstanding which, towards the latter end of her reign, he often consulted him. He kept fair with her ministers, and was very much respected by cardinal Pole, bishop Tostall, and Sir William Peters, zealous papists, for his great wisdom. In that reign he carried on a private correspondence with the princess Elizabeth, on whose accession to the throne in 1558, he was sworn privy counsellor and secretary of state. In 1561 he was appointed master of the wards; and was soon after unanimously chosen by the university of Cambridge to be their chancellor. To relate every public transaction in which Cecil was concerned, would be to enter into a detail of almost every important occurrence in the reign of Elizabeth, which would far exceed the limits of our work. For no minister was ever more vigilant and attentive to the interests of his sovereign, and of his country, nor more laborious and indefatigable in the public service, than this famous statesman. His great influence in the council, however, procured him some enemies among the courtiers, and the earl of Leicester, the queen's favourite, together with some others of the nobility, laboured to bring about his ruin, by incensing the queen against him. But Elizabeth had too much penetration, and was too well satisfied of the integrity and capacity of Cecil, to suffer herself to be misled by any artful misrepresentations of his conduct, though made by those to whom she was personally attached; nor could he be prevailed on to withdraw her confidence from this able minister, whom in February, 1571, he raised to the dignity of an English peer, by the title of baron Burghley, or Burleigh. In June 1572, he was made knight of the garter; and in July following, was advanced to the office of lord high-treasurer of England. He died on the 4th of August, 1598, at the great age of seventy-seven; and, "by a rare fortune, (says Mr. Hume) was equally regretted by his sovereign and the people."

Lord Burleigh was in his person of a middle stature, straight, and well-proportioned; and before age came on him, and he began to be subject to the gout, he was strong and active, and capable of enduring great fatigue. He was in his own time considered as the greatest minister not only in England, but in Europe; and posterity has justly considered him as one of the most wise, able, and vigilant statesmen that this country ever produced. His vast and comprehensive capacity took in the highest and most important objects of government, and at the same time descended to the lowest and most minute. He was feared by the enemies of England, and beloved and revered by his countrymen. His indefatigable application, and unwearied attention to the public affairs, and the general interests of the kingdom, were almost incredible.

Camden draws the following character of Lord Burleigh. "Having (says he) lived long enough to nature, and long enough to his own glory, but not long enough to his country, he resigned his soul to God with so much peace and tranquility, that the greatest enemy he had freely declared, that he envied him nothing but that his sun went down with so much lustre; whereas generally public ministers are not blessed with such calm and fortunate periods. Certainly he was a most excellent man; for he was so liberally furnished by nature, (to say nothing of his presence and aspect, which had a commanding sweetness in them) and so polished and adorned with learning and education, that every way for honesty, gravity, temperance, industry, and justice, he was a most accomplished person. He had also an easy and flowing eloquence, which consisted not in a pomp and ostentation of words, but in a masculine plainness and significancy of sense. He was master of a prudence formed upon experience, and regulated by temper and moderation: and his loyalty was true, and would endure the touch, and was only exceeded by his piety, which indeed was eminently great. To sum up all in a word, the queen was happy in so great a counsellor, and the state of England for ever indebted to him for his sage and prudent counsel.

"The queen did so far rely upon his conduct, that, admiring his prudence and wisdom, she in a manner laid the whole weight of the government upon his shoulders. His great interest with the queen, and a plentiful estate beside, drew upon him the envy of some of the nobility, which, he used to say, was sooner overcome by giving way, than making opposition against it. When his prudence and fidelity in the weightiest matters had been experienced for thirteen years, the queen honoured him with the title of Baron of Burleigh, and then made him lord high treasurer of England. In which office, though he abhorred bale and corrupt methods of raising money, money, he increased both the public treasure, and his private estate, by his industry and frugality. For indeed he seldom or never suffered any thing to be expended, but for the queen's honour, the security of the nation, or the support of neighbouring allies.

“He looked strictly, yet not over-rigidly, to the farmers of the customs. He used to say, that he never cared to see the treasury grow too great like the spleen, when the other parts of the common-wealth were in a consumption. He used all possible means, and with good success, to enrich the queen and the kingdom by his administration; it being a common expression with him, that nothing could be for the advantage of a prince, which was inconsistent with his reputation. Wherefore he would never suffer the rents of lands to be raised, nor the old tenants to be turned out. The same method he observed as to his own private estate, which he managed with so much discretion and probity, that he never sued any man, nor was sued himself. I shall forbear too lavish a commendation of him; but this I may venture to affirm with truth, that he was one of those few who lived and died with equal glory. Such a man, as while others regard with admiration, I, after the ancient manner, am rather inclined to contemplate with the sacred applause of silent veneration.”

Lord Burleigh wrote two Latin poems on the death of Margaret Nevil, lady of the bed-chamber to queen Catharine; a Latin poem in memory of Sir Thomas Chaloner; Precepts or Directions for the well ordering and carriage of a man's life; A Meditation on the State of England, during the reign of queen Elizabeth; and other pieces. A collection of his state papers was published by S. Haymes, in 1740; and a continuation of them by Mr. Murdin, in 1760.

The Life of Mrs. Susanna Centlivre.

Centlivre (Susanna) a celebrated comic writer, was the daughter of Mr. Freeman, of Holbeach, in Lincolnshire, and had such an early genius for poetry, that, it is said, she wrote a long before she was seven years old. She learned French from a neighbouring gentleman, who so much admired her sprightly wit and manner, that he undertook to instruct her in that language, in which she made so rapid a progress, that before she was twelve years of age, she could not only read Moliere, but enter into the spirit of all the characters. After her father's death, she enlisted herself in a company of strolling players, with whom she continued some time. Several little poems procured her considerable presents from the great; particularly prince Eugene made her a present of a very handsome gold snuff-box, for a poem inscribed to him. Her peculiar talent was comedy, and she principally excelled in the contrivance of the plots and incidents. She for many years kept up a correspondence with gentlemen distinguished by their wit and abilities; particularly with Sir Richard Steele, Mr. Rowe, Mr. Budgel, &c. She died in Spring-garden, Charing-cross, on the first of December, 1723, at the house of her husband Mr. Joseph Centlivre, and was interred in the church of St. Martin in the Fields. She wrote nineteen dramatic pieces, viz. 1. The Artifice: 2. The Basset Table: 3.

The Beau's Duel: 4. Bickerstaff's Burying: 5. A Bold Stroke for a Wife: 6. The Busy Body: 7. The Cruel Gift: 8. The Gamester: 9. The Gotham Election: 10. Love at a Venture: 11. Love's Contrivance: 12. The Man's Bewitched: 13. Marplot: 14. The Perjur'd Husband: 15. The Perplex'd Lovers: 16. The Platonic Lady: 17. The Stolen Heiress: 18. A Wife well managed: 19. The Wonder.

The Life of Mr. Geoffrey Chaucer.

Chaucer (Geoffrey) the father of English poetry, was born at London in 1328, the second year of the reign of king Edward III. At a proper age he was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he gave early testimonies of his poetical talents, by several elegies and sonnets, and particularly by a poem called the Court of Love, which he composed when he was about eighteen, and which carries in it evident proofs of his skill and learning, as well as of the strength of his genius. From Cambridge he removed to Oxford, in order to complete his studies; and afterwards travelled into France, Holland, and other countries. Upon his return, he entered himself of the Middle-Temple, as a student in the law. His extraordinary accomplishments, both of body and mind, gained him the friendship of many persons of distinction, by whom he was introduced at court, where his first employment was that of page to the king. In the number of Chaucer's court-parons was John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, by whom, and also his duchess Blanche, a lady distinguished for her wit and virtue, he was greatly esteemed. King Edward, in the forty-first year of his reign, granted our poet, for his good services, an annuity of twenty marks, payable out of the Exchequer, till he could otherwise provide for him. Not long after, he was made gentleman of the king's privy chamber; and, in the forty-third year of his reign, the king granted him the further sum of twenty marks a year, during life. The next year he was appointed shield-bearer to his majesty. In the forty-sixth year of this prince, Chaucer was honoured with a commission, in conjunction with other persons, to treat with the republic of Genoa. This negotiation, it is conjectured, regarded the hiring of ships for the king's navy. At his return home, he received a new mark of royal favour, his majesty granting him a pitcher of wine daily, in the port of London, to be delivered by the butler of England. Soon after, he was made comptroller of the customs of London, for wool, wool-fells, and hides, with a proviso that he should personally execute that office, and keep the accounts of it with his own hand. About a year after his nomination to this office, he obtained from the king a grant of the lands and body of Sir Edmund Staplegate, son of Sir Edmund Staplegate of Kent, in ward. His income at this time amounted to one thousand pounds per annum. In the last year of king Edward, he was one of the commissioners sent over to expostulate with the French, on their violation of the truce.

Richard II. who succeeded to the crown in 1377, confirmed the same year his grandfather's grant to Chaucer, of twenty marks a year, and likewise the other grant of a pitcher of wine daily. In the fourth year of king Richard's reign, he procured a confirmation of the grant that had been formerly made to himself and to Philippa his wife. Chaucer having adopted many of Wickliff's tenets, exerted himself to the utmost, in 1382, in supporting John Comberton, generally stiled John of Northampton, mayor of London, who endeavoured to reform the city according to the advice given by Wickliff. This intended reformation was highly resented by the clergy. Comberton was taken into custody. Our poet, being apprised of his danger, made his escape out of the kingdom, and spent his time in Hainault, France, and Zealand. His necessities at length forced him to return to England, where he was discovered, seized, and sent to prison. But upon disclosing all he knew of the late transactions in the city of London, he was discharged. This confession brought upon him a heavy load of calumny. At this time, in order to give vent to his sorrow, he wrote his Testament of Love, in imitation of Boetius de Consolatione Philosophiæ. His afflictions, which arose chiefly from poverty, received a very considerable addition, by the decline of the duke of Lancaster's credit at court. In this reverse of fortune, Chaucer wisely resolved to quit the busy scene of life in which he had been engaged, and to seek for happiness in study and retirement. The place he chose for his retreat was Woodstock; and here he employed part of his time in revising and correcting his writings. The duke of Lancaster's return to favour, and his marrying Catherine Swynford, sister to Chaucer's wife, could not influence our author to quit his retirements, where he wrote his admirable treatise on the Altrabale. About the year 1397, king Richard granted him an annuity of twenty marks, in lieu of that given him by his grandfather, which poverty had compelled him to dispose of for his subsistence. The following year he had the grant also of a pipe of wine annually, out of the customs of the port of London, which was to be delivered to him by the chief butler. By these benefits our poet was cheered and comforted in his declining years. But he sustained a considerable loss, in February, 1399, by the death of his noble patron the duke of Lancaster. This is supposed to have greatly affected him; for about this time he retired to Dunnington castle, near Newbury, where he spent the remainder of his days. This was a very agreeable and pleasant retreat; and here Chaucer lived in honour, esteemed by all, and celebrated for his genius and learning, not only in England, but in foreign countries. He was in this situation, when Richard II. was deposed, and Henry of Lancaster, the son of his late brother-in-law, placed upon the throne; but our poet was no way concerned in this revolution, nor does he appear to have been eager in paying his compliments to the new king. However, in the first year of king Henry IV. he obtained a confirmation of his grant of a pipe of wine annually, and his annuity; and Henry also granted him the same year an annuity of forty marks. He died on the 25th of October, 1400, in the seventy-second year of his age, and was buried in Westminster-Abbey.

Chaucer has been deservedly considered as one of the greatest, as well as earliest poets which this nation has produced. Allowing for those unavoidable defects which arise from the fluctuation of language, his works have still all the beauties which can be wished for, or expected, in every species of composition which he attempted; for it has been truly said, that he excelled in all the different kinds of verse in which he wrote. He was not unacquainted with the ancient rules of poetry, nor did he disdain to follow them, tho' he thought it the least part of a poet's perfections. As he had a discerning eye, he discovered nature in all her appearances, and stripped off every disguise with which the Gothic writers had clothed her. He was an excellent master of love poetry, having studied that passion in all its terms and appearances; and Mr. Dryden prefers him upon this Account to Ovid. His Trilusus and Creseide is one of the most beautiful poems of that kind, in which love is curiously and naturally described, in its early appearance, its hopes and fears, its application, fruition, and despair in disappointment. That in the elegiac poetry he was a great master, appears evidently by his Complaint of the black Knight, the poem called La belle Dame sans mercy, and several of his songs. And his uncommon talents in the satirical and comic way are strikingly evident. "He deserves (says the ingenious Mr. Warton) to be ranked as one of the first English poets, on account of his admirable artifice in painting the manners, which none before him had ever attempted, even in the most imperfect degree; and it should be remembered to his honour, that he was the first who gave the English nation in its own language, an idea of humour."

But the great merit of our author is set in the most conspicuous point of view by Mr. Dryden, who was not only a great poet, but an admirable critic. "As Chaucer (says he) is the father of English poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer, or the Romans Virgil: he is a perpetual fountain of good sense, learned in all sciences, and therefore speaks properly on all subjects; as he knew what to say, so he knew also when to leave off; a continence which is practised by few writers, and scarcely by any of the ancients excepting Virgil and Horace. Chaucer followed nature every where, but was never so bold as to go beyond her: and there is a great difference of being Poeta & nimis Poeta, if we may believe Catullus, as much as betwixt a modest behaviour and affectation. The verse of Chaucer, I confess, is not harmonious to us, but it is like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus commends, it was auribus istius temporis accommodata: they who lived with him, and some time after him, thought it musical; and it continues so even in our judgment, if compared with the numbers of Lydgate and Gower, his cotemporaries; there is the rude sweetness of a Scotch tune in it, which is natural and pleasing, though not perfect. It is true, I cannot go so far as he who published the last edition of him; for he would make us believe the fault is in our ears, and that there are really ten syllables in a verse, where we find but nine: but this opinion is not worth confuting."

"He must (Mr. Dryden afterwards adds) have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, nature, because, as it has been truly observed of him, he has taken into the compass of the Canterbury Tales, the various manners and humours, as we now call them, of the whole English nation, in his age. Not a single character has escaped him. All his pilgrims are severally distinguished from each other, and not only in their inclinations, but in their physiognomies and persons. The matter and manner of their tales, and of their telling, are so suited to their different educations, humours, and callings, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and serious characters are distinguished by their several sorts of gravity; their discourses are such as belong to their age, their calling, and their breeding; such as are becoming of them, and of them only. Some of his persons are vicious, and some virtuous; some are unlearned, or (as Chaucer calls them) lewd, and some are learned. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different; the Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook, are several men, and distinguished from each other, as much as the mincing lady Prioress, and the broad-speaking gap-tooth'd Wife of Bath. But enough of this: there is such a variety of game springing up before me, that I am distracted in my choice, and know not which to follow. It is sufficient to say, according to the proverb, that here is God's plenty. We have our fore-fathers, and grand-dames all before us, as they were in Chaucer's days; their general characters are still remaining in mankind, and even in England; though they are called by other names than those of Monks and Fryars, of Canons, and Lady Abbesses, and Nuns; for mankind is ever the same, and nothing lost out of nature, though every thing is altered."

Friday, April 25.

THE resolutions from the committee of supply being read, Mr. Hatley observed, that the accounts were at once the most slovenly and delusive he ever saw laid before that house. That, unwilling to take up the time of the house to no purpose, he should just make an observation or two relative to the immediate probable effects of the present war; that is that the end of this year would nearly leave us in the same situation we were at the conclusion of the late peace; and that another campaign, computed at the same expence as that of 1776, would leave us fourteen millions in debt, which was five more than were cleared off at the end of thirteen years peace.

Mr. Vyner observed, that the coach act had a clause in it which enabled the collectors to compound with such as had more than five carriages for 20*l.* per annum; he therefore hoped the composition would be raised in proportion, that the compounders might not escape the effect of the proposed tax; for it might be presumed that those who kept the greatest number of carriages, would be best able to pay the tax.

Lord North said, it would be time enough to speak of that when the bill imposing the tax should come before the house. When that time should arrive, he proposed to move that the composition in future should be 25*l.* per ann.

Mr. Vyner stated a complaint against the Lord Great Chamberlain, for shutting up the avenues to the house during the trial of the Ducheis of Kingston, in Westminster-hall. That he and many other gentlemen wanted their votes and letters, and could not get them. He was certain the conduct of that officer was unprecedented; he should therefore be glad to know by what new authority he acted.

Sir Gilbert Elliot said, he wished the honourable gentleman would refrain making any motion for a few days, because it would be proper to gain full information on the subject before the house came to any resolution, and he sure first what was the ancient and established usage in such cases.

Mr. Vyner said, he readily acquiesced in the justice of the honourable gentleman's reasoning; he should therefore wave his motion for the present, but he should take care, however, in the course of a few days, to move for a committee of privileges and elections, to enquire into the ancient mode of proceeding, and if it had been varied or the privileges of the house infringed, he would certainly follow it with such other motion as he should think the particular circumstances of the case required.

Sir James Lowther then made the following motion, pursuant to the notice given by him previous to the Easter recess, "That it is the opinion of this house, that the introducing of foreign troops into any part of the dominions of the crown of Great Britain, without the previous consent or approbation of the Parliament of Great Britain, is contrary to the principles of the constitution, and not warranted by law." He gave an historical detail of the introduction of foreigners into this kingdom since the earliest periods of the monarchy, and shewed that it had always been looked upon to be illegal and unconstitutional to introduce foreign troops into the kingdom without the consent of Parliament. He said, all our liberties would be no more than a shadow, if such things were permitted or maintained on the ground of prerogative; for instead of a limited, the very nature and effect of such a pretended claim in the crown, would render this government an absolute monarchy. Among the points he most urged, was the conduct of King William's Parliament towards his Dutch guards, and the sense the nation had of the law at the time of its being passed; and that construction which the framers of the bill of rights law immediately gave it, was to him the fullest proof that the obvious construction of the law as it now appeared, was likewise the intention of those who passed it, which was, that no foreigners could be constitutionally introduced into this country without the consent of Parliament.

Governor Johnstone seconded the motion, and was extremely pointed and severe on Lord North. He insisted his Lordship had insulted the nation, and that house in the manner of conducting the indemnity bill. The preamble was no better than a mere farce, and it was all along conducted in that light in the house; so the fate it met with in the other, shewed how little the minister, when when his turn was served, regarded the wishes of either his friends or his enemies.

Mr. Cosmo Gordon said, it was an improper time to take any step which might have the appearance of censure on his Majesty's ministers; and though he did not entirely approve of the measure the motion was intended to condemn, yet he believed the ministers always acted according to the king's inclinations. He said, he would not move the previous question, because he had done it upon the honourable gentleman's former similar motion, but he hoped somebody else would.

The right hon. T. Townshend spoke of the danger of bringing foreigners into the British dominions, without the consent of Parliament. It was a new experiment, and should have been adopted with great caution. It is true, foreigners were taken into British pay in every war since the revolution; but it made a very great difference, in hiring them to fight our battles on the continent, or to defend their own dominions, and introducing them into the British empire; perhaps not long before it would be for the purpose of defending this very capital. The mode he said, of recruiting the British troops with foreigners was besides extremely exceptionable. They were enlisted in the Hans towns, which were known to be the asylum of all the rogues and vagabonds, of the rest of Germany; men who had fled their respective countries for their crimes. When such men therefore came to serve in America, to suppose that they would fight cordially for this country, and for its right, was folly and absurdity in the extreme: They would certainly enlist with the best pay-master, or join with that party which held out the best prospects of improving their present situation or future fortunes. He said, what made him the more solicitous about the success of the present motion was, that he understood the measure of introducing foreign troops had not been supported upon the ground of necessity, or the exigencies of affairs, but had been expressly maintained by several eminent lawyers as a positive unconditional prerogative inherent in the crown.

Lord Mulgrave, in answer to Sir James Lowther, said the facts alluded to by that gentleman did not mean the dominions of the crown at large, but were specifically confined to this country. He therefore did not conceive that any law or usage whatever, reached the present case, or could prevent the King from bringing foreigners to any part of the dominions of the crown he pleased, Great Britain excepted.

The Lord Advocate of Scotland wished to let matters rest upon their former footing. The usage had always been, that the crown had a right to exercise the discretionary power now objected to; but as the motion stated was not one that ought to have a direct negative put upon it, he should move the previous question. He said, on which side the law lay he would not pretend to determine; but, for his part, he should think a minister very inexcusable and blame-worthy, who did not, when the exigencies of the state, and the most important interests of his country were at stake, venture even to transgress the exact limits and bounds of the law; and in such a case he was sure Parliament would cheerfully indemnify him. And if Gibraltar and Minorca, for want of a sufficient defence, had fallen into the hands of the French and Spaniards, he would be one of the first that would give his vote for hanging that minister who neglected to procure foreigners for their security, were it in his power.

Mr. Dunning confined himself chiefly to the definition of the law, and shewed, that if interpreted in the manner contended for on the other side, 100,000 Russians or Germans might be introduced into Scotland, because Scotland, at the time of passing the bill of rights formed no part of this kingdom.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn said, that the motion now made became more necessary by throwing out the indemnity bill; it was a proper motion to prevent the measure of introducing foreigners without the consent of Parliament, having the full weight and authority of a precedent.

Mr. Attorney General said, that ministers always do things at their own peril when they overstep the law. It was therefore idle to be talking or insisting on the legality or illegality of the measure; if they should act in a manner not warranted by the constitution, Parliament were the best judges, and would proceed to acquittal or condemnation, according to the nature of the case.

Mr. Fox said, that it was illegal for one part of the legislature to sanctify the introduction of foreigners. Parliament were the proper judges of the measure.

Honourable T. Luttrell shewed, that the sending home the Dutch guards, was in consequence of the conduct of James, not any real jealousy the nation entertained of King William.

The previous question was put, that the question be now put. The House divided, ayes 88; noes 149.

April 26.

The House resolved itself into a committee, to consider of a more effectual method of securing the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament; but came to no resolution.

Adjourned to April 29.

April 29.

Report of committee of ways and means. No debate. In committee on Shaftesbury incapacitating bill; to sit again.

April 30.

Mr. Vyner complained of a breach of privilege committed by the Lord Great Chamberlain, who, during the trial of the Duchess of Kingston, had shut up all the avenues to the house.

Sir G. Elliot said, the noble duke, [Duke of Lancaster] had assured him it proceeded from mistake.

Mr. Seymour mentioned, that a member of the house [Lord Barrington] had been called upon to give evidence at the trial without leave of the house.

Mr. Townshend said, leave of the house ought to have been first asked.

Mr. Alderman Wilkes. The veneration with which I am deeply impressed for the constitution of my country, the love and affection of a native to the noble privileges, the laws and liberties of England, as well as duty and gratitude to the much injured freeholders of Middlesex, are the the powerful motives of my again troubling the house with a question so frequently agitated within these walls, and so fully discussed even the last session, although not hitherto followed with the success I hope on the present occasion.

The profligacy, venality, and daring attempts against liberty of the last house of commons, have made their memory odious to the people. The annals of our country are disgraced with their various violations of the rights of the subject. I shall now confine myself to a single case, but it was of the blackest nature and deepest dye, branched out into many enormities, and still demands ample atonement. I allude to the various resolutions respecting the elections for the county of Middlesex, and the seating Mr. Luttrell in the house, although he had confessedly only a minority of the suffrages of the freeholders, in whom the constitution has placed the right of election. While these resolutions, Sir, remain among our records, I consider a precedent established under the sanction of this house of Parliament to rob not only a whole county, but the entire collective body of electors of this kingdom of their birth-right, and most valuable inheritance. It is a precedent, which may be brought home to every borough, city and county, to every freeholder, every elector in the island.

The facts were fully stated to the house in the debate on this subject the last year, and I am persuaded they live in the memory of every gentleman. I shall desire the clerk to read only one resolution. It is that of February 17, 1769, "That John Wilkes, Esq; having been, in this session of Parliament, expelled this house, was, and is, incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present Parliament." This declaration, in my opinion, transfers from the people to this house the right of election, and by an unbounded, uncontrolled exercise of the negative power, the house in effect assume the positive right of making whom they please the representatives of the people in Parliament. I am very ready to admit that there are various natural and legal incapacities, and when the party is subject to any one of them, he is not eligible. Aliens, minors, bishops, are incapable of being elected into a house of commons. Besides these, there are other incapacities arising from the peculiar circumstances of the case, and some created by particular statutes. Where however there is no natural or legal disability, the capacity of being elected is the inherent right of every freeman of the realm, and he cannot be divested of it without an equal injury to the party, and to the constituent, in whom the power is constitutionally lodged of determining whom he thinks the most fit and proper person to act for him in the great council of the nation. The declaration of the house therefore, that any man, duly qualified, by law, shall not be allowed to sit in Parliament as a representative of the Commons of the realm, was assuming to themselves the making a new law, to which only the three estates are adequate. It was disfranchising a whole county, and consequently in effect the united kingdom.

The public attention has been so long fixed on this important business, that it would be the weakest and vainest presumption in me to attempt any new arguments in support of a right acknowledged by every man, who is not interested in the subversion of all our rights, liberties, and franchises. I shall not enter on a dull repetition of the debates, which for the last eleven years have come on every session, nor repeat a multitude of cases and precedents; but while I have a seat in this house, I pledge myself to my country, that I will be firm and unwearied in my endeavours, till every syllable on our journals, which marks the injustice done to the freeholders of Middlesex, and to every elector in the island, be fully erased or obliterated.

Since the debate, however, on this question in the last session, almost within a fortnight after, a case respecting the election at Abingdon was determined here in a manner diametrically opposite to one part of this pretended law of Parliament, solemnly laid down by all the advocates of the ministry in the affair of Mr. Luttrell. They argued, that all the votes given to Mr. Wilkes were thrown away, because they were given, as they asserted, to a person labouring under legal incapacity, and consequently Mr. Luttrell, with only 296 freeholders, was entitled to his seat in preference to the other candidate with 1143. The majority of the electors of Middlesex, Sir, fully answered this argument in that remarkable petition presented to the house by the worthy baronet near me, on the 29th of April, 1769, in which they asserted, "that Mr. Luttrell had not the majority of legal votes; nor did they, when they voted for Mr. Wilkes, mean thereby to throw away their votes, or to waive their right of representation, nor would they, by any means, have chosen to be represented by Mr. Luttrell." Notwithstanding this petition, the house, on the 8th of May following, declared Mr. Luttrell duly elected. Now let us examine the still more recent case of the Abingdon election, the determination of the select committee, with all the proceedings of the present Parliament. I will state them briefly, and shall afterwards desire the clerk to read from the journals the more important passages. Mr. Bayley's petition was presented to this house on the 6th of December, 1774. It was confined to one single objection, the legal disability of the other candidate, no accusation of bribery or corruption, riots, unfair practices, or illegal votes, being exhibited. It stated, "that at the place of election, and before the taking of the poll, the Mayor of the said borough and the other electors were publicly told, that as the other candidate, Mr. John Mayor, was then high sheriff of that county, he was incapable of being chosen a member to represent the said borough in this present Parliament, and that all votes given for the said high sheriff would be thrown away; notwithstanding which, the mayor of the said borough did himself vote, and also received the votes of divers other persons for the said high sheriff; and that the said high sheriff hath returned himself as duly elected for the said borough, in manifest prejudice of the petitioner, who, being the only candidate capable of being elected, ought to have been returned." The facts, as stated in the petition, were admitted, as well as the numbers at the close of the poll, for Mr. Mayor 146, for Mr. Bayley only 116. The great question was,

whether,

whether, if Mr. Mayor was not eligible, the votes for him were thrown away, and Mr. Bayley, who had not the majority of electors, should be declared duly elected? The select committee, on the 6th of March, 1775, reported, that neither Mr. Mayor, nor Mr. Bayley was duly elected, and that the election was void. The house immediately directed a new writ to issue for Abingdon. The ministerial advocates, who insist on Mr. Wilkes's legal incapacity, can scarcely find a case more exactly parallel. It is equalled only by the well known precedent of Mr. Walpole, and Mr. Taylor, in 1711. Yet the burgesses of Lynn were not insulted, by having a gentleman declared their representative, whom they never elected. The Abingdon case was of public notoriety. The returning officer, and all the electors of Abingdon, were publicly informed of Mr. Mayor's legal incapacity. Mr. Bayley polled near half the voters of that borough. His opposition however being not to a friend of liberty and the people, but the attack made on a subaltern in the ministerial forces, he had little chance of being an adopted child of the house, or of a committee selected from the present majority.

The arbitrary resolution on our journals, and the appointment of Mr. Luttrell, I consider as an absolute surrender of the constitution to the minister. The laws of the land are of no avail, when this house alone can make a new law, adapted to the caprice, violence, or injustice of every emergency, and when representation in Parliament no longer depends upon the choice of the electors. The people of England may in vain assemble with the fond hope of effectually exercising their noblest franchise, if the object of their choice is really what he ought to be, an independent friend of liberty, superior to menace or corruption. The minister has found out a way to baffle them in all their proceeding. He may on any pretence, however frivolous, procure an expulsion; and expulsion, we know, means incapacitation; so that during a long period of seven years, the favourite object of a country's choice may be kept out, and the nominee of a minister be declared to represent a populous county. Can there be a more solemn mockery of the rights of a free people?

While such arbitrary resolutions as those respecting the Middlesex elections remain on our journals, I think the minister holds high the rod of vengeance over the head of every member of this house. He stands here with an uplifted arm, sublimi sigello, to punish the refractory, and almost every action of the majority seems to betray their being either swayed by the dastardly passion of fear, or corrupted by the mean principle of reward. We are governed by Solon's plan præmio et pœna, as Cicero has summed it up in two words. Is a member obnoxious or refractory? Accuse him of a libel, or any other crime; then vote away your own privileges to get at him; and before the cause can come to a trial by a jury of his countrymen on oath, examine two or three partial and well instructed witnesses under no such sanction, and you may proceed immediately to expulsion; you then vote him incapable of being re-elected, and you take the creature of the minister in his place, and declare him the representative of the people. A house of commons may in this manner be so garbled, as not to contain a single fair and honest representative, elected according to the law of the land.

The motion of expunging from our records the resolutions of which I complain, I know is considered by some gentlemen as a violent measure. The case, I think, requires the most spirited mode of redress, and I wish for as full atonement to the people as possible. The last Parliament gave us an instance of expunging from our journals what never ought to have been moved in this house, the thanks to a stupid parson for a libel on the Revolution, and the present establishment, in a sermon preached on the anniversary of the merited death of the tyrant, Charles I. If so trifling a business as a foolish sermon, neither heard or read by a score persons, called for so spirited a measure, can it be deemed improper or violent, when the rights of all the electors of the kingdom have been openly invaded, and the usurpation justified by gentlemen in the highest offices under the crown? The circumstance is truly alarming, and demands the utmost exertions of an honest zeal and generous ardour for the public.

I own I am not so nice and scrupulous about preserving every line of the immensity of the learned lumber of our journals. They are become the mere registers of the edicts of the minister, of turnpike roads, enclosures, and matters of private business. There are many whole pages disgraceful to the nation among our trivial, fond records. My heart bleeds when I read all the unjust and inhuman resolutions against our fellow subjects in America, the fleets and armies voted for the vain attempt of subduing the unconquerable spirit of liberty among the descendants of Englishmen; and when I reflect on the subsequent proceedings, the barbarous and savage manner in which you have carried on the war, by attempting to starve thousands of industrious fishermen, and labouring poor with their families, as well as the burning open and defenceless towns and villages, I wish, for the national humanity and honour, which formerly stood so high, these black pages of our journals, and every trace of the cruelties and horrors which followed, were obliterated from the records of this house, of this kingdom, of the human race.

In justice to the usurped and violated rights of this county, in a full sense of duty to all my brother electors at large, and to prevent the most fatal and pernicious precedent being ever used by a wicked and ill-designing minister to the destruction of the sacred right of election of national freedom and independency, I move, "that the resolutions of the house of the 17th of February, 1769, that John Wilkes, Esquire, having been in this session of Parliament expelled this house, was and is, incapable of sitting in the present Parliament," be expunged from the journals of this house, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn seconded the motion.

Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Moyley spoke on the same side.

There was no reply.

The house divided: for the question 92, against it 186.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Rome, April 5.

THE Duke and Dukes of Gloucester, after an abode of a year and four months in this capital, are determined to leave it, the 15th instant. It is said, that their Royal Highnesses intend passing the summer in Switzerland.

Vienna, April 9. Within these few days a courier is arrived here with dispatches from our minister at Constantinople, the contents of which are not known. It is reported, however, that a very good intelligence subsists between our court and the Porte; and it is presumed, that Russia will accept of a consideration from the Grand Seignior, for the independence of the Crimea, which was agreed upon in the treaty of the last peace, which it is thought the Grand Seignior will never consent to acknowledge. A new vein of gold has been discovered at Crennitz, which many people are actually now at work upon, and from which great advantages are expected.

Lisbon, March 11. The Marquis de Pombal, upon whom the eyes of all were since the death of the King, quitted the 6th of this month this capital, to end his days on his estate with his spouse. The queen, in regard to the respect and esteem that the deceased king, her uncle, had for him, has continued to him the revenues arising from his post as secretary of state, and at the same time gave him the commandery of St. Jacques de Lanbuzo.

HISTORICAL

Bodmin, March 4.

A Few days ago died at Hanger, in this county, Samuel Mitchell, Esq; who many years ago resigned his commission of Colonel in his late Majesty's service. He has bequeathed 20l. per annum to 10 old maids; the like sum to as many poor housekeepers, and a very considerable sum to the parish: the income to be distributed annually in such charities as they approve: to his housekeeper, butler, steward, and valet, 1000l. each; to his coachman, footman, and groom, 500l. each; two livings, in his gift, to two neighbouring clergymen, after the death of the present incumbents, who are both very old; his estate devolves to a very distant relation, who is the heir; but a great part of his fortune being in money, he has left to a relation, wife to a person now on duty in America.

Stafford, April 1. "On Saturday morning came on before Mr. Baron Perryn the trial of a genteel young man, not nineteen years of age, for the murder of Sarah Spear, a fine young woman of 18, by mixing white arsenic in ale, and administering it to her; the prisoner was an apprentice to an ironmonger at Wolverhampton, in this county, where the unfortunate deceased girl lived as a servant. The prisoner, under a promise of marriage, debauched her. The girl being between two and three months gone with child, discovered her situation to him, when they agreed, that unless some method could be adopted to prevent a discovery, their characters would suffer in the esteem of their relations and friends; it was therefore determined that certain medicines should be taken, in order, if possible, to cause an abortion. The medicines were accordingly taken for some time, and the prisoner finding they had not the desired effect, purchased some white arsenic, under a pretended intention of applying it to the destruction of rats, and persuaded the deceased to take it, which she with some reluctance unfortunately did, upon a supposition it was a composition of a similar quality with, and administered for the same purpose, as that she had formerly taken. The dose being a large one, hurried the poor creature off in a few hours. The prisoner, on his arrival at the age of 21, would have been entitled to a fortune of 2000l. He appeared unconcerned to the last, but did not deny the justice of his sentence. He was executed cut yesterday evening, and his body was this day dissected and anatomized."

LONDON.

Extract of a letter from Hanover, March 16.

"A gentleman who came to live upon an estate which he possessed in this electorate, but which had not been inhabited by any of his family for many years, found that an old lady lived in his neighbourhood who was reduced to the lowest circumstances; she was a countess, and named Helena Polixena de Vassberg, and was grand-daughter to the Count de Vassberg, who was a natural son of King Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. The gentleman presumed to make this discovery known to Gustavus the IIIrd, by a letter wrote in a very interesting and noble stile, in which he implored some assistance for this unfortunate lady; and the benevolent king wrote him an answer with his own hand, thanking him for his information, and inclosing a bill for 500 ducats for the indigent countess, together with a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"My cousin, If you knew the high respect and veneration I have for the memory of the great Gustavus, you might easily figure to yourself how much it affected me to hear of the situation in which it was your lot to be placed. I shall always regret the not knowing it sooner; but I should be inconsolably grieved if you had the least doubt of the tender interest I now take in every thing which concerns your welfare. If your advanced age will permit you to end your days in Sweden, I will prepare you an asylum worthy of your birth, and the illustrious house of which you are a branch, and from which Sweden has reaped so many great advantages: in the mean time, I beg you will accept the small token of my friendship which I have sent you; and it shall be annually renewed, and remitted wherever you please to have it. If you have any other wishes to gratify, I desire I may know them, and the readiest I shall shew in complying with them will be the best proof I can give of the sincerity with which I am your affectionate cousin,

GUSTAVUS.

April 10. The House of Commons met at half after two o'clock, and read a second time several road and inclosing bills.

Lord North, as soon as the private business was ended, acquainted the House that he had a message

A a a

message to deliver from his Majesty, which he read in his place. It was conveyed in the same terms with that delivered to the House of Lords, only the difference of desiring the grant directly, instead as in the other desiring the Lords to concur in the grant. It was conceived in the following terms:

“GEORGE R.

“It gives his Majesty much concern to find himself obliged to acquaint this House with the difficulties he labours under, by reason of debts incurred by the expences of his household, and of his civil government, which being computed on the 5th day of January last, do amount to more than 600,000*l*. His Majesty, relying on the loyal and affectionate attachment of this House to his person and government, which he has experienced on so many occasions, doubts not of their readiness to concur in enabling him to discharge this debt; and for making some further provision for the better support of his Majesty's household, and of the honour and dignity of the crown.”

11. Wednesday the Rev. Dr. Louth kissed his Majesty's hand on being translated from the see of Oxford to that of London, in the room of Dr. Terrick, deceased.

The same day the Rev. Dr. Butler kissed his Majesty's hand, on being appointed Bishop of Oxford in the room of Dr. Louth.

15. Our ministers have received authentic information, of a very extraordinary measure taken by the French court, which alarms them very much. The French have completely manned the fifteen men of war which they are fitting out, yet they have laid an embargo upon all their fishing vessels. Between ten and eleven thousand seamen from Morlaix, Dieppe, &c. used to be employed in the fishery at St. Pierre, &c. This fishery, which was highly advantageous to France, she has resolved, this year, to forego; a measure she never took during the whole of last war, when she was frequently in great distress for seamen. The fishery stages will necessarily be destroyed. There must be some capital plan in the policies of the French Court, at this time, to occasion so very extraordinary a measure.

Saturday morning at the Old Bailey, came on the trial of Madame Thomas for forgery. The indictment charged her with forging a promissory note of hand for 50*l*. purporting to be the note of the Rev Francis Tutte, of Kensington Gore, payable one month after date, with intent to defraud the said Francis Tutte; she was also charged with an intent to defraud Mr. Blades, upholsterer, of Market-street, St. James's. There were two counts also charging her with publishing the said note, with an intent to defraud the said Mr. Tutte, and Mr. Blades.

After Mr. Blades, Mr. Atkinson, and Mr. Smart had given their evidence, Baron Eyre summed up the whole very carefully, observing that the jury could not find her guilty of the forgery, as there was no kind of proof of it; but if they were inclined to think the prisoner published it knowing it to be forged, then they would find her guilty of that charge, which was equally criminal. The jury retired for a quarter of an hour, and brought in their verdict guilty of uttering, knowing it to be forged. She was recommended by both the prosecutor and jury to mercy. Baron Eyre said he did not disapprove of their recommendations, as she was a foreigner, and from circumstances he thought her a fit object of mercy.

Saturday John Millachip, a freeman and liverman, who was lately brought from on board one of his Majesty's ships by virtue of an habeas corpus, waited on the Lord Mayor to return his Lordship thanks for procuring his dismissal; but was told by the Lord Mayor that the thanks were due to the corporation, and that therefore it would be proper to wait on them the first court of common council that is held, which he said he would do.

19. Yesterday eleven Judges met at their chambers in Serjeants Inn (Lord Chief Justice de Grey being absent) respecting the legality of Robinson's evidence against Dr. Dodd. The Judges were of opinion, that Robinson's evidence was competent, and Dr. Dodd will receive sentence the last day of the next sessions.

Extract of a letter from Nuremburg, March 18.

“We have accounts here of a disturbance which happened among the German troops taken into British pay, of which the following are the particulars, viz. When the above-mentioned troops were to embark on board the transports, they complained that the ships were too small, and that they should be greatly crowded; and so high did their murmurs arise, that they refused to go on board. The commandant told them, that the ships were rather confined, but that they would be provided with larger at a certain place, which he named; but this would not do; those who were not on board would not go, which made those on board to land again. Luckily the arms were all packed up in a chest, of which the commandant had the keys, and prevented their getting at them. He also gave orders to the company of chasseurs, who were armed, to post themselves upon a hill, at the foot of which the troops, if they would go away, were obliged to pass; and commanded the captain of them to speak to the mariners, and if he found he could not otherwise prevent their flight, to fire upon them. This had the desired effect; four men were killed on the spot, which brought the rest to reason. In the mean time the commandant sent a courier to his sovereign, who came himself in four hours, which entirely put an end to the affair. There were, however, four who would not embark; these the prince discharged, with orders never to enter his dominions again; and that good order might be kept up, he determined to go great part of the way himself with his troops.”

23. Yesterday, pursuant to the act, a return was made in the court of King's Bench of the state of the convicts on the river. It appeared, that the nature and novelty of the punishment has a very great effect upon their manners, and tends much to reclaim and make them useful members of society. Within nine months above forty of them have died, and there are at present a great number sick. Mr. Justice Alton recommended that their disagreeable situation should be made as public as possible, in hopes of having a proper effect on those abroad. Lord Mansfield strongly recommended, that they should not be permitted to have the smallest intercourse with their friends, or suffered to get any kind of spirits; and that such such of them as gave proofs of a thorough information, should be recommended for pardon.

Sir Richard Bickerton, Capt. of his Majesty's ship Terrible, took on the 15th inst. in the bay of Biscay, and has sent to Spithead, a rebel privateer, called the Rising States, mounted with sixteen six pounder guns, ten swivels, four howitzers, and sixty-one men. She left Bolton about ten weeks since.

It also appears by letters from Vice Admiral Young, dated Antigua March 10, that since his last account the ships of his squadron had taken 27 Rebel vessel, and re-taken seven ships that had fallen into their hands.

April 21.

THIS morning the Court of King's Bench was moved to grant an information against the right hon. the P—st of T—y C—e, on an affidavit made by the right hon. P. T—l, his majesty's A—y G—l. The affidavit set forth that the P—st had grossly insulted the A—y G—l by calling him rascal and scoundrel, but not in the hearing of the A—y G—l, and that words passed from the P—st on Saturday to provoke him to single combat. Mr. Prime Serjeant D—s prefaced the motion with mentioning the heinousness of the offence, and the insult it conveyed to the court, as the abuse was given almost within the hearing of the judges. He was followed by the S—r G—l, Mr. Serjeant C—r, Serjeant C—n, and councillor H—n, who all with the greatest delicacy delivered their sentiments, and concluded with saying, that the court could not avoid granting the information. A pause of a few moments ensued, and then Mr. P—st arose. He acknowledged that his passions were heated, and that he was sorry for what had happened, but he said in his defence, that he had been grossly insulted by another person. Lord A—y wished that the matter might be settled amicably, gave the P—st four days to answer the affidavit.

May 5.] On Monday the Court of King's Bench heard council in support of an affidavit made by the right hon. the provost of Trinity College, to shew cause why the information should not be granted against him, which was moved for by the prime serjeant, on the affidavit made by the right hon. Philip Tidal, his majesty's attorney general and principal secretary of state. The pleadings on behalf of the provost not being finished on Monday, the further hearing was adjourned to the Wednesday following, when the arguments on both sides concluded. The principal points contended for, against granting the information, were that the provost did not mean to challenge the attorney general, that the words which passed between the two right hon. gentlemen were words common to lawyers on different sides of a question, and that as the attorney general did contradict the provost it was natural for the latter to say to the former, such conduct was ungentleman-like: that as to the provost calling the attorney general an old rascal and an old scoundrel, it appeared by the affidavit of the provost, that he did not recollect to have made use of both expressions, and that neither was made in the hearing of the attorney general: That as to the provost's telling the attorney general that "he should answer for the conduct of another person", and saying that "he, the attorney general, was to imagine that the provost had said, and then thought, every thing that was infamous of him, and that as he was an old man he would not use him ill", it appeared by such such expressions, particularly the latter, that the words did not imply or amount to the intention of a challenge, and that they could only be considered as an altercation which meant to go no farther than a little scolding, for as to the expression "you shall answer for this" all that was intended by it was, that the attorney general whom, the provost imagined to be the cause of an insult he received from another person, should be taught by such words to restrain the petulance of the other person over whom the provost imagined the attorney general had great influence. To support those opinions, to define how far the words implied a challenge, and how far they came within the cognizance of the court by way of information, numerous cases were quoted, and many ingenious arguments used, from all which the conclusions were rather sophistically drawn, that the information could not be granted, and that the only punishment which should follow was an attachment for the offence to the court, if the court considered what was said and done as an offence. To conclude, a very pathetic account of the provost's situation, his dignity in life, what he must suffer by this public animadversion on his conduct, and the cruelty of thus exposing the head of the University, in the presence of the students whose education were committed to his care, was given in a speech, rather calculated to move the passions than convince the understanding, by a young barrister, whom the bench could not avoid complimenting on the occasion, by declaring more than once, that "he spoke very well."—In reply to those arguments, the prime serjeant, as leading counsel for the attorney general, said, that the matter to be considered was confined within a narrow compass. Did the provost insult the attorney general? Did he say that the attorney general was an old rascal and a scoundrel? And did he tell the attorney general that he would make him answerable for the conduct of another person? If such words had passed, and as the provost did not deny but they did, no argument could define away their intention. The bench could not pretend to disbelieve in a judicial capacity, what as men they must both credit and understand—What was believed to be a challenge by every person out of court, must be construed in the same meaning by every person in court. He added, that the provost's calling the attorney general into another court from where the first insult was given, and there telling him "he was to think he (the provost) had said every thing infamous of him, and that he must answer for the conduct of the person who insulted the p—t", was a plain indication of a challenge, and intimated an intention to provoke the attorney general to single combat. He said the insult was gross as it was unprecedented, and he quoted many statutes which empowered the court to interfere, and which directed, that in cases where personal insults were given, particularly in the presence of the judges, the mode of seeking justice was by way of information; and he added, that such mode was in such cases neither arbitrary nor unconstitutional. He said, had he known that the gentlemen concerned for the provost intended to have put their right hon. client ipse petitiōis, and rest his defence upon the words spoken having amounted to no more than a challenge to scold, he would have advised his right hon. client to have applied not for an information but a ducking-stool. He lamented with the gentleman who spoke last, the situation of the provost, but he denied that his being the head of our University was any argument in his favour. He said that his enjoying that great trust, in the present case, was one of the strongest circumstances against him: For that as he had, under his immediate government, the care of the rising generation, whose morals were to be formed by example, every deviation from the rule of right in the master, was a precedent of evil to the scholar; That should the bench refuse to grant the information, it was not improbable, but that on a future day, the students, copying from their principal preceptor, might give challenges to each other; and that if the matter came into the King's Bench afterwards, the aggressors would quote as a precedent in their justification to the bench, that an information was moved for in a similar case against their provost, and that as it was not considered criminal in the head of the University, it would be contrary to justice to make it guilt in the members of the same body. He concluded with affirming, that the bench could not refuse to grant the information. The solicitor general then rose on the same side, but the bench said, that the arguments already used appeared sufficient, and that if they had any doubt unsatisfied, they would hear further council on Friday, when they intended to deliver their opinion. There remained seventeen council to speak in behalf of the attorney general's motion, among whom were the first men at the bar.

On Friday, the 9th the court were prepared to give judgment on the application by Mr. attorney general against the provost, for a rule to shew cause why an information should not issue against the defendant.

The provost arose, and, in a most masterly and eloquent manner, spoke to the following effect:—He said, he requested to have the indulgence of the court to say a few words; that he did not claim or desire it, from any idea that he could add force to the generous and able arguments of the gentlemen who had spoken in his favour—but (says he) "I am charged and arraigned with having insulted this court, with having given a bad example to the seminary where I have the honour to preside." He said, that if he had not acknowledged his error, he would then stand blameable; but that this he had done on the first day of application, when he made every honourable concession to the professor. He was now to shew himself not culpable of the crime charged upon him; and he would observe upon the professor's affidavit, which sets forth, that the words spoken by him were a provocation to the breach of the peace. He said it was a principle as ancient as the time of Roll, that words, though they amounted to a provocation to break the peace, were not indictable; But that the words in the present case did not amount to that—for such words must convey either a direct challenge, or have such a tendency, as to make a man so apprehensive of his personal safety, as to break the peace in protesting it. That in the cases cited from Cro. Char. 498, Hobbs 120, there was a direct challenge; and the cases are not confined to words, but the words must go directly to a circumstantial and immediate breach of the peace. It was held by lord chief justice Holt, in 6 Mod., that indictments are not to be extended, which overturns a very remarkable case of the King against Dabry, where a justice of peace was called an ignorant blockhead, where the court held that the indictment should lie, "because," (says the judge) it was supporting that the King would appoint a blockhead to be a justice. He cited the Queen against Langley, and the Queen against Wrighton; and observed, that the doctrine of extending words was overturned at the dawn of the revolution, by that friend to liberty, lord chief justice Holt, who held that constructive offences shall not be extended to words. He said, that the principle upon which the present case must be determined was laid down in 1 Hawkins 135 and 12, Mod. 414, where, though there was an indirect provocation to fight, yet it was held an indictment would not lie. That he could not find in all the books a single case where an information had gone for constitutive words, and that if an indictment would not lie, an information could not be granted.

The principle is, there must be a direct challenge. In Showers's Parl. cases 15, the words spoken by the defendant were, "disaffected to government;" the inferior courts all held that the plaintiff could have an action upon these words, but the House of Lords held differently; and Showers, who was counsel for the appellant said, that calling a man a coward is not indictable or actionable, — and can there be a word more provoking? he added, that the rule laid down by Roll, that words were not indictable, had been confirmed by succeeding judges, persevered in by Holt, and that L. Hardwicke had been of the same opinion, for which he cited 2 Barnard, 105. He concluded this part of his argument with the most pathetic eloquence. "I repeat my concern, and acknowledge my indiscretion in using these words; but tho' there was an indiscretion, there was no crime." — The affidavit fairly states the fact, the words were intended only for the ear of the prosecutor's friend, not for his own; and where words are not direct and directed, they are not a subject for an indictment, of consequence not for an information. It appears that they were used by and escaped the defendant, in consequence of heat and altercation. They were spoken at different times, and words spoken at different times are not to be accumulated to constitute a crime. It happens that words of warmth have often escaped advocates; there is a recent instance in this court: one of the parties, he said, was dead, and he revered his memory; the other living, and he held him in the highest esteem. It was in the presence of the court — but the court interfered — the bar interfered — they embraced, and were friends.

He said, that he was not guilty of so great an indiscretion as that which was imputed to him by his enemies. That the words spoken in the court of Common Pleas were so private that they could not promote any confusion in the courts of judicature; that by the rules of law constructive crimes are not allowable; and it cannot be construed that the words "I am insulted by a person beneath my notice, — he is a retainer of your's, you must answer for him, and I must expect satisfaction from you," can amount to a challenge to fight. He said, that even supposing the words were written, their lordships could not grant an information; the rule laid down did not extend to it, and a court of law cannot suppose a constructive challenge; upon the common course of the words they do not imply fighting, and the attorney general's reply to the word answer, proves that he did not then take the word answer as a challenge; that the whole of the expression should be taken together, and then it would not amount to words conveying a challenge to fight. Whatever was positively sworn to by the plaintiff must in its verbal meaning be taken, if not contradicted by the defendant, as being only a part of the words spoken. The words were, "I will make you answerable;" then the words sworn to by the plaintiff are, that "I consider you as answerable." And there certainly was nothing in view but abusive language; for had fighting been in contemplation, he, the defendant, would have chosen another place. A duel was not to be supposed between the two oldest, and one of them the most experienced men at the bar, in high office, and in an advanced stage of life; the other, in a situation that makes his character as sacred as if clad in ermine or in cassock. He added, that if he forgot he was a provost, he would remember he was a father, and that should an involuntary word escape, "a tear from their lordship's humanity would wash it away." In his present situation, he said, that he had been obliged to submit to the greatest indignities, because he had the honour to be placed at the head of that learned seminary where he now presides. He observed, it had been urged that the right honourable gentleman's age should protect him from abusive words, which he allowed to be true, and, therefore, that it would much more protect him from a challenge. The right hon. gentleman, he said, had gone so far as to alledge that it was his (the provost's) intention to provoke him (the attorney general) to strike in the court, that thereby the attorney general might lose his right hand. He rested the strongest part of his defence, that the words he uttered proceeded from heat and resentment, occasioned by the highest provocation a gentleman could receive; that his mind was in the most violent agitation, in such a situation as would change murder into manslaughter; and that if the benignity of the laws gave to human frailty a favourable construction in criminal actions, it surely will not deny the same favours to simple words, and by wresting a meaning from each singly, torture them into crimes. He said that he was made a public spectacle in the College-hall, in the C — P — and in the court of K — B —; that an army of his former friends and brethren had arranged themselves against him, headed by his old lieutenant, who pointed his keenest weapon at his heart; that he was libelled in pamphlets, and hashed out into the public prints. He said, it was not the king's peace that was in danger, it was the peace of an honest man and an innocent cent family; but he was not vindictive, that he was ready to do justice to every man, and that if he was to fall a sacrifice he was ready to submit, though his conduct in the present case was not a subject for an information, and at most merited only the punishment of an attachment, and a binding to the peace. He quoted Hawk. 58 and 9. to prove what were understood as crimes in court; such as attacking a lawyer, a jurymen, or making an affray while the courts were sitting; but that an information was quite contrary to law in such cases; and to strengthen this assertion, he mentioned the case of the Queen against Rogers, 1 Lev. 1, or 558. As to the words being spoken in court, if in the first instance they amount to an offence, then he allowed their being said in court was an aggravation of that offence; but that if they are not a crime within the walls, they certainly are not a crime without the walls. It had been said he might demur, but he hoped the courts would give the most benign construction to the words which had been rashly spoken, and that they would not say, "we have our doubts, and therefore will have a more solemn hearing," for a more solemn hearing than the present this affair could never have. In criminal cases he said, that the whole of the words spoken must be taken, and for an authority quoted Wilkes's case in Bur. He added, that the question is to the law, whether the words amount to a crime or not, and that a jury have nothing to say to it. A rule is laid down (in Hawk.) that where there is an application for an information, and there appears a perseverance in persecuting, it should be refused. The present affair, he said, was no more than that two old men had a bickering, and the one of them made an apology to the other; the motion, therefore, could not be from motives of private reparation—it could not be from motives of public justice. He said, that he had made the most diligent searches, but could not find any authority or instance where an information was granted for words constructively provoking to fight, excepting where they tended to an immediate breach of the peace. He made use of a supposition, that if the rule had been laid down in an act of parliament, that an information should go for provoking to fight, the bench would not by inference, or an extension of this rule, construe these words as amounting to a challenge. It is said, that words between persons of high rank may amount to a challenge which words between persons of lower rank would not be considered in that light; but in Hob. 120. Lord Percy's quality was not taken in that sense, for the common law considers words to a privy counsellor the same as to a common person; actions indeed differ, and they may receive an aggravation from the place where they happen, but that, as mentioned by Hawk. extends only to affrays, and where words are made criminal by actions; and the places specified are churches and church-yards. It is true, by Cro. Eliz. 405, what happens in courts of justice happens before the court; but he hoped that the bench would not say, that when two rivals are met, a warm expression shall have that severe construction.—The court, after hearing the Provost, thought proper to adjourn until the next day, mentioning that they would then declare their opinion, which opinion will be given at large in our next.

Sligo, April 15. We learn from Balinrobe in the county Mayo, that the jail in that town was broke open a few nights ago, and every person therein set at liberty, by a gang of people lately associated in that county, who call themselves Peep of Day Boys. The captain, or head of them, was apprehended and lodged in said jail some time since, and tried at the last assizes, when he was found guilty of said offence, and sentenced to be whipped and imprisoned; in consequence of which, it is thought they committed that act of daring outrage, it having happened the night previous to the day on which he was to receive his punishment.

Tuam, April 21. Early last Saturday morning, Conneely, condemned last assizes, for the murder of James Brian a travelling pedlar, was taken from the county goal, by the high sheriff, attended by the constables of the county, and a party of the army, and hanged at Oughterard, pursuant to his sentence. He was near 60 years old, met his fate with great indifference, and denied the fact to the last.

The hangman, on this occasion, turned the solemnity of the scene, into a ludicrous one. His head was dressed in the highest female ton, to cover the rags and infamy of his occupation; and the tete, curls, lappets, ribbons, and all the towering honours, which render the appearance of our fashionable ladies so formidable, were gibbeted by this grim journeyman of death, as a monument of female taste, and modern finery.

Corke, May, 5. A valuable discovery has lately been made near this city, in a lime-stone quarry, on the Black Rock road, a prodigious number of precious stones have been dug up, many of which, it is expected will prove nearly equal in value to diamonds; some amethysts have likewise been found, and most part will cut glass equal to the best diamond. The populace resorted there in such numbers, to profit by the discovery, that the proprietor was obliged to procure a military guard to prevent their depredations.

Clannell, May 5. Edmond Grady, who at the Spring assizes, 1776, was tried and found guilty of a rape committed on the body of Mary Donohue in Nenagh, and was sentenced to be executed, for which he was hanged the 27th of April, 1776, but came to life again, was last Saturday executed in the street facing the jail door. The sheriff gave previous directions to the hangman, not to attempt cutting Grady down till such time as he gave orders, and accordingly he hung for an hour and five minutes. He declared his innocence as to the fact of having committed the rape, but acknowledged his having been aiding and assisting them who had done it: and just before turned off, mentioned a person's name, who had not been spoken of before, whom he said was a principal in committing the rape, abuse on her person, &c.

Among the additional taxes talked of to raise the supplies for the two ensuing years, it is laid there there will be a duty on hounds and horses of pleasure. It being but equitable that the luxuries as well as the necessities of life should pay a proportion to the exigencies of state.

A bill, we hear, is to be brought into parliament next session, to regulate the gaols in this kingdom, and by which, among other matters, a man acquitted will not be liable to fees, and a stated salary will be allowed the gaolers in lieu of their present unjust mode of exacting perquisites. It is really cruel that an innocent man, who has been acquitted by his country, should, because of his poverty, be remanded to prison, and there remain until he is able to collect as much money as will satisfy his gaoler.

The grand jury of the county of Kilkenny have instructed their representatives in Parliament to oppose a land-tax, should such be introduced for the concurrence of parliament, and the representatives have promised farther instructions. This early precaution, though it may hereafter be unnecessary, yet it is a provision against a national bill that should be made by every county, city and borough in this kingdom.

We hear from Liverpool, that a black woman servant, lately purchased at Benin, on the coast of Guinea, by the master of a vessel belonging to that port, whom he had entertained as a mistress, after the sale of his other slaves, at Barbadoes, finding her lover married, resolved to be revenged, and in a fit of jealous despair, gave poison to him, his wife and two children, but afterwards confessed the crime.—A physician was sent for, and the proper antidotes administered time enough to save the man and woman, and one of the children, but the other died in great agonies. The unhappy wretch was committed to prison, but became raving mad, and continues an equal object of horror and compassion, and a dreadful example of the fatal effects of indulging the most capital of all unruly desires,—envy and revenge.

Thursday the 1st inst. Kennedy the comrade of the late M Cann, the robber, was executed at the Gallows-green of Naas, pursuant to his sentence; prior to which he made several important discoveries of various robberies committed in this city and interior parts of the country, by him and his associates, to an amazing amount, in consequence of which the duke of Leinster (with his usual attention and vigilance for the public good) visited the shops of certain silversmiths, to enquire after stolen plate, alledged by the confession of the criminal to have been purchased by them under value, amounting to a very considerable sum of money, which remain unpaid to this culprit and his abettors.—Our correspondent hath not as yet favoured us with the result of this interesting enquiry; but as we have reason to depend on the authority of our intelligence, and as the receiving or purchasing of stolen goods is a crime of the blackest dye, that renders the property of every individual insecure, it is hoped that his grace of Leinster will record (among the many) a further instance of his public regard for the citizens, and protection of their property, by directing such legal modes of prosecution to be instituted against those receivers, as may bring them to exemplary justice, even though they should be ranked under the false denomination of respectable citizens; or procure dignified influence to shield them from public punishment:—yet the welfare and safety of the community, ought to overturn every private consideration, and in this criminal transaction, resist the feelings of humanity and compassion.

Saturday se'nnight John Hurley, otherwise capt. Fearnot, and Owen Sullivan, otherwise capt. Thunderbolt, were executed near Roscarberry, in the county of Corke, pursuant to their sentence.

Extract of a letter from Rome, dated April 12.

The following event happened in the anti-chamber of the Vatican last Wednesday, viz.

Two pilgrims came to the abovementioned room, and asked permission of the Swiss guards and servants to stay there, till the Pope, whose feet they wished to kiss, should come out of the palace, which was granted according to custom. Some moments after, when the chamberlains opened the doors for the Pope to come out, the two pilgrims advanced a little, and at the same instant a person dressed like a hermit passed through the door of the hall, and acting the idiot, wanted to press through into the anti-chamber, which the guards and servants prevented. The hermit then began to use violence, but being again repelled, he said in a sort of Polish jargon, that he wanted to kiss the Pope's feet; and immediately advanced to the second anti-chamber, where only the prelates and people of rank are admitted. The guards seeing the insolence of the hermit, followed him, and with the help of the servants forced him out, and at the same time drove away the two pilgrims, who seemed to intercede for the hermit, as if through compassion. In the tumult one of the Swiss guards felt an almost insensible puncture in his side, which he did not then take notice of, but about half an hour after the Pope had passed to the church of St. Peter, the soldier found himself very ill, and was carried to his quarters, when he was discovered to be pierced in his side with a very small instrument, which rather raised some suspicions, and the whole affair was told to the Majordomo, who ordered the pilgrims and the hermit to be immediately taken up; the former were seized the next day, but it was some time before they could find the hermit, which they at last did, notwithstanding he had changed his dress, and cut off his beard, and they are all three now confined in prison. They found upon the hermit a small case, which contained a still-letto, which, by means of a strong spring, would fly out and back again immediately. These prisoners have been examined, and are to be tried. The wounded soldier is at the last extremity, although nothing has been spared to recover him, but all without any efficacy, as the point of the instrument with which he was wounded was so strongly poisoned that a wound with it must be incurable.

This event has alarmed the Pope very much, as there is all the reason in the world to believe, that it was intended against him, and has called to his mind the discovery made of the cannon at the castle of St. Angelo being charged without any person being able to find out who did it, which event actually happened, although the court of Rome have done all they they could to made people believe it was not true.

The managers of Covent-garden theatre having filed a bill in the Court of Chancery here against the managers of the new theatre in Fishamble-street, and having on Wednesday, April 23, by their council made a motion that an injunction might be granted to prevent the opera of "The Duenna, or Double Elopement," from being printed, published, or acted by the said managers, and their company, the same was argued by the following council: On behalf of the English managers, Mr. Prime Serjeant, Mr. Recorder, counsellors Burgh and Radcliffe; and on the part of the Irish managers, Mr. Solicitor General, counsellors Yelverton, Wallace, and Caldbeck. The arguments in defence of the Irish managers (in particular by Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Yelverton) were nervous, conclusive, and beautifully imagined; they were such as did honour to the speakers, both as lawyers and orators. The right of performing on the stage this remarkable opera, as it was obtained by the managers of the new theatre, was fully and clearly proved—any man having an authority to repeat that which was already made public, and the exhibiting a piece on a stage being no more than a repetition of it. The arguments began on Wednesday morning, and were finished on Thursday, about one o'clock; when the Lord Chancellor delivered it as his opinion, that an injunction could not be granted against the managers of the new theatre, to prevent their performing the Duenna.

This Magazine is adorned with a striking Likeness of Mr. Henry Woodward in his favourite Character of Captain Bobadil, in the Comedy of Every Man in his Humour. GEORGE THE FIRST.

GEORGE the First was an honest, dull German gentleman, as unfit as unwilling to act the part of a King, which is, to shine and oppress. Lazy and inactive even in his pleasures; which were therefore lowly sensual. He was coolly intrepid, and indolently benevolent. He was diffident of his own parts, which made him speak little in public, and prefer in his social, which were his favourite, hours, the company of wags and buffoons. Even his mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, with whom he passed most of his time, and who had all influence over him, was very little above an idiot. Importance could alone make him act, and then only to get rid of it. His views and affections were singly confined to the narrow compass of his electorate—England was too big for him.—If he had nothing great as a King, he had nothing bad as a man—and if he does not adorn, at least he will not stain the annals of his country. In private life he would have been loved and esteemed as a good citizen, a good friend, and a good neighbour.—Happy were it for Europe, happy for the world, if there were not greater Kings in it!

Review of the Character of George the First.

THE character of George the First, as it is drawn by the noble writer, does not by any means exhibit a good likeness of that Monarch.—It is rather an imperfect sketch, a bare outline, than a picture resembling the original.

To call a Prince a dull German, is but a clumsy way of writing, and not to be expected from the man who had sacrificed to the Graces.

The abilities of George the First were not brilliant, it is confessed; but no man will presume to say they were contemptible. His behaviour during the four last years of queen Anne's reign, when she was in the hands of Tory ministers, was equally prudent and generous; while he supported measures which might tend to secure his succession to the throne of Great Britain, he utterly discountenanced such violent

olent counsels as were offensive to the reigning Prince: he rejected, with indignation, a scheme planned by the Whigs, to borrow money at five per cent. with a view to secure votes, by bribing the members of both houses of parliament. It was his great unhappiness, to be unacquainted with our language and our laws: and it is to be lamented that, when upon the death of the Duke of Gloucester the crown was settled upon the Brunswick Family, no care was taken to instruct the Elector and his son in both. They came strangers into the kingdom; and, I had almost said, they died such.

Addison, about a fortnight before his death, and when his illness gave him a near prospect of the grave, in a letter to secretary Craggs, styles George the First, "the most amiable monarch that ever filled a throne *."

If integrity and sensibility could give him a title to that character, he certainly deserved it.

Upon his accession to the crown, he cautioned his ministers not to suffer him to pass laws that were detrimental to the subject; for he was determined, he said, to maintain all legal sanctions.

He was extremely susceptible of friendship. The death of the Earl of Halifax affected him very much. The great abilities, open warmth of temper, and noble spirit, of Earl Stanhope, had rendered him very dear to this Prince. The King was at supper when the unexpected news of his death was brought to him; he rose up immediately, burst into tears, and left the company.

Lord Chesterfield must have never understood or felt the power which a woman has over the greatest and wisest of men, when he reproaches George with being governed by the Dutchess of Kendall, whom he politely styles, an idiot†.

Though the King's general character was that of good-nature, upon just occasions, he could give a severe and pertinent reproof. When Bishop Atterbury told him, at the time of the first Scotch rebellion, that he was sorry to acquaint his Majesty the rebels had made a considerable progress; he replied, "I fear the rebels as little, my Lord, as you do Jesus Christ."

George the first was easy of access, pleasing in his manner, and graceful in his deportment.—The dignity of his person rendered him exceedingly proper for the centre of a drawing-room. The few who can now remember his behaviour in the circle, will call to mind a most pleasing picture of a condescending and benevolent mind.

An enlightened foreigner * assures us, it was this Monarch's maxim, "Never to abandon his friends; to render justice to all the world; and to fear no one."

QUEEN CAROLINE.

QUEEN Caroline had lively, pretty parts, a quick conception, and some degree of female knowledge; and would have been an agreeable woman in social, if she had not aimed at being a great one, in public life. She had the graces that adorn the former, but neither the strength of parts, nor the judgment necessary for the latter. She professed art, instead of concealing it, and valued herself upon her skill in simulation and dissimulation, by which she made herself many enemies, and not one friend, even amongst the nearest to her person. She loved money, but could occasionally part with it, especially to men of learning, whose patronage she affected. She often conversed with them, and bewildered herself in their metaphysical disputes, which neither she nor they themselves understood. Cunning and perfidy were the means she made use of in business—as all women do—for want of better. She shewed her art the most in her management of the King, whom she governed absolutely, by a seeming complaisance and obedience to all his humours—she even favoured and promoted his gallantries. She had a dangerous ambition, for it was attended with courage, and if she had lived much longer might have proved fatal, either to herself or to the constitution. After puzzling herself in all the whimsies and fantastical speculations of different sects, she fixed ultimately in Deism, believing a future state.—She died with great resolution and intrepidity, of a very painful distemper, and under some cruel operations.

Upon the whole, the Agreeable Woman was liked by most people, but the Queen was neither esteemed, beloved, nor trusted by any body but the King.

Review of the Character of Queen Caroline.

THE character of queen Caroline is written by lord C. without regard to decency or truth.—Princes, who are continually surrounded by the artful and rapacious, the ambitious and the deceitful, may be cautious without being liable to censure; nay, they may be justified in the practice of that dissimulation which a father recommends so earnestly to his son, as a necessary part of his conduct in life.

Caroline had the good sense to perceive, that one ingredient was necessary in her behaviour, which she saw the king her husband utterly incapable of putting in practice, popularity; she neglected no methods to ingratiate herself with all ranks of people: with the nobility she was familiar; she patronized the learned, and was affable and condescending to the meanest. Some affectation I will grant there was, in pretending to understand the metaphysics of Leibnitz and Clarke, whose letters passed through her hands; but I heartily wish princes had no worse passions than such as proceed from the love of fame. The King had himself so little taste for the polite arts, as to think Hogarth overpaid with the magnificent present of a guinea for his incomparable March to Finchley. It was incumbent on the Queen to supply that deficiency in her royal comfort.

She understood more of the doctrines peculiar to the several sects of religion, than generally falls to the knowledge of persons in high station; and would condescendingly converse with the different sectaries in their own way. When, in her walks at Hampton-court, or Kensington, she met with the lowest class of people, she obligingly asked them questions relating to their stations in life, and answered their honest salute of, God bless your Majesty! in the same stile of, Godda blessa you, honest man! The delicacy of a Lord Chesterfield may be offended with such arts in a Queen, at the same time that he justified them by his own behaviour whenever he had the least point to gain.

To Queen Caroline the people of England owed the satisfaction of seeing the Royal Family dine in public; a gratification which was both pleasing and popular; and, what is more, it cost nothing. However, this custom has unaccountably been discontinued by a condescending Prince, father of a numerous and amiable offspring.

It was vulgarly said, that she was covetous; but her general conduct ought to have prevented so unjust a charge. Her large and constant donations to the necessitous prove the benevolence of her disposition, and the extensiveness of her charity.

The charge of ambition, which the Characterizer says might, had she lived, have been dangerous to herself or the constitution, is surely not well founded.

If the Queen governed the King, it cannot be denied that she herself was as much under the direction of Sir Robert Walpole, whose political principles, this noble writer himself affirms, were not adverse to the constitution.

It is astonishing so polite a man should descend to the vilest scandal. He flatly charges the Queen with promoting the King's gallantries. That she did not violently or imprudently oppose what she could not prevent, was a proof of her good sense. But that she ever stooped to the infamous office of a procurer, none but a mind equally corrupt and uninformed would insinuate.

Pope, who, to gratify the ridiculous pride and passions of Swift, impertinently refused Queen Caroline's visits, in summing up her character, pays her that tribute which she truly deserved. He affirms, that all about her most sincerely lamented her death. More need not be said in vindication of her character; for those who are beloved by their domestics, want no other panegyrick. She died of a disemper, which her delicacy would not permit her to reveal*.

Her refusing to see Frederick Prince of Wales in her last illness, may possibly deserve some censure; but the Queen, who was the most submissive wife in the world, made the Prince's obedience to his father's will the condition of granting his request.

English Theatre.

Drury-lane.

ON Monday, April 28, a new Prelude, called A Bundle of Prologues, was performed at this Theatre, for the annual benefit of the Theatrical Fund.—When the curtain drew up, Mr. Bannister was discovered seated as President of a club of supposed pensioners upon the Theatrical Fund; around the table sat Mr. and Mrs. Davies, Mr. Moody, Mr. Parsons, Mrs. Bradshaw, and other performers, habited as veterans, and joining Mr. Tragedy Truncheon (the President) in a glass of gratitude to their benefactors the Public, for furnishing them with the means of thus comfortably enjoying themselves, when old age and infirmities had rendered them incapable of retaining their station in the theatre, and discharging the duties of their profession. As soon as the toast had gone round, the President called in some musical assistants, and was joined by two of his brethren in the following three-part song:

N O T E.

* A rupture.

B b b 2

When,

When, old boys, we are young,
 We are vigorous and strong;
 The fight of sweet beauty alarms us;
 But now that we are old,
 And our hearts growing cold,
 There's nought but good liquor that warms us.

Here is joy to each heart,
 That will rapture impart,
 And joy to our hearts who will give,
 boys;

Tho' our puffs slowly move,
 And we cannot live to love,
 Yet, still we love to laugh and live, boys!

This over, the President called on the several members of the club to rehearse what they intended to say to the Public on the night of their annual benefit. Mr. Quaver, Mrs. Ranter, Mrs. Stately, Mr. Smirk, and Patrick Boofely, followed the President's order, each delivering something humorous and pertinent to the occasion. As soon as they had ended their several prolocutory addresses, the President left his chair, and coming forward, began the following Vaudeville, the rest of the Performers bearing a bobby way of chorus.

MY brothers and sisters, of buskin and sock,

We now are not Actors, to feign and to mock;

We give you no passions,
 No humours and fashions,
 Save only our own native stock;

For the bounty with which you o'erflow,
 Makes the sweet plant of gratitude grow.

In our bosoms our merry hearts leap,

We now are no Play'rs,
 But send up our pray'rs,

That the blessings you sow, you may reap.

My sisters and brothers who oft trod the stage,

Who now are declining with sickness and age,

You see now before ye,
 The charms that restore ye,

[To the Audience.

Whose bounty your griefs will assuage.

Tender beauty is fairest to view,
 As a rose is when sprinkled with dew.

The king and the cobbler, by turns was my lot,

I mended old soles, and wore crowns on this spot;

Whatever my station,
 Or high occupation,
 My duty I never forgot.

When a tyrant, with death in my stride,
 My dependance on you was my pride.

The above Prelude was said to be written by Mr. Garrick, and intended to serve as a substitute to his performance; but the receipts of the House have given the Managers of the Fund a melancholy proof that it was very inadequate to the design. It had a good deal of that familiar Wit, and that Knowledge of the Theatrical World, for which his Prologues and Epilogues have been distinguished; but it seems to have been the effect of a sudden thought, and not to have undergone a proper revival and correction.

On Thursday evening, May 8, a new Comedy, called The School for Scandal, was performed at this Theatre.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Sir Peter Teazle,	Mr. King.
Sir Oliver,	Mr. Yates.
Joseph and } Sir Oliver's	Mr. Palmer.
Charles Surface } Nephews,	Mr. Smith.
Rowley,	Mr. Aikin.
Crabtree,	Mr. Parsons.
Sir Benjamin Backbite,	Mr. Dodd.
Moses,	Mr. Baddeley
Snake,	Mr. Packer.
Trip,	Mr. Le Mash.
Careless, and Others, } Mr. Farren, Companions to Charles) } Mr. Norris,
	&c.
Lady Teazle,	Mrs. Abington.
Maria (Sir Peter's Ward)	Miss P. Hopkins
Lady Sneerwell,	Miss Sherry,
Mrs Candour,	Miss Pope.

Sir Peter Teazle is an old batchelor barronet, lately married to a young wife, educated wholly in the country, but rendered perpetually unhappy by the captivity of his own temper, so that, as he himself expresses it, he became 'the miserablest man alive before his friends had done wishing him joy.' He was left guardian to Surface and Charles while under age, and during the absence of their uncle Sir Oliver, who at the opening of the play is supposed not to be arrived from India. These young men are strongly contrasted characters; the eldest, Joseph Surface, a Man of Sentiment, anxious to be universally well spoken of, but a compleat Knave at heart: Charles, thoughtless and extravagant, careless of the world's opinion, but generous and humane in extreme. These brothers are both lovers of Maria; but the younger is preferred by her, though the badness of his character prevents her avowing it; while Sir Peter is a warm advocate for the elder, whom he admires extremely for his prudence and noble sentiments. The scandalous characters characters form and direct the intrigue and perplexities of the piece, without being principals in the plot. By their artifice and slander, Sir Peter has conceived a jealousy of Charles with Lady Teazle; whereas, in reality, Surface is endeavouring to pervert her, in order to smooth his way to Maria. By the manœuvres of Lady Sneerwell, (who is passionately in love with Charles), Maria also has broken with Charles, and believes him to be attached to Lady Sneerwell.

Thus matters stand on Sir Oliver's unexpected arrival: He proves to be of a very opposite temper to his old friend Sir Peter, and appears by no means inclined to give Charles up for his ill name, nor altogether pleased at the universal good report of Joseph, who he thinks has too good a character to be an honest fellow: He therefore determines (with the assistance of Rowley, a steward in the family) to make trial of their dispositions in person; in consequence of which he is introduced by Moses, a Jew, to Charles, as a broker, who is to raise money for him. Here he finds Charles in the full career of dissipation; is offered a post obit on his own life, and, in a burlesque auction, buys all his ancestors. He is enraged at the scene; when the little circumstance of Charles's refusing to sell his own (Sir Oliver's) picture, because he had been so much obliged to him, pleases the old fellow more than all his extravagance had offended him. He afterwards applies to Joseph in the character of a distressed relation of their mother's, and is treated with infinite politeness, but receives no assistance. Sir Peter, in the mean time, is thunderstruck at the discovery of his friend Joseph's treachery, to whose apartments he had come to unbosom himself on the subject of his jealousy of Charles. Lady Teazle is concealed in Surface's room at the time Charles calls. Sir Peter forces his friend Joseph to let Charles in, and retires himself to a closet, in order to hear his friend tax the brother on the heinousness of his attempting to make love to Lady Teazle. Surface is near being betrayed himself, and Sir Peter forced to appear, when, in the midst of many accumulated points of humour, and in as striking a situation as Comedy can produce, Lady Teazle is discovered. This is soon after followed by Sir Oliver's discovering himself to both his nephews at once. The Hypocrite is exposed, the Prodigal pardoned; Lady Sneerwell and her colleagues disappointed; Sir Peter and his lady reconciled; and the piece concludes with no impediment to Sir Charles and Maria's being happy together, and with at least a presumption of his reformation.

The School for Scandal is the production of Mr. R. B. Sheridan, and is an additional proof of that gentleman's great abilities as a dramatic writer. Nothing, therefore, could have been more seasonable than this Comedy, which, in point of execution, is equal, if not superior, to most of the plays produced for the last twenty years. The characters are drawn with a bold pencil, and coloured with warmth and spirit. The dialogue is easy, engaging, and witty. It abounds with strokes of pointed satire, and a rich vein of humour pervades the whole, rendering it equally interesting and entertaining. The fable is well conducted, and the incidents are managed with great judgment. Upon the whole, The School for Scandal justifies the very great and cordial reception it met with; it certainly is a good Comedy, and we should not at all wonder if it became as great a favourite as The Duenna, to which it is infinitely superior in point of sense, satire, and moral.

Covent-Garden.

On Friday, May 2, A new Interlude, called The Clock-Cafe, was performed at this Theatre, for the benefit of Mr. Wilson:—The scene is founded on the curiosity of Mrs. Square, a Free Mason's wife, who, wishing to get at the secret of masonry, conceals herself in a clock-cafe in the lodge, by the assistance of her servant, who is the tyler; but he informing the master, and the rest of his brethren of the plot, they at their meeting debate on the punishment due to those who should be found concealed in order to get at their sacred mystery; when they all agree, that the loss of the tongue is the smallest atonement that can be made for such an offence.—Mrs. Square having taken too much rappee, unfortunately sneezes, which gives the alarm, when a general search is made; in consequence of which she is discovered—brought forward in no small agitation, and the surgeon ordered up to deprive her of her tongue; but upon her entreaties, and the fullest assurances of her conjugal obedience in future, sentence is remitted, and the Interlude concludes with a grateful song and chorus addressed to the Audience.

On Tuesday, the 6th instant, a new Comic Opera, called the Device; or, the Marriage-Office; was performed here, said to be wrote by a Mr. Richards of Dean-street. This Opera, like most of the after-pieces produced on benefit nights, has little claim to a favourable report. The plan, as well as that of The Register-Office, afforded an opportunity for a man of humour and observation to have taken aim at fashionable folly with some success. The idea of ridiculing the Marriage-Office in Dover-street was, we imagined, to have furnished the Author with those strokes of humour such a wild scheme might have pointed out to him. The Author of The Device, however, has contented himself with barely stringing together a few airs, and making up a hodge-podge plot equally barren of wit and probability. Indeed, this Farrago of absurdity, divested of the smallest portion of merit, had no character, no poetry, but what a boy at Eton would have been corrected for. In the printed piece are several airs which are left out of the representation.

Haymarket Theatre.

On Thursday, May 15th, this Theatre was opened, under the direction of Mr. Colman, with a new Prologue written by the Manager, and spoken by Mr. Palmer, in which playhouses were very humorously compared to large shops—The winter Theatres to warehouses kept by merchants, who dealt in bale goods and heavy articles by wholesale; that in the Haymarket to a small shop, where lutestring silks and taffaties were retailed in the summer by a schemer, who, dramatically considered, might properly be termed “The smallest haberdasher of small wares.” After playing sportively with this idea, the Prologue gave a most laughable description of the pleasures peculiar to the different orders of the people in the summer; such as walking up Highgate-hill in the midst of the heat and dust, and stuffing calipash and calipee at a turtle-feast in the dog-days. It ended with a handsome compliment to Mr. Foote, and well imagined.

The Comedy of The English Merchant was then played with a very considerable degree of propriety, particularly by Mr. Palmer, the representative of Spatter, and a Mrs. Armistead, the new actress, who performed Amelia with that delicacy, tenderness, and right pride, so peculiarly accommodated to the character. The Comedy was followed by the Farce of Lilliput, which was greatly performed by a troop of little children; particularly the characters of the Fop, the Admiral, Lady Flimnap, and her friend. The little child also, who sung the air from The Waterman, though apparently not above three years old, gave proof of an excellent ear.

This farce has not been performed in London for some years. Its author, Mr. Garrick, has made an addition to it, by introducing a new scene, in which he has pursued his favourite game—(fashionable folly) with success, though not in a very new manner. He has also added some lines to the Prologue, and has introduced an air in the piece, all to the same purpose. The words of the air are these;

Sung by Miss Farren.

Oh, the Ton, the dear Ton!
We should all be undone,
Without charming Bon Ton!

By Ton, we superiors,
Stale custom repealing,
Resign to inferiors
The torment of feeling.
Oh, the Ton, &c.

More powerful than Nature's
Are Bon Ton's directions;
They screw up our features,
And mend our complexions.
No bugbears to fool us,
We lead all the fashions;
No husbands to rule us,
Our guides are her passions.
The Ton makes us flighty,
We are so put together;
How can we but light be,
All cork, wool, and feather?
Oh, the Ton, &c.

Vocal Part in the Pageant.
Of wine drain a fountain,
Each toss off a bumper,
To drink the man mountain
For sure he's a thumper!
We all must revere
So peerless a peer.

This little satire is rendered additionally pointed and laughable, from the happy idea on which Mr. Colman has planned his pageant. It now serves as a double shaft of ridicule—as a laugh at pageants and processions in general, and at the vices of the times in particular. The robes of the Nardics, or Nobles of Lilliput, resemble a pack of cards, and the procession commences with strewers of flowers, &c. who are followed by a herald, bearing a flag, on which is written in large characters, “The State of Lilliput; Highest, Lowest, Jack, and Game.” Then walk the nobles of one suit, who are followed by another herald, bearing a flag, on which is painted a Gaming-Table. After him, the nobles of another suit, then another herald, with an E. O. table, or some other gaming device; and so on, till at last Gulliver appears in the character of the Knave of Clubs under a rich canopy, and the procession does not close till something in ridicule of every modern species of gaming has been exhibited. Among other objects of the procession which provoked laughter, laughter, a mock profile of a fine lady, with an enormous high head, stuffed with wool, and a large cork rump, and a real lady with a tete stuck full of feathers, riding on an ostrich, with a bare rump, had a good effect.—The scenes are new and well suited to the piece, on which neither pains nor expence have been spared, and we must regret that the manager has been deprived, by his actors being engaged in playing Mr. Sheridan's School for Scandal, of the benefit likely to result from his abilities and industry. A most agreeable characteristic overture, containing variations on the infantine air of—Boys and Girls, come out to play! preceded the Farce.

The theatre itself is entirely new painted; the colours blue and white; and the whole has a very neat and pleasing appearance. The motto over the stage is happily chosen, Stet fortuna Domus!

We have spoken with much favour of the manager's opening his theatre, because we really think his efforts appear to deserve encouragement from the public: But let him observe the promise his Prologue gives us of "a Choice Assortment of slight Goods," or we shall not treat the heavy goods of the "Two Winter Warehouses" with more severity than that which we shall detect the impositions, if he should practise any, of the smallest Haberdasher of small Wares.

Carlisle-House.

On Monday evening, April 28, near a thousand persons assembled at Carlisle-house, in consequence of the summons which the directors of that fane had issued to the sons and daughters of Pleasure, and lovers of the midnight mirth.

The company, as it may naturally be supposed at an entertainment where money can procure admission, was composed of persons of every order, and many of them without order; there were, indeed, many more titles than have been lately present at these entertainments, but most of them males. The ladies did not seem to aspire at finery in their dresses as usual, but rather affected to be at their ease. The gentlemen also seemed mostly of the same way of thinking, for which reason the insipid domino clothed three-fourths of them.

Among the character masks were, a Greenlander in the dress of the country, which appeared to have been made there—an excellent Punch—a very good Teague, in a blanket, who kept up the mirth of the evening by singing several Irish songs in character—Don Quixote and Sancho Pancho—A Tiddy Doll, with his gingerbread-nuts, well hit off—a Mrs. Cole, dressed, and tolerably well supported —a Boniface, with his wife and daughter, &c.

To the Editor of the Hibernian Magazine.

I am one of your constant readers, that your ingenious correspondent Philomechanicus told you, would become your debtor, by your giving a place to his discourse, in recommendation of the study of mechanicks; and which you gave us in your last September Magazine, but which indeed I had overlooked until this week. My intent now is to solicit the favour of a place for the following essay, which I mean as a kind of sequel to Philomechanicus's subject, and for your encouragement, I shall not trouble you for any new engraving, as the same figure that he used, will serve my purpose also.

GEOMETRICUS MECHANICUS.

PHILOMECHANICUS has indeed given us an ingenious mechanical proof, that the superficial content of a circle, is equal to a parallelogram, whose length is equal to half the circumference of the circle, and breadth half the diameter, which doubtless, is in direct conformity with more abstruse mathematical deductions; and I beg leave to observe, that mechanical mensuration is the best manner yet invented for determining the length of the diameter, by means of the circumference; or the measure of the circumference by means of the diameter: this being a matter, that I think I may say, the mathematicians have given up as an impossible thing, that is to say, to determine with mathematical precision, the exact and certain proportion that really and truly exists, betwixt the diameter and circumference of the circle. They indeed pretend to determine it, betwixt certain bounds, which they deduce by means neither strictly mathematical, nor strictly mechanical; but in a manner composed of both ways hustled together, and then by an assumed authority over the mechanical geometrician, they dictate to him: the diameter to the circumference as 1 to 3. $\frac{1}{7}$ nearly, viz. a little more than 3.14, but not quite 3.15, and this serves generally well enough for practical use; and I confess that the mechanical geometrician can afford but a very small correction to this proportion, by experimental mensuration; but this is not the defect of the mechanical geometer, but rather the want of a real and proper subject to exercise his mechanical art upon; that is to say, a sufficient large extended plane circle, (that being the subject of our discourse) which subject is not to be found naturally existing visibly or palpably, and independent independent of meer ideal or imaginary existence, neither can it be mechanically produced agreeable to the ideal pattern in the intellect, and therefore is a subject only for meer intellectual mathematicks, and as such I shall endeavour to shew, that the diameter of a plane circle is to its circumference as 1 to 4.

Perhaps I may hereafter shew that the proportion of the diameter to the circumference of a real geometrical and mechanical circle is as 1 to 2, whereby it may be accounted for, why the accidental nearly medium struck out for practical use, has hitherto answered common purposes of mensuration pretty well.

To prove my present paradoxical proposition, I shall take for granted what is already demonstrated by others, and universally known and practised by mathematical and mechanical geometers, viz. that the superficial content of a globe, is equal to four times the area of the plane of a great circle of the same globe, equal also to half the circumference of the great circle multiplied by itself, that is squared. Wherefore if the circle in Philomechanicus's scheme be taken as the great circle of a globe, the superficies of that globe will be equal to four times the parallelogram I. H. F. A. consequently half the diameter is equal to one eighth of the circumference; and if the circumference be two, inches, yards, miles or any other denomination of dimension; the mathematical diameter of the great circle, or the imaginary axis of the globe is half one; or else mathematical demonstration does not amount to certainty, as the great and indeed respectable Mr. Locke supposed.

Now since I have daringly come so far behind the commodious screen of a fictitious signature, as to oppose such respectable authority, I shall not stop until I make further profession of my proestancy against any supreme authority set up in any of the sciences, except that of Faith; and therefore shall never spare opposing, even Euclid or the great Newton, until I can attain to a self conviction. This profession I hold to be the birth right of every Philomath, as well as

GEOMETRICUS MECHANICUS.

Anecdote of Joseph the II^d, the present Emperor of Germany.

A Young Neapolitan officer, who had entered into the military service, despairing of promotion in his own country so soon as he could wish, and attracted by the different favourable reports of the Austrian military arrangements, and the rewards given to deserving officers, determined to solicit the Empress Queen for a commission in her army. Accordingly, he posted to Vienna, with several commendatory letters from persons of condition. Having travelled some way in the Austrian territories, he put up at an inn where three foreigners had just arrived before him, with whom he asked permission to sup, which was readily granted. The three persons were Germans. To them our young adventurer, during the repast, related his history, and informed them of the object of his journey. One of the Germans, after having heard his story, told him: 'I believe, Sir, you have taken a wrong step; after so many years peace, and the great number of Austrian nobility unemployed, I see very little likelihood for a foreigner to gain promotion in the Austrian service.' The Neapolitan replied, that he was determined to pursue his plan; that he, nevertheless, felt very forcible reasons to discourage him; that, in effect, he could entertain but indifferent hopes, but that it was possible, when the Emperor saw him come with so free a will, he might be induced to do something in his favour to gain so zealous a soldier. He then told the Germans his condition and family, and mentioned also the persons whose recommendations he carried with him; when the traveller, whom he addressed, said: 'Very well, Sir, since nothing can prevail on you to decline your pursuit, I will give you a letter which will possibly be of some service: you will give it to General Lazcy.' The Neapolitan received the letter with thanks, and continued his route. On his arrival at Vienna, he waited on General Lazcy, to whom he gave all his letters of recommendation, except that given him by the traveller, which he had mislaid. The General, after having read them, told him he was very much concerned that he could not be of any service to him, and that it was impossible to comply with his request. The Neapolitan was by no means discouraged by this answer; he assiduously made his daily court to the General, who always received him politely, but never encouraged his hopes. At last, our young hero found the traveller's letter, and presented it to the General on the first visit he afterwards made, at the same time telling him the manner of his receiving it; that he thought it but of little importance, and relied more on the General's goodness than the traveller's recommendation. When the General opened it he appeared surprised, and, having read it, said to his visiter, 'Do you know the person who gave you this letter?' 'No,' replied the Neapolitan. 'It was the Emperor himself,' said the General; 'you asked a sub-lieutenancy, and he hath commanded me to make you a Lieutenant.'

PARAGUAY.

THE women of Chaco prick their faces, breasts, and arms, like the Moorish women of Africa and Spain; they are very robust, bring forth with great ease, and, as soon as delivered, bathe themselves and children in the next lake or river. They are treated by their husbands with great severity, because perhaps they are very much addicted to jealousy, and have no manner of tenderness for their children. They bury their dead on the very spot where they expire; and plant a javelin over the grave, fastening to it the skull of an enemy, especially of a Spaniard, if they can get one. They then remove from the place, and even avoid passing it, till the deceased is totally forgotten.

Paraguay is divided into several provinces, which take their names from the rivers that pass through it, and of which Paraguay and La Plata, properly so called, are the chief. Paraguay contains several towns, but none of any note besides Assumption, which is situated in $25^{\circ}. 11'$ according to the latest observations, at the conflux of the rivers Parana and Paraguay, and is a large, well built, and populous city. It was built by the Spaniards, anno 1538. The territory about it is exceeding rich and fruitful, and the air so temperate, that the trees are clothed with a constant delightful verdure.

La Plata sometimes denotes the whole of Paraguay, and sometimes only a part or province of it. In the latter sense it comprehends all that country bounded on the east and south-east by the Atlantic Ocean; on the south by Terra Magellanica; on the west by Tucuman; and on the north by the provinces of Paraguay Proper, and Parana. It takes its name from the great river La Plata, first discovered in 1515, by Juan Diaz de Solis; but denominated La Plata, by Sebastian Gabato, from the great quantity of the precious metals he procured from the adjacent inhabitants, imagining it was the produce of the country, though, in fact, they brought it from Peru.

This country lies between 32 and 37° . of south latitude. The climate is pleasant and healthy. Their winter is in May, June, and July, when the nights are indeed very cold, but the days moderately warm; the frost is neither violent nor lasting, and the snows very inconsiderable.

June, 1777.

The country consists mostly of plains of a vast extent, and exceeding rich soil, producing all sorts of European and American fruits, wheat, maize, cotton, sugar, honey, &c. and abounding with such excellent pastures, that the beasts brought hither from Spain are multiplied to such a degree, that they are all in common, no man claiming any property in them, but every man takes what he hath occasion for. The number of black cattle, especially, is so prodigious, that many thousands of them are killed merely for their hides, every time the ships go from Spain, and their carcases left to be devoured by wild beasts and birds of prey, which are also very numerous. Sometimes, when they cannot vend their hides, they will kill them for their tongues; and those who care not to be at the trouble to fetch them from the plains, may buy them for a trifle. There is a curious account in Lord Anson's voyage of the manner of hunting them on horseback; and of catching and killing them, by throwing a noose on their horns at full gallop, the horses being trained to the sport. Horses are no less numerous, and in common, like the other cattle; so that a man may have as many as he pleases for the catching, and of those that are already broke, one may buy some of the best, and of the true Spanish breed, for a piece of eight per head. Wild-fowl also is in great plenty here; partridges, in particular, are more numerous, and as large and tame as our hens; so that one may kill them with a stick. Their wheat makes the finest and whitest of bread; and, in a word, they seem to want for nothing here, especially the natives, but salt and fuel. The former the Spaniards have brought to them from other parts; and the latter they supply themselves with, by planting vast numbers of almond, peach, and other trees, which require no other trouble than putting the kernels into the ground, and by the next year, we are told, they begin to bear fruit. The return for European commodities is so great here, that it almost exceeds belief; an ordinary two-penny knife fetching a crown, and a gun of the value of ten or twelve shillings, twenty or thirty crowns, and so of the rest.

The river of Plate, rises in Peru, and receives a great many others in its course, the chief of which is the Paraguay. The water of it is said to be very clear and sweet, and to petrify wood, and contains such plenty and variety of fish, that the people catch great quantities of them without any other instrument than their hands.

C c c

It

It runs mostly to the south and south-east, and is navigable the greater part of its course by the largest vessels, and full of delightful islands. All along its banks are seen the most beautiful birds of all kinds: but it sometimes overflows the adjacent country to a great extent, and is infested by serpents of a prodigious bigness. From its junction with the Paraguay to its mouth is above two hundred leagues. The width of its mouth is said to be about seventy leagues. Before it falls into the Paraguay, it is called Panama.

Nuestra Sennora de Buenos Ayres, the capital of the province, taking its name from the pleasantness of the climate, was founded in 1535, under the direction of Pedro de Mendoza, at that time governor. It stands on a point called Cape Blanco, on the south side of the Plata, fronting a small river, in $34^{\circ} 34' 38''$ of south latitude, in a fine plain, rising by a gentle ascent from the river. Nothing can exceed the temperature of the air, the fertility of the soil, or the beautiful verdure, which overpreads the whole face of the country about this city, of which the inhabitants have an uninterrupted prospect, as far as the eye can reach. Buenos Ayres has straight broad streets, and is of a considerable extent, containing no less than three thousand houses, built mostly of chalk or brick. Here is a very handsome square, with a magnificent cathedral, and a castle, in which the governor holds his court, with a garrison of three thousand men. The Spaniards bring hither part of the treasures of Peru down the river, and ship them for Spain, with vast quantities of hides, and other commodities of this country. The river is here seven leagues in breadth, and navigable by any ship sixty leagues above the town, and no farther, by reason of a cataract.

Within the government of Buenos Ayres are three other towns, called Monte de Video, Corrientes, and Santa Fe.

C H I L I.

The viceroyalty of Peru extends not only over those vast countries within the jurisdiction of the audiences of Lima and Los Charcos, but those also in the audience of Chili.

Chili, taken in a large sense, reaches from the frontiers of Peru to the Straits of Magellan, the distance being three hundred and fifty leagues. These two kingdoms are separated by the district of Atacama, which extends eighty leagues between the province of the same name, being the last of Peru, and the valley of Copayapu, the first in Chili. Eastward, some parts of this kingdom terminate on the frontiers of Paraguay, properly so called; though some uninhabited deserts intervene, and others on the government of Buenos Ayres, or La Plata, properly so called; though between these are the pampas, or wide extended plains. Its western boundary is the South-Sea, extending nearly from 27° the latitude of Copayapu, to $53^{\circ} 30'$ south. But to confine ourselves to the true extent of this kingdom, as inhabited by the Spaniards, it begins at Copayapu, and terminates at the large island of Chiloe, the southern extremity of which is in 24° of south latitude; and its extent, from west to east, is the distance between the Cordillera, which is here of a stupendous height, and the coast of the South-Sea.

Chili lying south of the equator, the seasons are almost opposite to those in the northern hemisphere; but the face of the country, except on the coast, is beautiful, and the climate wholesome. On the east, the country is screened by the Andes; while, from the west, the air is cooled by the most refreshing sea-breezes. Along the coast of the Pacific Ocean, they enjoy not only a fine temperate air, but a clear serene heaven, most part of the year. Sometimes, indeed, the winds that blow from the mountains are exceeding sharp in winter; but, in general, this is one of the most comfortable climates in the world, being a medium between the intense heats of the torrid zone and the piercing colds of the frigid.

The Andes, being covered with snow great part of the year, supply the country with innumerable rivulets, which greatly contribute to its extraordinary fertility. There are many volcanos among these mountains, and the air is so sharp and subtle, that they cannot be passed without great danger. They run almost from one end of America to the other, beginning in Terra-Magellanica or Patagonia, and traversing the kingdom of Chili, the province of Buenos Ayres, the empire of Peru, the audience of Quito, the vast region of Terra-Firma, and then, contracting themselves, as it were, for a passage, at the Isthmus of Darien, widen again, and pass through the provinces and kingdoms of Nicaragua, Guatemala, Costa-Rica, Mexico, and others more to the northward. In Chili, they are said to be of such a vast height, that the Alps are no more than hillocks to them.

The soil of Chili, in general, is amazingly fertile, producing Indian and European corn, hemp, wine, fruits, and all the necessaries of life in the greatest abundance.

Mr. Rice sincerely wished that something might be devised to put a stop to so barbarous a practice; but as the bill proposed to lay a penalty on the hundred where the wreck happened, by way of indemnification, he could not consent to it, nor could he consent to it, though the money were to be raised on the county at large; but notwithstanding he was against the provisions of the bill, he was not averse to the intention, which was that of putting a stop to so great an evil. He should therefore be for sending the bill to a committee, that gentlemen might have time to consider of it. He presumed that nothing would answer the purpose better than pursuing some plan which might be the means of procuring early and timely information, but he would for his part never consent that the loss should be made good either by the county or the hundred.

Lord Mulgrave said, for the honour and reputation of the nation he would be almost for any bill which would promise to prevent such a scandalous practice; that when vice is become so flagrant, the only way to curb it is by punishments properly suited to the nature of the offence; that none would answer so well as compelling people by motives of mere interest to acts of humanity; that every man who lived in the hundred where the ship was wrecked, if the loss was to be made good by the hundred, would find an interest in protecting the wreck, for by so doing he would protect his own property; that this was the very reason why the hundred was compelled to make good robberies committed on the high-way, in order to make them more ready to assist in apprehending the offenders, or more active in discovering them.

Mr. Mackworth. As the whole House seemed to be agreed in the principle of the bill, he did not see how any gentlemen could consistently object to its being sent to a committee.

Mr. Serjeant Adair observed, that pecuniary temptations should be restrained by pecuniary punishments.

Mr. Harris said, it was directed against the innocent as well as the guilty, and it was a maxim in law, common sense, and morals, that it was always better that two guilty persons should escape, than one innocent person suffer. What was the rule here laid down? A few of the most profligate persons in a hundred were to profit by public rapine and plunder; and all the reputable industrious inhabitants, persons who abhorred the act as much as those really plundered, were to be made responsible for the loss.

Mr. Whitworth said, this country was the only civilized country under heaven where such outrages were permitted, without affording redress to the injured party.

Mr. Henniker said, he had a ship wrecked on the northern coast of England, where gentlemen in the neighbourhood gave every assistance in their power, but to very little purpose. He had another wrecked on the coast of the Mediterranean, where he had every thing returned that was saved, and when he offered a gratuity for the trouble, the answer was, "No, you have already lost enough in the loss of your ship, we will take nothing."

Mr. Wallace. Whatever our private virtue might be, we should at least assume the appearance of public virtue; for this was the only country in Europe, in which such inhuman practices were suffered, without public punishment, or public redress.

Sir George Saville painted, in strong colours, the inhumanity of rendering the miserable and wretched still more so. As to the hardship of punishing the innocent, the argument had the appearance of plausibility, and that was all; for no particular man had a right to complain, when they all were to feel the effects of the law indiscriminately, and that for public good, and private indemnification.

The Lord Mayor [Mr. Sazvbridge] said, it would be exceedingly cruel to make gentlemen pay for matters which it was not in their power to prevent. He observed, that the hon. gentleman who patronized the bill, had omitted Scotland in the bill; and the gentlemen of that country had retired, as not being interested; but he assured such as remained in the House, that if the present bill should pass, he had not a doubt but it was intended to take them in by including that country in a more general law, to be brought in at a more convenient occasion.

Lord Advocate of Scotland said, that every country in Europe had provided a remedy for this terrible calamity but these kingdoms.

Governor Pownall observed, that if the present bill was brought forward under any such idea, it was a total mistake through ignorance of the remedies which the laws with very severe penalties had provided against this most cruel and savage of all crimes. If these were not understood or not sufficient, a bill to explain and amend them was the proper method, in which he would readily give his assistance.

But

But he objected to the principle of this bill. It reasons, which is its principle, that because in many cases the county or hundred, which do not prevent certain crimes, or bring to punishment the perpetrators of them, are made liable to make good the damages incurred; so it is proper and just that in this case of plundering ships wrecked, they should likewise be made liable. In the first case, they have jurisdiction to prevent and punish, therefore it is proper. In this case, they have neither power nor jurisdiction, and therefore it would be both improper and unjust. The law hath put these matters under the jurisdiction of the courts of vice-admiralty. There are no divisions of counties or hundreds below low-water mark. It would be impossible to lay the facts. The jurisdiction would be impracticable; and the attempt to execute this law, should it pass, would confound all jurisdiction. There is no analogy in the case, though the principle of the bill proceeds on the supposed analogy. It is therefore a total misapplication of a very just and wise principle, to cases where it does not and cannot apply.

Mr. Van called it a black bill, and insisted that it might be productive of the grossest fraud and imposition.

Mr. Medley spoke to many instances in fact to the same purpose.

Mr. Burke said, when he moved for leave to bring in the bill, the House seemed to be almost unanimous; but now he perceived that gentlemen had changed their minds, he must submit; for he perceived the bell had rung the departing knell of his bill. He shewed from the French laws, what great advantages they had over ours, in respect of ships wrecked on their coasts. He observed, that gentlemen affected great caution in the present case, though it was well known we had laws enacted on the most trivial occasions. We had some against pulling a stake out of a hedge; others against touching paling; others, still more extraordinary, against disturbing a thorn. All those, according to the language held this day, were, it seems, of more consequence in the estimation of some gentlemen, than the destroying, pillaging, or purloining the cargo of a vessel worth several thousand pounds.

The question was put, and the House divided on the second reading, ayes, 43, noes 55.

The Lord Mayor [Mr. Sawbridge] moved, that a committee be appointed to enquire into the use which the commissioners of the admiralty have made of the power to grant licences to such ships or vessels as shall actually be retained in his Majesty's service; or to such ships or vessels as shall be laden with provisions for the use of his Majesty's fleets, armies, or garrisons, or for the use of the inhabitants of any town or place garrisoned or possessed by any of his Majesty's troops, given them by an act entitled, An act to prohibit all trade and intercourse with the colonies of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the three lower counties on Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. In support of his motion, he enumerated several species of goods sent under the authority of those licences, particularly woollen and linen cloths of all kinds and values, painters colours, leather, tin plates for tinnners work, sweet oil, &c. none of which he presumed, would be brought within the description of food, according to the obvious construction of the act, besides Scotch snuff, and abundance of other things.

Governor Johnstone seconded the motion. He said, it always had been the care of that House, to prevent monopolies of every kind. He quoted an act passed in the reign of Edward III. against the monopolies, and gave several instances of their ruinous and destructive effects, particularly in the reigns of Elizabeth, James, and Charles the First, during which times they were granted to the tools and emissaries of the court, and were the constant engine of court favouritism. He said, in Mr. Pelham's administration two persons were proceeded against with the most commendable rigour, one of them being obliged to fly the kingdom, and the other, Leheup, was removed from his places, and the Attorney General received directions from the House to prosecute him on the statute.

Lord North said, that two vessels only had sailed before the licences were recalled; for as soon as it was known at the admiralty that improper uses had been made of them, all those already granted were immediately superseded or altered. Applications, it is true, were first made to the admiralty; those applications were referred to the treasury-board, and in a few instances liberty was given to export more than provisions, but it was apparent on the best grounds.

Sir Grey Cooper said, that no application had been made to him for leave to transport port calves, or any other kind of live stock, for that any permission of that kind given, was purely on the idea of supplying the army in Boston with fresh provisions.

Mr. Buller (of the admiralty) defended the conduct of that board; said, that the few articles licensed for exportation were not objects of commerce, but only such as it was impossible for the troops to do without.

Lord North assured the House, he had no objection to the proposed enquiry; but he thought, if that should appear to be the sense of the House, he was of opinion that the matter should be taken into consideration of a committee of the whole House, rather than by a select or open committee out of it.

Agreed to be a committee of the whole House on the 8th of May.

Lord North by his Majesty's command, laid the following treaty before the House.

Translation of a Treaty between his Majesty and the Prince of Waldeck, signed at Arolsen, the 20th of April, 1776.

BE it known to those whom it may concern, that his Majesty the king of Great Britain having judged proper to accept of a body of infantry of the troops of his Most Serene Highness the reigning Prince of Waldeck, to be employed in the service of Great Britain, the high contracting parties have given their orders on this subject to their respective ministers, to wit, his Britannic Majesty to Colonel William Fancitt, Captain in the Guards; and the most serene prince of Waldeck to his Privy Councillor, and President of the Regency, Frederick Lewis Wierpert de Zerbit; who after the exchange of their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following articles.

Art. I. The said Most Serene Prince yields to his Britannic Majesty a corps of infantry of six hundred and seventy men, which shall be at the entire disposition of the King of Great Britain, to be employed in his service on the same footing as the other German troops both in Europe and in North America. The regiment shall moreover be provided with two pieces of field artillery, with two bombardiers, twelve gunners, and other attendants, and the train thereto belonging.

Art. II. The Most Serene Prince engages to equip this corps completely, and that it shall be ready to march, at the latest, on the 6th of May next. The said corps shall pass in review at the place of embarkation, before his Britannic Majesty's commissary.

Art. III. The Most Serene Prince engages to furnish the recruits annually. These recruits shall be delivered to his Britannic Majesty's commissary disciplined and completely equipped; his Most Serene Highness will do his utmost for the whole to arrive at the place of embarkation at the time which his Majesty shall appoint.

Art. IV. His Majesty's service and the preservation of the troops requiring that the commanding officers and subalterns should be perfectly skilled in the service, his Most Serene Highness shall take proper care in the choice of them.

Art. V. The Most Serene Prince engages to put this corps on the best footing possible; and no men shall be admitted therein but such as are fit for the field-service, and acknowledged as such by his Britannic Majesty's commissary.

Art. VI. This corps shall be furnished with tents and all necessary equipage.

Art. VII. The King grants to this corps the ordinary and extraordinary pay, as well as all the advantages in forage, winter-quarters, refreshment, &c. enjoyed by the Royal troops; and the Most Serene Prince engages to permit this corps to enjoy all the emoluments of pay which his Britannic Majesty allows them. The sick and wounded of the said corps shall be taken care of in the King's hospitals, and shall be treated in that respect as the troops of his Britannic Majesty; and the wounded not in a condition to serve, shall be transported into Europe, landed in some port on the Weser, and sent back to their own country at the King's expence.

ART. VIII. There shall be paid to his Most Serene Highness as levy-money, for each foot soldier as well as gunner, thirty crowns banco, the crown to be reckoned at fifty-three sols of Holland, one half of this money shall be paid in three weeks after the signature of this treaty, and the other half in two months after the signature.

ART. IX. According to custom three wounded men shall be reckoned as one man killed, a man killed shall be paid for at the rate of the levy-money. If it should happen that any company of this corps should be wholly or in part ruined or destroyed, or that the pieces of artillery or other effects with which it might be furnished, should be lost by accident, his Majesty the King of Great Britain shall cause the expence of the necessary recruits to be paid, as also the value of the said field pieces and effects, to re-establish this corps and its artillery immediately.

ART. X. The Most Serene Prince reserves to himself the nomination to the vacant employments, as well as the administration of justice. His Britannic Ma-jeſty will give orders to the commander in chief of the army in which this corps ſhall ſerve, that he does not require any extraordinary ſervices, or ſuch as are beyond its proportion with the reſt of the army; and when it ſhall ſerve with the Engliſh troops or other auxiliaries, the officers ſhall command (as the military ſervice requires of itſelf) according to their rank, and the ſeniority of their commiſſions, without making any diſtinction with regard to what corps they may belong, with which they ſhall ſerve in conjunction—The corps ſhall take the oath of fidelity to his Britanniſh Majeſty, without prejudice to that which they have taken to their own Sovereign.

ART. XI. All deſerters from the Waldeck regiment ſhall be faithfully and immediately given up wherever they may be found, in the places dependent on his Britanniſh Majeſty; and eſpecially, it ſhall not be permitted, as far as is poſſible, that any of the ſubjects whatſoever of his Moſt Serene Highneſs eſtabliſh themſelves in America without the conſent of their Sovereign.

ART. XII. The pay ſhall commence fifteen days before the march of this body of troops, and as ſoon as the troops have quitted their quarters to repair to the place of their deſtination, all the expence of their march and tranſport ſhall be at the charge of his Britanniſh Majeſty.

ART. XIII. His Britanniſh Majeſty ſhall grant to the Moſt Serene Prince, during all the time that this body of troops ſhall be in his Majeſty's pay, an annual ſubſidy of twenty five thouſand and fifty crowns banco: his Majeſty ſhall cauſe notice of the determination of the ſaid ſubſidy to be given a whole year before it ceafe to be paid, provided that ſuch notice ſhall not be given till after the return of the troops into the dominions of his Moſt Serene Highneſs.

This treaty ſhall be ratified by the high contracting parties, and the ratifications thereof ſhall be exchanged as ſoon as poſſible.

In teſtimony whereof, we the underſigned, by virtue of our full powers, have ſigned the preſent treaty, and have affixed thereto the ſeals of our arms. Done at Arolſen, this 20th of April, 1776.

Lord North preſented the following meſſage from his Majeſty.

GEORGE R.

His Majeſty, relying on the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful Commons, and conſidering, that, during the preſent troubles in North America, emergencies may ariſe, which may be of the utmoſt importance, and be attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences, if proper means ſhould not be immediately applied to prevent or defeat them, is deſirous that this Houſe will enable him to defray any extraordinary expences incurred, or to be incurred, on account of military ſervices, for the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-fix, and as the exigency of affairs may require. And his Majeſty having judged it expedient to iſſue his proclamation, in purſuance of an act of Parliament, paſſed in the fourteenth year of his reign, for calling in the remainder of the deficient gold coin, doubts not but that his faithful Commons will enable him to make good the charges which ſhall be incurred in this ſervice, and which cannot at this time be aſcertained.

Character of Lord Mansfield.

ACCORDING to the profeſſed plan of this eſſay, I am obliged to take up this Nobleman's political and parliamentary character in the year 1766. We find him, in the ſpring of that year, for the firſt time ſince his taking his ſeat in the Houſe of Lords, ſeparated from adminiſtration; and oppoſing the meaſures which were ſuppoſed to be conducted by the Marquis of Rockingham, then at the head of the treaſury. The queſtion on which his Lordſhip and ſeveral others, not ſuppoſed to be inimical to the general meaſures of Government, differed from the King's ſervants, was, on the propriety of the repeal of the ſtamp act. We do not recollect whether he openly or violently oppoſed the repeal; but he certainly voted againſt it. The celebrated proteſt, which followed the repeal, was ſaid to have been drawn up under his Lordſhip's immediate inſpection, and was looked upon at the time as one of the moſt able performances, in that way, ever entered in the records of Parliament. His uniform and ſteady conduct ever ſince, in the ſame line, leaves no doubt but he entirely approved of all the meaſures which ſoon after followed a change of miniſtry. In 1767 we find him ſupporting the port duties, propoſed in the other Houſe by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1770 we again find him ſupporting the partial repeal of thoſe duties, and continuing the duty on tea, the immediate immediate cause of all our present disputes. It is on this great ground of the measures relative to America, that we are enabled to decide on his Lordship's political character. His Lordship disapproved of the repeal of the stamp act, because he looked upon it to be a tacit relinquishing of the supreme authority of this country over America. When, therefore, Lord Rockingham and his friends went out, and left the declaratory law as a salvo for the honour and, as he imagined, deserted power of Great Britain, he united with administration, in thinking that the act for laying on the port duties would be the means of breathing a soul into the declaratory act, which, without it or some other species of acquiescence and active acknowledgment on the part of America, must remain lifeless, nugatory, and ineffectual; and when the duties on paper, painters colours, and glass, as being commodities of native manufacture, were found to be repugnant to the interests of commerce, he approved of the repeal of those particular duties. The other parts of his political conduct, so far as the same related to measures carried on in Parliament, seem to have rather proceeded from an uniform support of Government, than any particular sentiments of his own, unless connected with the system pursuing or meant to be pursued towards America. Among the latter were all the bills of coercion against America, in which the Quebec act may be well included. Those several measures he defended, as they presented themselves, so ably and particularly, nay, in some instances, so very minutely, as to enter into the defence of the grammatical construction of several of the clauses; that his opponents in argument frequently charged him with being the original framer and father of them; but this we cannot by any means suppose, his Lordship having repeatedly disclaimed in debate the least previous knowledge of their contents, or of having attended the business of the cabinet for a considerable time before the period here adverted to. We shall conclude the political character of this consummate statesman, by observing, that he has never yet deserted his principles; and that he has built all his arguments and reasonings, and drawn all his conclusions on this single supposition, that America has, from the beginning, aimed at independency; and that the farthest the people of that country will ever be prevailed upon to consent to but by force and compulsion, will be an acknowledgment of the personal supremacy of the King of Great Britain, detached in that instance from, and unconnected with, his Parliament.

His Lordship's abilities as a Parliamentary Speaker, require the hand of a master to do them justice. The writer, conscious of his own inability, therefore attempts only an hasty and incorrect sketch. His Lordship is certainly one of the greatest orators this country ever beheld. His powers of discrimination are equalled by none of his contemporaries. His memory is so tenacious and correct, that he scarcely or ever takes notes; and when he does, he seldom has recourse to them. His references to expressions which have fallen in the course of the debate, or his quotations from books, are so faithful, that they may be said to be repeated verbatim. The purposes to which he employs these amazing talents are still more extraordinary: if it be the weak part of his opponent's argument he refers to, he is sure to expose its fallacy, weakness, or absurdity, in the most poignant satire, or hold it up in the most ridiculous point of view. If, on the contrary, it be a point on which his adversaries lay their chief stress, he states the words correctly, collects their obvious meaning, considers the force of the several arguments that have or may be raised upon them, with a precision that would induce an auditor to almost suppose he had previously considered the whole, and thrown his thoughts upon paper on the subject; and that his speech was the result of this previous consideration. His judgment is no less found upon many occasions, than his genius is extensive and penetrating: for as he pours forth at pleasure strains of the most bewitching and persuasive oratory; so his dexterity in bringing every thing offered on the other side within a narrow compass, and either entirely defeating its intended effect, or breaking its force, is hardly credible, but by such as have heard him. On the other hand, his Lordship is often rather superficial, subtil, and persuasive, than solid, logical, and convincing. He is fond of sounds and appearances, and avails himself of his great oratoric powers, by courting the passions. No man knows better to direct his attack towards the preconceived prejudices of the majority of his auditors. He seems much more solicitous to persuade them that they are not acting wrong, than to convince them that they are acting right. His Lordship's genius seems to direct him this way; in short, the quickness and sensibility of his eye, the animation of his countenance, the sweetness and diversity of his voice, the graces, strength, and harmony of his elocution, all unite to render him the first orator in either House; but—sic transit gloria mundi—his voice, enunciation, enunciation, and spirits, to say no more, seem to be very sensibly on the decline ; the evening of his abilities, as well as of his life, begin to make their appearance at a distance, and his Lordship's most solid enjoyments will shortly be the consciousness of a life devoted to the interests of his country, and the happiness of human kind.

Character of Lord North.

THE political character of this nobleman, if given in detail, would furnish materials for a large volume. It would contain a history of the present civil war raging in America, and the several efficient measures which preceded and produced it. It would exhibit the true grounds of the struggle between a system designed to unite the legislative and executive powers of the state in one hand, and that species of civil government established at the Revolution, which supposes that government was established for the good of the community, taking in every description of men, from the first magistrate to the peasant ; that those who live under it have an interest in its wife, equitable, and prudent administration ; and that, having an interest in it, they have also a right commensurate to that interest, to watch, and, if necessary, to controul those who are intrusted with the direction of public affairs.—It would convey to the nation a just description of the several factions and knots of men, who have, to the disgrace of their repeated professions, to almost the annihilation of all public confidence, to a disbelief of all declarations and pretensions to true patriotism, delivered the strong-hold of government into the hands of those who have uniformly availed themselves of their strength and situation, in alternately awing, soothing, and, when circumstances made it necessary or opportunity served, in compelling the nation into a tame acquiescence under the first stages of arbitrary power. Were his lordship's political likeness to be accurately or fully delineated, the transactions now alluded to, as well as many others growing out of them, or connected with them, would be necessary to give the world a finished picture : but as we have neither time, ability, nor inclination to undertake so ungrateful and melancholy a task ; and, if we had, as we think with two celebrated noble orators, that this is not the season for detailed political disquisition ; that little remains to be said, and much to be done ; we shall confine our humble attempt to a loose sketch of our hero's character. We trust, however imperfect it may appear, that it will convey a faithful likeness, though a rough, unfinished one. Sure we are that our intentions are pure ; and that, if we fail in the execution, we shall have nothing to charge ourselves with on the ground of intentional partiality.

The first time our professed plan will permit us to take notice of his Lordship, was on the day that the once justly revered Pitt was created Earl of Chatham, and Lord Privy Seal—on the 2d of August, 1766. On the same day, according to the language of the red book of the Exchequer, Lord North was put to bed to the old woman * at the Pay-office, without any previous courtship, or indeed † knowledge of that venerable old lady. His Lordship having sat several years at the Treasury Board, where he was known to be industrious, laborious, and plodding ; and where he studied Cocker and Wingate's valuable treatises on arithmetic, and the surprising combinations between pounds, shillings, and pence, under that occult and profound Financier, the late Mr. George Grenville, the shining, flourishing, political ‡ Proteus whose commission bore equal date, and who was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, gave sterility § to barrenness, by calling our hero to his confidence, and putting himself under his Lordship's pupilage. Fame saith, that here our hero rendered the Junto most essential service, and paved the way to that elevated situation he now stands in.

Versatile Charles had talents for flourishing away a speech, and for flattering and misleading the House of Commons. He could write a pamphlet, or betray a connexion, and laugh at it. He could even mitigate the resentments of those he had the most highly offended ; and by a certain mixture of animal vivacity, highly seasoned with wit and good humour, he possessed the knack of disarming the very persons he had thus grossly betrayed. But in every other particular his talents were limited. He hated application, and despised the means of attaining useful knowledge. With such complexional abilities, accompanied with a variety of other circumstances, it is not at all to be wondered that he leaned on Lord North for assistance. He could entertain no jealousy of such a man, because fire and water were not, he knew, more contradictory in their nature. He looked upon his Lordship as an useful drudge, fit to be employed to some purposes; and this intercourse being known at Carleton-house, Charles's vanity was flattered; he liked to take the lead; he was detached from the ostensible Minister *, and from his First Commissioner † of the Treasury, with whom he was, by his post, more nearly connected. He differed from them in the Cabinet; and the House of Commons, by proper management, being predisposed, Charles in the Committee of Supply proposed that certain duties should be laid on tea, paper, painters colours, and glass, imported into America. When his colleagues remonstrated against the measure, he held out the House of Commons in terrorem against them; all resistance he declared was vain; for the House, he assured his principal, were united as one man; and were determined to compel America to contribute towards the support of their military establishment, as well as towards relieving the people of this country from part of the heavy burdens incurred in the protection and assistance of its Colonies during the late war.

Whether Lord North acted as a confidential adviser in this business, or whether he was the confidential medium, through which the Junto and Charles communicated with each other, in the beginning, there is little reason to doubt that his Lordship was oftener at the Treasury than the Pay-office; and infinitely more intimate with Charles Townshend than with his old spouse ‡ at the Horse-guards.

Charles lived out his year; pity it is that he had not died a year earlier, or had not been still living, to answer for the event of his wild and improvident schemes. What he had often in a ludicrous manner § foretold, came, however, to be exactly fulfilled; for before he was quite cold Lord North was appointed to succeed him in the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. As we do not mean to write an history, nor a life, we shall hasten to such parts of his Lordship's political and official conduct as more particularly drew the public attention, or are most intimately connected with the causes of the present unnatural civil war, which threatens the destruction of this powerful and extensive empire.

His Lordship, in the early persecution of Mr. Wilkes, having exerted himself so strenuously as to lay, in a great measure, the foundation of his future fortunes, it was expected, of course, that as Minister of the House of Commons he would confirm the happy presages formed of his talents and disposition in this line, by those who were the means of pushing him into so respectable a situation. His Lordship did not disappoint them; he surpassed even their highest and most sanguine expectations. The Cabinet * was his own, in spite of his principal †; and Wilkes was not only expelled, but incapacitated.

The time now approached, when an opportunity was given to his Lordship to smoothe the way to the post of First Minister. Charles Townshend's port duties were not so favourably received in America, as either their framer, or those who employed him, expected. If his Lordship had any part, at first or second hand, in urging or pressing Charles to that dangerous, and, we fear, ruinous measure, he acted under cover; but now, as Minister of the House of Commons, he could no longer dissemble or conceal his sentiments. The non-importation agreement entered into by the several Colonies, and a dispute with the province of Massachusetts's Bay relative to the quartering of the army, having greatly embarrassed Administration, two letters were written, which have been already sufficiently commented on. One of them was the circular letter, promising, that no more duties should be imposed on America, and that those laid on already should be repealed on commercial principles. This letter was certainly written with his Lordship's approbation and consent, he being then of the Cabinet, and Minister of the House of Commons. How then has he performed his promise, or fulfilled the engagement contained in that letter? By refusing to take off the duty on tea, when he moved for the repeal of the duties on paper, painters colours, and glafs; and giving the moſt full and confidential aſſurances to the country gentlemen in the beginning of the three laſt ſeſſions, in the Committee of Ways and Means; that taxes were expected from America; that they were the leading object of the preſent hoſtile meaſures; that we were not ſeeking a pepper-corn, but were contending for a ſubſtantial ſupport from America, towards lightening the intolerable burdens we now groan under, from the heavy debt incurred in defending, protecting, and ſecuring that country.

The laſt part of Lord Chatham's political farce was now to be played. The Cabinet on his Lordſhip's cloſet arrangement conſiſted of himſelf, the Duke of Grafton, the Lords Shelburne, Camden, and Charles Townſhend, Sir Charles Saunders, and General Conway. Now let us ſee how the mock-cabinet ſtood when the repeal of all the American duties was moved there in 1769.—Duke of Grafton, and Lords Camden, North, Weymouth, Rochford, Hillsborough, and Briſtol. Here we may well repeat the words of a certain noble Lord *, that ſcarce a ſecond plank of the veſſel originally launched was remaining when the noble Duke was out-voted in Cabinet, on a propoſal of a total repeal of the American Port duties; which fatal vote is the true and ſole cauſe of the preſent civil war.

The Firſt Lord of the Treafury at length took it in his head to do what both prudence and ſpirit had, in our opinion, long before diſtated. Finding in the winter 1769, that he was out-voted in Cabinet, on a propoſition of a total repeal of the American Port duties, and that it was ultimately determined to keep the duty on tea ſtanding, and that the meaſure in this form was to be ſubmitted to Parliament, his Grace reſigned, and made way for our hero. Accordingly, on the 5th of March, 1770, about ſix weeks after the noble Duke's reſignation, and his ſucceeding to the important poſt, juſt vacated, his Lordſhip moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal ſo much of an act paſſed in the ſeventh of his preſent Maſteſty, for levying duties on certain goods imported into America, as related to the duties impoſed by ſaid act on the importation of paper, painters colours, and glafs. In his introductory ſpeech on this occaſion, he cenſured, in very ſevere terms, the conduct of the Adminiſtration who deviſed the tax, obſerving, it was to the laſt degree abſurd to tax the manuſactures of Great Britain. As to the tea, that being an article of commerce, and as the consumers in the Colonies would continue to have it nine-pence a pound cheaper than before the paſſing of the law, he thought it very proper to have it continued. His Lordſhip was preſſed by many of his friends, as well as his oppoſers, to conſent to a total repeal; but he remained inflexible and unmoved; and after a very warm debate, he carried his motion for a partial repeal, by a majority of 204 againſt 142. This we look upon to be one of the blackeſt days Britain ever ſaw; a day which probably will be as memorable in the Britiſh annals, as ever the Ides of March were in thoſe of antient Rome. The motion on which the queſtion was put, was made by Governor Pownal, by way of amendment, in the following words, “ and on teas.”

His Lordſhip, however, had another opportunity to recover his ſenſes, or to endeavour to reſtore his employers to theirs; for Mr. Alderman Trecothick, on the 9th of April following, moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the American tea duty; but the noble Lord ſeeming averſe to it, one of the worthy corps of * King's friends moved the order of the day, which was carried by a majority of 80 to 52.

His Lordſhip choſe to defeat this laſt effort of the friends of their country, to prevent the evils with which we are at preſent encompassed, by a kind of play at parliamentary croſs purpoſes, and ended the whole with a joke. He inſiſted, in the firſt inſtance, that Mr. Pownal's amendment ought to have the weight of a formal motion; and conſequently that Mr. Trecothick's motion was premature, becauſe it was againſt a known rule of the Houſe, that any queſtion which had received a negative ſhould be brought in the ſame ſeſſion. The joke was entirely in the ſtile of his Lordſhip's other drolleries. Mr. Beckford (then Lord Mayor) perceiving that the Miniſtry were determined not to conſent to the motion, and only objected to the point of order to conceal their real intentions, hoped the noble Lord would conſent to a prorogation of the Parliament till after the holidays. “ Oh, (replied his Lordſhip in his truly Attic manner) I am glad to find that a prorogation will content the honourable gentleman;” alluding to the city petition, lately preſented, praying a diſſolution of Parliament.

Printers and the City Magistrates, rendered it still more so; but he surmounted all difficulties much better than was at first expected by his most sanguine friends.

The session of 1772 was distinguished by his carrying a most difficult point in the House of Commons, the royal marriage bill. This recommended him strongly to the Junto and his royal master, and procured him the red ribbon.

The session of 1773 was marked by his conducting the East India enquiry, and the bill for new modelling the affairs of the East India Company in Asia and Europe. He was strongly opposed in the cabinet on this measure; but by his perseverance and address he surmounted all the impediments thrown in his way. He had other persons blunders to answer for as well as his own, during this session. Lord Hillsborough having been imposed on by some mercenary planters in St. Vincent's, disposed of the Caribb Islands to the interested informants, which caused an insurrection.

We come now to the fatal period, in which the foundation of the ruin which at present threatens this seemingly devoted empire with destruction was laid; we mean the spring session 1774. The affairs of America had now continued for almost seven years in the greatest confusion. Our threats were set at defiance, our mere acts of governmental power were disregarded, our soothing words were despised, our promises were disbelieved: in fine, after making the King descend from his dignity; after Ministers had pledged themselves for the performance of what, according to the sound principles of the constitution, they would deserve to have suffered on a block for; after troops had been sent to bully the most refractory colonies into submission, and had been as precipitately withdrawn out of a regard to their personal safety; after their assemblies had been dissolved, to compel them to acquiesce in measures they were averse to, and again convened and permitted to sit, without any satisfaction given or promised; after an absolute act of parliament had been explained by an arbitrary vote of both Houses, as purporting * to contain a description of persons not then in being, and creating offences of high treason, by a constrained and unnatural interpretation of the law; in fine, after America had been in a manner cut off, and its affections estranged from this country for full seven years, and all regular government partly at an end, nothing was yet done. Administration seemed supine and negligent, in proportion to the magnitude and number of difficulties they had to encounter with. The riots, however, at Boston the preceding autumn, and the burning of the tea, at length roused a country gentleman †, who gave notice, that he would, on a certain day, move the House to resolve itself into a committee to take the affairs of America into consideration. Before that day arrived, his lordship saw the necessity of taking the enquiry out of the hands of opposition, who were then in possession of it; and who might possibly move some resolution it would be extremely embarrassing to get rid of: he therefore informed the House, that he would, on such a day, move the House for a committee for the same purpose.

On the day appointed his lordship moved several resolutions, on the first of which the Boston port bill was framed. His lordship supported that measure on positive assurances, that the East India Company would be indemnified for their tea that was destroyed; and that the whole affair would consequently drop. The next bill he brought in, was that for altering the charter of the province of Massachusetts Bay; he recommended this in the same manner. He assured the House, that the present bill was at the special request of the principal inhabitants, traders, and land-owners. Both these assurances proved ill-founded; his lordship was deceived, or purposely deceived parliament. The first measure was very ill received in America, but the second threw the people into a ferment little short of rebellion.

The session of 1775, or the first of the present parliament, was opened in a most extraordinary manner: the naval peace establishment was reduced 4000 men; and though we were informed, that general Gage was fortifying Boston Neck, in order to protect himself against hostilities, every thing appeared as tranquil in parliament as if nothing had happened in America. His lordship was a second time awakened from his deceitful slumbers; he accordingly produced some garbled extracts of mutilated letters, full of false or exaggerated facts, vague surmises, idle reports, and silly predictions, from the several tools and instruments of power on the spot. His lordship was, strange as it may appear, able to procure a majority of three to one; the navy was augmented 6000 men, and the army 4000; a string of penal bills were enacted, full of the most foolish, as well as the most barbarous policy; and his lordship closed his parliamentary campaign with assuring his friends and opponents repeatedly, that he would have an army of 10 or 12,000 men at Boston; that our friends in America were much more numerous than our enemies; but if we should be obliged to proceed to extremities, our force at Boston would be strong enough to compel obedience without striking a blow. His lordship was again grossly mistaken: for obedience was not compelled by fright, terror, or blows; we got as bad as we gave; and we threw away three millions of money at least, and several valuable lives, without bringing America * to our feet.

Well, the session of 1776 arrived. His Lordship confessed he was deceived, both in the strength of his adversaries, and the real disposition of his friends. He now disclaimed all thoughts of conquest and taxation. America must acknowledge the supremacy and commercial controul of this country; that was all he desired. This, however, not being highly relished by the friends of taxation, his lordship soon changed his mind; and by the time that he had led parliament too far to recede, he declared for taxation, and unconditional submission, in imitation of his noble and spirited coadjutor; and taking breath, during the Christmas holidays, led parliament a little farther, by taking 20,000 foreigners into British pay. With this formidable army of 70,000 land forces, and 80 ships and frigates of war, at an expence of 15 millions, including the home establishment, his lordship has, for the third time, pledged himself to parliament and the public, that America would be finally reduced at the close of the present campaign.—Whether that will be so or not, is not yet known; if this last prediction turns out true, we will readily allow him to be the greatest minister this country ever saw; should it turn out the contrary, then will we not hesitate to pronounce him the veriest and most confident bungler that was ever employed by providence as an instrument to scourge a credulous, degenerate, weak, and wicked nation.

It is difficult to speak of his lordship's political abilities with any degree of confidence or precision. If he be the mere puppet of the interior cabinet, the mere child of favouritism, it is impossible to try him fairly as a minister, acting on his own judgment; we must in that case consider him merely as possessed of good talents, but basely sacrificing them to the meanest and most sordid motives. Perhaps it may be said, his principles lead him that way; and his inclination and interest unite in urging him to promote the views and wishes of the prince, in preference to those of the people. Be it so: the question in that light is at an end. He cannot be a proper minister in a mixed or popular government, who would endeavour to give the first magistrate more power than is allowed by the constitution; or unite the executive and legislative powers of the state in the same person. On the other hand, supposing lord North to be really the minister, as much as Walpole, Pelham, or Pitt were severally when they bore the character (which we will as soon believe, till we receive some substantial proof of it, as that he is Mufti or Turkish High Priest) we can by no means allow him fitted either by nature, habit, or inclination, for so great and arduous an undertaking. It would be an invidious task to assign our reasons, nor would it be less tedious and disgusting. His lordship is, however, a man of sound judgment, well trained in business, of great parliamentary dexterity, and equalled by no man in Britain in plausibility, in a strong appearance of candour, in avoiding explanations in debate, and knowing how to recede from engagements without incurring a breach of promise. His enemies allow him no merit. This is merely the voice of party. His lordship was called to the helm at a most critical season, in a storm of faction or national resentment, call it which you please. He rode it out with great resolution, and no small degree of ministerial skill; and whether his conduct on that occasion may be imputed unto him as righteousness, there is little doubt that he encountered some perils, and many disagreeable circumstances; and, like an able pilot, brought the political bark safe into port.

Lord North is certainly a very able speaker. His judgment in conducting a debate is admirable. He is possessed of a vast fund of information, relative to almost every subject that comes under discussion. He has a prodigious sound, accurate memory; arranges his matter judiciously; and never fails to push the strongest part of his argument into the most conspicuous point of view. If he seldom produces any thing new himself, he has a peculiar knack at transferring other people's sentiments, both in print and debate, into his speeches, and that with so much art as not to be easily observed; and never fails to press his antagonists, where they are weakest, and least capable of resistance. But if he has many equals, and some superiors, in this line, there is one, in which he peculiarly and clearly excels all his cotemporaries in both Houses; that is, in reply. He receives ceives the attacks of his opponents frequently like an electric shock ; and after haranguing for an hour rather dully, he rises a second time, and levels his adversary in a few words, either in a flow of keen satire, or the most sound and pointed argument.—His Lordship's voice is extremely disagreeable, his elocution still worse, and his manner execrably awkward. He is frequently tedious and unintelligible, abounds in useless repetitions, and scarcely ever places his emphasis with propriety, much less with grace.—In short, we would advise his lordship, at this time of day, to abstain from an awkward imitation of others, to avoid all trite phrases, constrained attitudes, and worn-out expletives ; for it is possible they might pass very well with Burke, Germain, Fox, Barre, or Ellis, and nevertheless appear amazingly nauseous and disgusting at second hand.

Essay on the Disregard of the Creation.

IT is a very obvious remark, that those blessings which are most common to mankind are the least regarded, either surveyed with a careless inattention, by whose who have a competency of understanding to weigh or consider them well ; or gazed upon with an unedifying stupidity by the ignorant : so that between both the marvellous works of the Creation pass by, either unheeded, or are looked upon as ordinary spectacles unworthy the reflection of a reasonable being. If man grown up to the full dignity of his nature would but lock up his senses for a time, and then suppose himself in the state of our first parents, who beholding a new born sun travelling from east to west, a beginning, encreasing and diminishing moon, an harmonious order of heavenly bodies performing their courses, a beautiful firmament studded with fixed stars ; his rapture and astonishment in all probability would be so great (unless moderated by the intervention of a superior being) as to deprive him of that reason, by which he should examine that wonderful frame, and adore the hand that formed it. If he would still farther continue his view, and observe the cheerfulness that the glory of the sun spreads over the face of nature, the variety of colours, and differences of reflection, and the amazing operations of one and the same body on the same globe the earth at due and distant seasons, what a maze of irregular thought must he, who stands now as an idle spectator be lost in and confounded. Any one instance singled out, from among the rest of the miraculous works of Providence is subject enough for the contemplation of the wisest of the sons of men. And yet so it is that they pass by the sight of the generality like fleeting shadows, the eye little regarding either from whence they came or whither they go.

The reason of this after long consideration why it should be so I think may proceed from two causes ; the one, the general pride and vanity of mankind, and the other, the innate and almost unconquerable solicitations of his passions and appetites.

To prove the first we may only observe in those persons who are reckoned to have the most refined taste, that they will be taken and struck with the works of art to a degree even of admiration and fondness, which are at best but poor bunglings and imperfect representations of nature ; but the pride is that they were made by their fellow creature, man. How often may we see a rational soul hung as it were by the eyes, and fixed in admiration upon a fine piece of painting ? With what nicety will he observe the delicate touches, masterly strokes, the beautiful turn of posture, the ten thousand graces in a single picture which perhaps the master had no eye to, or if he had they ought to be no farther admired, than as they are copies of those originals which he every day disregards or despises in common life.

Sculpture and architecture, which are sciences still nearer to what we behold in nature, have the same effect upon different minds, without any reference to the great model from whence they were drawn. A statue exquisitely worked with all the harmony and proportions of parts, with its bold risings or its soft declinations will transport a lover of antiquity, who would not extend a charity to a half naked beggar which is the reality of that which art but faintly represents. In the same manner another grows giddy in looking up at an arched roof or fretted ceiling, without once reflecting that the structure was translated from the bow of the Heavens, or the knots of stars in the firmament. Hence it comes to pass, that we in our great wisdom have given the masters in these arts the extravagant appellatives of immortal, divine and eternal ; titles which our own vanity first invented, and custom, the successive heir to every thing that is improper has continued in use among us.

I have been the longer upon this instance, because I think I have gone to the bottom of one source of our negligence in respect to the works of the Creation, and shall therefore be much shorter in the other.

This part relates to the ignorant and vicious moiety of mankind: the one unhappy by fortune and education, the other by ungovernable passions and evil society, are equally negligent of these common superior objects, which ought to draw their attention: but the magnet is below: the rustic regarding the season no farther than as some fancied prognostics determine him in the culture of his ground, and the voluptuous only as they minister to his appetites and luxury: the one has the importunities of gain to work him up to his industry: the other the unrefined instincts of nature to solicit him to his pleasures: and so though both have different pursuits they agree in the same end, of being unthankful receivers of the benefits of Providence.

How unlike to this do we find the conduct of the holy men of old to have been? whose raptures were never greater than when they were taken up with a view of the system of the world, the operation of nature, and the divine superintendency over all its works. Upon this occasion I have often admired the difference between the Heathen and the truly divine poetry: how faint and languid are the descriptions of the one in comparison of the other! and how vastly bold, rising, and figurative the expressions of inspired writers on those occasions! Homer, Virgil, Pindar, and Horace are mere dirt to Job, David and the Prophets upon these subjects. I will now beg leave to put the reader in mind to look up to Providence, as the great conductor of seasons and producer and bleaser of the seeds of the fruit of the earth, and bid him remember him, whose clouds drop fatness, and will also subjoin a most excellent prayer from Bishop Andrews. It is as follows:

“Remember, O Lord, to renew the year
“with thy goodness and the season with “a promising temper: for the eyes of all
“wait upon thee, O Lord: thou givest
“them meat: thou openest thy hand
“and fillest all things living with thy “bounty. Vouchsafe, O Lord, the blessings “of the Heavens and the dews from “above: the blessings of the springs and
“the deeps from beneath: the returns of “the sun, the conjunctions of the moon:
“the benefit of the rising mountains and
“the lofty hills: the fulness of the earth
“and all that breed therein. A fruitful “season. Temperate air. Plenty of corn.
“Abundance of fruit. Health of body
“and peaceable times. Good and wise government. Prudent councils. Just “laws. Righteous judgements. Loyal “obedience. Due execution of justice.

“Sufficient store for life. Happy births.
“Good and fair plenty. Breeding and “institution of children. That our sons “may grow up as young plants and our “daughters may be as the polished “corners of the Temple. That our “garners may be full and plenteous with “all manner of store. That our sheep “may bring forth thousands. That our “oxen may be strong to labour. That “there may be no decay, nor leading into “captivity, nor complaining in our fires:
“that every man may sit under his own “vine, and his own fig-tree, in thank“fulness to thee; sobriety and charity to “his neighbour, and in whatsoever other “estate thou wilt have him, therewith to “be content. And this for Jesus Christ
“his sake, to whom be glory for ever.

The Diamond Pin. A Moral Tale.

CONSTANCY in a husband does not always, more is the pity, secure the fidelity of a wife; but it is highly probable that many married women would never have been vagrants from virtue, if those who had vowed a perpetual attachment at the altar, had not by their desertion thrown them into the way of irresistible temptations.

In consequence of a pressing invitation from his friend, Sir Charles Dawson, colonel Bedly left his lodgings in Dublin to spend a few weeks with him at Dawson-grove; he was the more ready to accept of it, as he had not seen his old friend since his arrival from England, where he had fallen in love with a beautiful girl, the daughter of an eminent merchant, and married her.

Sir Charles received him with his usual warmth of affection, having been long acquainted with him, and always found him amiable in his manners, as he was entertaining in his conversation.

Lady Dawson received the colonel as her husband's friend in the politest manner; and as she had never seen him before was struck with his appearance; he was indeed a striking figure, he was extremely handsome, without being the least effeminate, and had all the gracefulness of a man of the first fashion in his carriage.

The moment she was alone with Sir Charles, she could not help saying the colonel was one of the most agreeable men she ever saw in her life.

She spoke these words very innocently, and Sir Charles did not as some husbands would would have done, put any unfair construction upon them. He said in reply, that Bedly was indeed an agreeable fellow, and as worthy a creature as ever existed.

Bedly was as much struck at lady Dawson's appearance as she could possibly have been at his, and his admiration increased every time she came in his sight. Her beauty in short operated so powerfully upon him, that he began to feel himself very uneasy, because he found a passion swelling in his breast which he could not, he knew, gratify, without being guilty of an action too atrocious to be thought of by a man who had the least idea of morality. He was certainly in a trying situation; for Sir Charles being of a roving disposition, and having affairs with all the pretty girls within several miles of him, whom he could bribe to a compliance with his amorous wishes, frequently left his Harriet and the colonel together, not only for hours, but whole days, undisturbed with any suspicions about the continence of the one, or the honour of the other.

Bedly finding lady Dawson one day in tears during Sir Charles's absence from home, was so much affected that he could not refrain himself from intreating her with great earnestness to acquaint him with the cause of her sorrow, that he might do every thing in his power to alleviate it at least, if its entire removal was not to be hoped for, from his active endeavours in her service. He even ventured to press her hand, while he spoke, but in the most respectful manner, to convince her the more forcibly of the concern which her affliction excited in his sympathizing breast.

She made no reply to his repeated solicitations, repeated every time with additional energy, but having sat some moments sobbing as if her heart would break, hastily withdrew her hand and quitted the room.

In her hurry she dropt a letter: Bedly immediately seized it, imagining that the contents might give him the desired information, and greedily perused it.

The information that he received was pleasing and it was painful. The letter was written by lady Dawson herself, to a favourite female friend, but unfinished: it contained many pathetic complaints of Sir Charles's declining affection, of his increasing indifference, of his frequent wanderings, and leaving her with a man, who was but too agreeable to her. In fine, the colonel made discoveries which flattered his vanity greatly, but which gave considerable disquiet. They raised a fierce contention in his breast between love and honour, and the conflicts which he endured from the violence of their opposition to each other were hardly to be supported.

Lady Dawson missing her letter soon after she got to her drawing-room, was not a little alarmed, fearing it had fallen into his hands, from whom she wished particularly to have it concealed. Recollecting that she had been reading it just before the colonel had surprized her in tears, she hastened instantly to the parlour. Bedly gently seizing her hand begged her to sit down and hear him, and did not beg in vain. He then presenting the letter to her, intreated her upon his knees and in the most persuasive accents to pardon an impertinence of which he would not have been guilty, if he had not been anxiously desirous of knowing what had occasioned her tears and sighs which pierced him to the soul.

His pleadings were successful, he was pardoned for the gratification of his curiosity: he was not only forgiven, but received the most flattering encouragements. Intoxicated by these encouragements, his sense of honour grew weaker and weaker every hour, and he was in a short time totally under the dominion of the most ungovernable of all passions.

In the midst of these animating hopes, the colonel met with a severe repulse, just when he thought of being (in the language of poetry) "blest as the immortal Gods". In a very tender cete a Tete lady Dawson almost overpowered by his insinuating approaches, broke from him to her as well as to his astonishment. She could not help wondering at herself as soon as she was alone in her own apartment, on having had resolution enough to preserve her marriage vow inviolate, when she was so strongly prompted to infringe it.

The colonel when he recovered from the surprize from which lady Dawson's abrupt departure had thrown him, was, by the instantaneous return of his reason, insensibly impelled to applaud her conduct and to condemn his own.

Conscious of having acted an ungenerous part, by availing himself of her partiality in his favour to seduce her from her fidelity to a man whom he called his friend, and afraid to trust himself again in her company, he ordered his servant to saddle his horse immediately, and determined to set off without risking the loss of his honour by another interview.

Lady Dawson was at first, both piqued and concerned at the colonel's precipitate retreat; but on a little recollection, rejoiced at her narrow escape when her virtue was in the most imminent danger.

In this situation a lady of her acquaintance ance found her, and easily prevailed on her to accompany her to a play at the next town with an agreeable party of both sexes.

Soon after she was seated at the theatre at ———, a very handsome girl sitting near her attracted her attention; it was attracted by the brilliancy of her beauty; and as she was dressed in a shabby genteel style throughout, the diamond pin which glittered upon her forehead seemed to be entirely misplaced.

It was quite natural for lady Dawson to make enquiries after a girl who made so singular an appearance, but the answers which she received to them rendered her unable to relish the entertainments of the evening. The girl was one of Sir Charles's mistresses. The intelligence was galling enough, but the diamond pin was a sight particularly mortifying.

Lady Dawson was destined however to receive a still greater mortification before she left ———, for while the husband of the lady who had invited her to the play was handing her into his carriage, she saw Sir Charles putting the girl who had so much disturbed her, into a post-chaise.

On her return to Dawson grove she was not a little surprized to find colonel Bedly sitting in the parlour, but she was not a little pleased. The remembrance of the tender scene between them had powerfully operated upon her during her ride to the aforementioned theatre, the unexpected rencontre there had totally extinguished the small remains of her regard for Sir Charles.

The return of the colonel was occasioned by the failure of his resolution before he rode many miles. His passion for lady Dawson became so troublesome, so intolerable that he could not proceed on his journey; and as she had by tearing herself away from his arms at a very critical juncture, sufficiently induced him to believe, that she would hardly be able to make resistance to another artful, spirited attack, he wheeled about and pointed his horse's head to his friend's house with the most unfriendly intention.

—How weak is honour when opposed to love!

Lady Dawson could not help expressing in her countenance, the pleasure which she felt at the sight of the man who was now the unrivalled possessor of her heart. Those must be slenderly acquainted with the female world, who are to be told the conquest of a woman's heart is a decisive blow against her person.

The colonel reading in lady Dawson's significant eyes a confirmation of his conjectures about the success of a second attempt, was in too much haste to enjoy the completion of his wishes to hazard another disappointment by delay, he therefore exerting all the address he was master of, and no man had more, promised himself a speedy surrender. His expectations were soon answered——

The yielding fair one gave him perfect happiness.

Let the husbands who find themselves inclined to censure the lady Dawsons of this age with asperity, pity while they blame, and endeavour to secure the constancy of their wives by a faithful attachment to them.

On Education.

NOT all the cruelty of tyrants, the subtlety and craft of priests, or the malice of Devils, have ever invented or brought a greater plague or mischief upon mankind than false learning. We may be upon our guard against all other calamities, but here the enemy is within us, and admitted at all times into the innermost recesses of our souls; where he acts the part of a treacherous friend, betrays us under the pretence of serving us, and administers poison in cups of seeming nectar and ambrosia. We are gradually deprived of our senses whilst we think we are improving them; become fools by industry and great application; like Tantalus are starved with an imaginary banquet at our mouths: and in the midst of an appearing profusion of knowledge want common sense: and what is yet worse, insensible of our distemper, and consequently are incapable of a remedy.

Our minds as well as bodies are easily distorted and put out of their natural frame. Absurdity and nonsense are to be learned, and good natural faculties may be improved into foolish ones or none at all. A man like a vessel is capable of holding only a certain quantity, which when it is full of one liquor is incapable of receiving another; and even when the first is drawn out it generally leaves a tincture behind. The mind when rightly set out, usefully employed and upon proper subjects will improve and every day strengthen; but when conversant only with visions, phantoms, and whimsies, will assimilate with the company which it keeps, and thus by degrees lose its distinguishing faculties.

A proper exercise and a natural use of the limbs give health and vigour as well as becoming gracefulness motion, and whereas grimace and absurd posture are qualifications only fit for Jack Puddings and Merry Andrews,

Andrews. One who has been taught long by an ill master, is farther from a good dancer than another who has never begun, because he must unlearn all his ill habits to be in the circumstance of him who has not learned at all; as a man who gets out of his road is farther from his journey's end, than if he had staid at home; and commonly must return thither to find out his right way.

Whosoever spends his time in reading foolish books, and in studying useless and false speculations, will grow the greater coxcomb the greater progress he makes. He is learning backwards, and undermining and destroying the first sparks of knowledge, and in time will be fortified and impregnable against common sense. A great philosopher tells us that ignorance is a middle state between knowledge and false learning; that is to say, one who is wholly untaught and unimproved, is as much above a learned man in the common acceptance of the word, as a man well educated exceeds another who has no education at all. The capacity of the first is entire and susceptible of information; whereas in the other, all the avenues or passages to wisdom are destroyed or locked up, and he is so puzzled, perplexed, and confounded in a maze of improved nonsense and absurdity, that he never gets through or out of it. The acquisitions of such learning have been aptly compared to the fluttering and rumbling of a swallow falling down a chimney: who when he is at the bottom, flies and hurries backwards and forward to every window and every corner of the room to make his escape; but never thinks of the way by which he came in, and so becomes an easy prey to the first enemy which assaults him.

A Letter from Edmund Burke, Esq; one of the Representatives in Parliament for the City of Bristol, to John Farr and John Harris, Esqrs. Sheriffs of that City, on the Affairs of America.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour of sending you the two last acts which have been passed with regard to the troubles in America. These acts are similar to all the rest which have been made on the same subject. They operate by the same principle; and they are derived from the very same policy. I think they complete the number of this sort of statutes to nine. It affords no matter for very pleasing reflection, to observe, that our subjects diminish, as our laws encrease.

If I have the misfortune of differing with some of my fellow-citizens on this great and arduous subject, it is no small consolation to me, that I do not differ from you. With you, I am perfectly united. We are heartily agreed in our detestation of a civil war. We have ever expressed the most unqualified disapprobation of all the steps which have led to it, and of all those which tend to prolong it. And I have no doubt that we feel exactly the same emotions of grief and shame on all its miserable consequences; whether they appear, on the one side or the other, in the shape of victories or defeats; of captures made from the English on the continent, or from the English in these islands; of legislative regulations which subvert the liberties of our brethren, or which undermine our own.

Of the first of these statutes (that for the letter of marque) I shall say little. Exceptionable as it may be, and as I think it is in some particulars, it seems the natural, perhaps necessary result of the measures we have taken, and the situation we are in. The other (for a partial suspension of the Habeas Corpus) appears to me of a much deeper malignity. During its progress through the House of Commons, it has been amended, so as to express more distinctly than at first it did, the avowed sentiments of those who framed it: and the main ground of my exception to it is, because it does express, and does carry into execution, purposes which appear to me so contradictory to all the principles, not only of the constitutional policy of Great Britain, but even of that species of hostile justice, which no asperity of war wholly extinguishes in the minds of a civilized people.

It seems to have in view two capital objects; the first, to enable administration to confine, as long as it shall think proper, (within the duration of the act) those, whom that act is pleased to qualify by the name of Pirates. Those so qualified, I understand to be, the commanders and mariners of such privateers and ships of war belonging to the colonies, as in the course of this unhappy contest may fall into the hands of the crown. They are therefore to be detained in prison, under the criminal description of piracy, to a future trial and ignominious punishment, whenever circumstances shall make it convenient to execute vengeance on them, under the colour of that odious and infamous offence.

To this first purpose of the law, I have no small dislike. Because the act does not (as all laws, and all equitable transactions ought to do) fairly describe its object. The persons, who make a naval war upon us, in consequence of the present troubles, may may be rebels : but to call and treat them as pirates, is confounding, not only the natural distinction of things, but the order of crimes ; which, whether by putting them from a higher part of the scale to the lower, or from the lower to the higher, is never done without dangerously disordering the whole frame of jurisprudence. Though piracy may be, in the eye of the law, a less offence than treason ; yet, as both are, in effect, punished with the same death, the same forfeiture, and the same corruption of blood, I never would take from any fellow-creature whatever, any sort of advantage, which he may derive to his safety from the pity of mankind, or to his reputation from their general feelings, by degrading his offence, when I cannot soften his punishment. The general sense of mankind tells me, that those offences, which may possibly arise from mistaken virtue, are not in the class of infamous actions. Lord Coke, the oracle of the English law, conforms to that general sense, where he says, that " those things which are of the highest criminality may be of the least disgrace." The act prepares a sort of masqued proceeding, not honourable to the justice of the kingdom, and by no means necessary for its safety. I cannot enter into it. If lord Balmerino, in the last rebellion, had driven off the cattle of twenty clans, I should have thought it a scandalous and low juggle, utterly unworthy of the manliness of an English judicature, to have tried him for felony, as a stealer of cows.

Besides, I must honestly tell you, that I could not vote for, or countenance in any way, a statute, which stigmatizes with the crime of piracy, those men, whom an act of parliament had previously put out of the protection of the law. When the legislature of this kingdom had ordered all their ships and goods, for the mere new-created offence of exercising trade, to be divided as a spoil among the seamen of the navy,—for the same legislature afterwards to treat the necessary reprisal of an unhappy, proscribed, interdicted people, as the crime of piracy, seems harsh and incongruous. Such a procedure would have appeared (in any other legislature than ours) a strain of the most insulting and most unnatural cruelty and injustice. I assure you, I do not remember to have heard of any thing like it in any time or country.

The second professed purpose of the act is to detain in England for trial, those who shall commit high treason in America.

That you may be enabled to enter into the true spirit of the present law, it is necessary, gentlemen, to apprise you, that there is an act, made so long ago as the reign of Henry the eighth, before the existence or thought of any English colonies in America, for the trial in this kingdom of treasons committed out of the realm. In the year 1769, parliament thought proper to acquaint the crown with their construction of that act, in a formal address, wherein they intreated his Majesty, to cause persons, charged with high treason in America, to be brought into this kingdom for trial. By this act of Henry the eighth, so construed and so applied, almost all that is substantial and beneficial in a trial by jury is taken away from the subject in the colonies. This is however saying too little ; for to try a man under that act is, in effect, to condemn him unheard. A person is brought hither in the dungeon of a ship's hold : thence he is vomited into a dungeon on land ; loaded with irons, unfurnished with money, unsupported by friends, three thousand miles from all means of calling upon, or confronting evidence, where no one local circumstance that tends to detect perjury, can possibly be judged of ;—such a person may be executed according to form, but he never can be tried according to justice.

I therefore could by no means reconcile myself to the bill I send you ; which is expressly provided to remove all inconveniencies from the establishment of a mode of trial, which has ever appeared to me most unjust and most unconstitutional. Far from removing the difficulties which impede the execution of so mischievous a project, I would heap new difficulties upon it, if it were in my power. All the ancient, honest juridical principles, and institutions of England, are so many clogs to check and retard the headlong course of violence and oppression. They were invented for this one good purpose ;—that what was not just should not be convenient. Convinced of this, I would leave things as I found them. The old, cool-headed, general law, is as good as any deviation dictated by present heat.

I could see no fair justifiable expedience pleaded to favour this new suspension of the liberty of the subject. If the English in the colonies can support the independency to which they have been unfortunately driven, I suppose nobody has such a fanatical zeal for the criminal justice of Henry the eighth, that he will contend for executions which must be retaliated tenfold on his own friends ; or who has conceived conceived so strange an idea of English dignity, as to think the defeats in America compensated by the triumphs at Tyburn. If, on the contrary, the colonies are reduced to the obedience of the crown, there must be, under that authority, tribunals in the country itself, fully competent to administer justice on all offenders. But if there are not, and that we must suppose a thing so humiliating to our government, as that all this vast continent should unanimously concur in thinking, that no ill fortune can convert resistance to the royal authority into a criminal act, we may call the effect of our victory peace, or obedience, or what we will ; but the war is not ended : The hostile mind continues in full vigour ; and it continues under a worse form. If your peace be nothing more than a fullen pause from arms ; if their quiet be nothing but the meditation of revenge, where smitten pride, smarting from its wounds, festers into new rancour, neither the act of Henry the eighth, nor its handmaid of this reign, will answer any wise end of policy or justice. For if the bloody fields, which they saw and felt, are not sufficient to subdue the reason of Americans (to use the expressive phrase of a great lord in office) it is not the judicial slaughter, which is made in another hemisphere against their universal sense of justice, that will ever reconcile them to the British government.

I take it for granted, gentlemen, that we sympathize in a proper horror of all punishment further than as it serves for an example. To whom then does the example of an execution in England for this American rebellion apply ? Remember, you are told every day, that the present is a contest between the two countries ; and that we in England are at war for our own dignity against our rebellious children. Is this true ? If it be, it is surely among such rebellious children that examples for disobedience should be made. For who ever thought of instructing parents in their duty by an example from the punishment of a disobedient son ? As well might the execution of a fugitive negro in the plantations, be considered as a lesson to teach masters humanity to their slaves. Such executions may indeed satiate our revenge ; they may harden our hearts ; and puff us up with pride and arrogance. Alas ! this is not instruction.

If any thing can be drawn from such examples by a parity of the case, it is to shew, how deep their crime, and how heavy their punishment will be, who shall at any time dare to resist a distant power actually disposing of their property, without their voice or consent to the disposition ; and overturning their franchises without charge or hearing. God forbid, that England should ever read this lesson written in the blood of any of her offspring !

War is at present carried on, between the king's natural and foreign troops, on one side, and the English in America, on the other, upon the usual footing of other wars ; and accordingly an exchange of prisoners has been regularly made from the beginning. If, notwithstanding this hitherto equal procedure, upon some prospect of ending the war with success, (which however may be delusive) administration prepares to act against those as traitors who remain in their hands at the end of the troubles, in my opinion we shall exhibit to the world as indecent a piece of injustice as ever civil fury has produced. If the prisoners who have been exchanged have not by that exchange been virtually pardoned, the cartel (whether avowed or understood) is a cruel fraud : for you have received the life of a man ; and you ought to return a life for it, or there is no parity or fairness in the transaction.

If, on the other hand, we admit, that they, who are actually exchanged are pardoned, but contend that we may justly reserve for vengeance, those who remain unexchanged ; then this unpleasant and unhandsome consequence will follow ; that you judge of the delinquency of men merely by the time of their guilt, and not by the heinousness of it ; and you make fortune and accidents, and not the moral qualities of human action, the rule of your justice.

These strange incongruities must ever perplex those, who confound the unhapinness of civil dissention, with the crime of treason. Whenever a rebellion really and truly exists, (which is as easily known in fact, as it is difficult to define in words) government has not entered into such military conventions ; but has ever declined all intermediate treaty, which should put rebels in possession of the law of nations with regard to war. Commanders would receive no benefits at their hands, because they could make no return for them.—Who has ever heard of capitulation, and parole of honour, and exchange of prisoners, in the late rebellions in this kingdom ? The answer to all demands of that sort was, “ we can engage for nothing ; you are at the king's pleasure.” We ought to remember, that if our present enemies be, in reality and truth, rebels, the king's generals have no right to release them upon any conditions whatsoever ; and they are themselves answerable to the law, and as much in want of a pardon for doing so, as the rebels whom they release.

Lawyers, I know, cannot make the distinction, for which I contend; because they have their strict rule to go by. But legislators ought to do what lawyers cannot; for they have no other rules to bind them, but the great principles of reason and equity, and the general sense of mankind. These they are bound to obey and follow; and rather to enlarge and enlighten law by the liberality of legislative reason, than to fetter and bind their higher capacity by the narrow constructions of subordinate artificial justice. If we had adverted to this, we never could consider the convulsions of a great empire, not disturbed by a little disseminated faction, but divided by whole communities and provinces, and entire legal representatives of a people, as fit matter of discussion under a commission of oyer and terminer. It is as opposite to reason and prudence, as it is to humanity and justice.

This act, proceeding on these principles, that is, preparing to end the present troubles by a trial of one sort of hostility, under the name of piracy, and of another by the name of treason, and executing the act of Henry the eighth according to a new and unconstitutional interpretation, I should have thought evil and dangerous, even though the instruments of effecting such purposes had been merely of a neutral quality.

But it really appears to me, that the means which this act employs are, at least, as exceptionable as the end. Permit me to open myself a little upon this subject, because it is of importance to me, when I am obliged to submit to the power without acquiescing in the reason of an act of legislature, that I should justify my dissent, by such arguments as may be supposed to have weight with a sober man.

The main operative regulation of the act is to suspend the common law, and the statute Habeas Corpus, (the sole securities either for liberty or justice) with regard to all those who have been out of the realm or on the high seas, within the given time. The rest of the people, as I understand, are to continue as they stood before.

I confess, gentlemen, that this appears to me, as bad in the principle, and far worse in its consequence, than an universal suspension of the Habeas Corpus act; and the limiting qualification, instead of taking out the sting, does in my humble opinion sharpen and envenom it to a greater degree. Liberty, if I understand it at all, is a general principle, and the clear right of all the subjects within the realm, or of none. Partial freedom seems to me a most invidious mode of slavery. But, unfortunately, it is the kind of slavery the most easily admitted in times of civil discord. For parties are but too apt to forget their own future safety in their desire of sacrificing their enemies. People without much difficulty admit the entrance of that injustice of which they are not to be the immediate victims. In times of high proceeding, it is never the faction of the predominant power that is in danger; for no tyranny chastises its own instruments. It is the obnoxious and the suspected who want the protection of law; and there is nothing to bridle the partial violence of state factions, but this great, steady, uniform principle: "that whenever an act is made for a cessation of law and justice, the whole people should be universally subjected to the same suspension of their franchises." The alarm of such a proceeding would then be universal. It would operate as a sort of call of the nation. It would become every man's immediate and instant concern to be made very sensible of the absolute necessity of this total eclipse of liberty. They would more carefully advert to every renewal, and more powerfully resist it. These great determined measures are not commonly so dangerous to freedom. They are marked with too strong lines to slide into use. No plea or pretence of mere inconvenience or evil example (which must in their nature be daily and ordinary incidents) can be admitted as a reason for such mighty operations. But the true danger is, when liberty is nibbled away, for expedients, and by parts. The Habeas Corpus act supposes (contrary to the genius of most other laws) that the lawful magistrate may see particular men with a malignant eye; and it provides for that identical case. But "when men, in particular descriptions, marked out by the magistrate himself, are delivered over by parliament to this possible malignity, it is not the Habeas Corpus that is occasionally suspended, but its spirit that is mistaken, and its principle that is subverted. Indeed nothing is security to any individual but the common interest of all.

This act, therefore, has this distinguished evil in it, that it is the first partial suspension of the Habeas Corpus which has been made. The precedent, which is always of very great importance, is now established. For the first time a distinction is made among the people within this realm. Before this act, every man putting his foot on English ground, every stranger owing only a local and temporary allegiance, even a negro slave, who had been been sold in the colonies and under an act of parliament, became as free as every other man who breathed the same air with him. Now a line is drawn, which may be advanced further and further at pleasure, on the same argument of mere expedience, on which it was first described. There is no equality among us; we are not follow-citizens, if the mariner who lands on the quay does not rest on as firm legal ground, as the merchant who sits in his counting-house. Other laws may injure the community, this tends to dissolve it. It destroys equality, which is the essence of community. As things now stand, every man in the West Indies, every one inhabitant of three unoffending provinces on the continent, every person coming from the East Indies, every gentleman who has travelled for his health or education, every mariner who has navigated the seas, is, for no other offence, under a temporary proscription. Let any of these facts (now become presumptions of guilt) be proved against him, and the bare suspicion of the crown puts him out of the law. It is even by no means clear to me, whether the negative proof does not lie upon the person apprehended on suspicion, to the subversion of all injustice.

THE Hymns written by Callimachus, a Greek poet, native of Greece, a city of Lybia, in Africa (who flourished in the year of the world 3700, and was keeper of the famous library of Ptolomy King of Egypt) had been greatly esteemed by the learned of all ages. No good translation had hitherto appeared in English, when Mr. Dodd undertook the necessary task. He at first designed to risque the expence of the publication, but some of his friends who had seen part of his version, urged him rather to publish it by subscription. He complied, and his list of subscribers was very large, indeed it may be said it comprehended almost every person of taste in the kingdom. The idea concerned of this work, and the manner of its execution may be concluded from the following verses written by one of his friends and published August, 1751.

To Mr. Dodd, on his intended Translation of Callimachus.

O thou, who with a happy genius born!
Canst tuneful verse in flowing numbers turn,
Crown'd in thy Lincoln Plains with early bays,
Be early wise, nor trust to barren praise,
June, 1777.

Soon by thy hand, shall Orpheus's lyre be singing,
And Grecian Hymns, by English damsels sung.
If Britain these translated songs would hear
First, take the gold—then charm the list'ning ear,
So shall thy Lybian father smile to see
His genius meet its just reward in thee;
And own his verse, to thine in culture yields,
As much as Afric's wilds, to Europe's fields.

Mr. Dodd's reputation daily encreasing, in the month of April 1752, he was chosen lecturer of the parishes of Westham, and Bow, in the county of Essex; and in May 1753, lecturer of St. James's, Garlick-hithe, in London, in the room of the rev. Mr. Stuart deceased. These lectureships encreasing his incomes he quitted his academy, and applied himself solely to his literary pursuits, and the conscientious discharge of his clerical duties.

Mr. Dodd's next publication was a single sermon, entitled, The Sinful Christian Condemned from his own Prayer, preached from Luke xix. verse 22.

"And he saith unto him, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, thou wicked servant. Thou knewest that I was an austere man, taking up that I laid not down, and reaping that I did not sow."

In November 1756 he published No. 12 of a Course of Sermons on the Miracles and Parables of our Saviour: this was promised to be continued every fortnight, and it was so well executed and received by the public, that in March 1758, an edition of the whole was printed in four volumes octavo, before which time he had become sole lecturer of St. Olave, Hartstreet.

The Magdalen charity for the reception of penitent prostitutes (first projected by Mr. Dingley) was opened August 10, 1758, and Mr. Dodd by the unanimous suffrage of all the governors, was appointed the chaplain; there a most extensive field was open for an exertion of his abilities and the completing his ever foremost desire of recalling sinners to repentance. His sermon preached at a meeting of the governors, before his royal highness prince Edward, January 27, 1760, was so much esteemed, that he was requested to print it, as it might conduce to the extension of that useful charity. And indeed Mr. Dodd was unwearied in his endeavours to restore peace to those hearts, stung with a guilty conscience, by first bringing them to a due sense of their crime, and then pouring in the sovereign balm of God's mercy. This was demonstrated, by his publication in April 1761, entitled An Account of the Rise, Progress and present State of the Magdalen Charity, with two Sermons, Advice to the Magdalens, Hymns, Prayers, and the Rules of the House. This little work was replete with useful admonitions and breathed a true spirit of piety.

Two other sermons ought not to be forgotten, which were preached before the worshipful company of Apothecaries, June 1760, and June 1761, at their anniversary meetings.

Somewhat prior to this, Mr. Dodd had undertaken the conduct of a monthly work called the Christian Magazine, in which were dispersed those excellent Reflections on Death, which have been so universally esteemed by all serious readers, and being collected together, were reprinted in one volume in twelves. Of these Reflections it may be justly said that they exceed every work on that awful subject, which have hitherto appeared in any language, not even excepting those of Dr. Sherlock, or Mr. Drelincourt.

Mr. Dodd was now happy in the esteem of the most eminent persons in England. The late Dr. Squires, bishop of St. Davids, made him his chaplain, and he was also installed prebendary of Brecon, in Nov. 1763. He soon after was appointed chaplain in ordinary to his majesty, and made rector of West-ham, and of St. Olave's, and took his degrees as Doctor of Divinity.

Yet Dr. Dodd's advancement in life, did not slacken his labours; on the contrary it served only as a spur to exert himself to become still more worthy. He continued preaching to crowded congregations, and employing every leisure hour in useful writings. He published his annual sermon before the governors of the Magdalen, June 1762. His new edition of bishop Hall's Contemplations, a large Common Place-Book to the Holy Scriptures; or the Scriptures sufficiency practically demonstrated, The Companion for the Sick, and the Visitor in two volumes, works full of erudition, and real utility, demonstrating him to be at the same time, the sincere christian, the profound scholar, the elegant writer, and complete gentleman.

We have already mentioned that Dr. Dodd had an elegant taste for poetry, and divers of his poetical works had been published at different times. In the year 1763 he was solicited to collect them together in one publication, which he did, and added six pastorals. To this addition he was excited by hearing the great commendations, which many had bestowed on the pastorals of the celebrated Gesner, designed by their author to advance morality and stimulate to virtue, but on examination Dr. Dodd found many of them very puerile and replete with allusions to the pagan mythology, which, he thinking inconsistent with a christian poet, wrote the above pastorals with the same good intention as Gesner, but without his error, so that it is no flattery to say they greatly surpass them.

In April 1764, Dr. Dodd published that excellent work, Comfort for the Afflicted, little indeed expecting that he should ever have so great a need of comfort himself as he has since unhappily experienced. But his most capital work was that sumptuous edition of the Bible which began to be published soon after, and which is more valuable than every other edition of the sacred Scriptures, as the edition was favoured with the manuscript notes of those great lights of mankind Mr. Locke, Sir Isaac Newton, the Earl of Clarendon, and Dr. Waterland: Besides those helps, he interwove in the copious notes, the annotations of Pere Houbigant, and many other excellent commentators, never before published, and his own remarks and practical observations, are not the least valuable.

In the year 1770, he took his degrees as Doctor of Laws, and seeing the great utility of Dr. Fordyce's sermons to young women, he resolved that the youth of the other sex, should not want a proper director. He therefore in the year 1771, published two volumes of sermons to young men, which he dedicated to the hon. Philip Stanhope, (his pupil) and Charles Erskine, Esq.

Increasing still in reputation Dr. Dodd was yet more and more esteemed. The following little tribute to his merits, ought not to be forgotten.

On hearing Dr. Dodd preach.

Heard but the libertine, thy pulpit lore,
 Pathetic Dodd! the wretch would sin no
 more;
 No more with vice his ebbing life disgrace
 With riot mark, or infamy debase;
 No more in sensual pleasures sport secure, [pure
 Betray the beauteous, and pollute the
 But long, long slighted mercy first im-

 Applaud thy doctrine and his God adore.
 Touch'd with thy preaching, Dulness
 waves his sleep,
 And Levity itself, is seen to weep.
 Deigns the proud infidel a list'ning ear,
 Adult'ers tremble, and blasphemers fear.

Whilst virtue triumphs with a conscious

And Magda'ens with tears deplore their

Let flatter'd greatness still by fools be sung [not rung?
With Dodd's applause what temples have

Nor fails each contrite wound with balm

Go on, judicious pastor! awe the bold,
And still improve the young, reclaim the Still make fair chastity the darling theme, Whilst Magdalens support and prize its fame,

Then—nor till late—may Heav'n reward

And make thee, Angel, in a brighter

Hitherto we have beheld Dr. Dodd in a most splendid light, and have followed him through the paths of rectitude to true glory ; which every good man hoped would not end but in glory everlasting.—
Alas ! that we must now turn the reverse of the medal ! that we must behold this glory tarnished, that well earned fame lessened, and clouds of sin and shame darken the beautiful horizon of his life.

Dr. Dodd's attention to his spiritual duties and his studies caused him to overlook the little oeconomic arrangements so necessary in private life. He had, from his intercourse with the great, insensibly contracted a love for splendor, and tho' very moderate himself in eating and drinking he was pleased to behold his table well spread, and his philanthropy urged him to keep more company than was strictly consistent with prudence. Hence, tho' his income was large, he sometimes experienced little temporary difficulties.
The first step to his decline in the rapid course of ecclesiastical preferment, was an indiscretion of Mrs. Dodd's.

It may be necessary to inform the reader, that in the year 1750, Dr. Dodd married a young woman of sixteen years old, whose charms of both mind and person and the goodness of her family, counterbalanced in his eyes the want of a large fortune. From the commencement of their union domestic happiness constantly retided in their dwelling, and Mrs. Dodd's conduct since her husband's misfortunes evinces her tender regard and unalterable attachment to him. She beheld his advancement in life, with great pleasure, not only from the increase of fortune, but a love of fame. She saw him with a partiality which can scarcely be condemned by those who know the influence of conjugal love. She thought no advancement too great for his merits, and a rich living falling which was in the gift of the Lord

Chancellor, she indiscreetly offered Lady Apsley three thousand guineas if she would use her interest with her husband, to collate Dr. Dodd to the vacant benefice. The Chancellor (whether from virtue or from pique is unknown) acquainted the King with the offer, who immediately struck Dr. Dodd off from the list of his chaplains. It was in vain that the Doctor, in the public news-papers, disclaimed any knowledge of the transaction, those who envied his fame, caught the tale, and the malicious put the worst construction on it.
A celebrated wit made it the subject of a dramatic scene ; little thinking how soon he himself would be the subject of a malicious accusation, for a more horrid crime.

Since that time the public is in possession of the actions of Dr. Dodd. The crime for which he is condemned admits of no excuse, but every candid person will not confound the lapse of a man of his universal good character with the repeated and habitual crimes of the common forger. Nor will they imprecate public justice on the head of one, who for thirty years hath been a conductor in the paths of virtue, a prime agent in the noble charity for the release of prisoners, and in that other humane institution for the recovery of drowned persons, as they would on a constant depredator on the public, an artful stock jobber, or a man who hath lived in a series of pernicious frauds.

Female Virtue and Greatness displayed in Principle and Conduct.

MR. Trenchard after this incident wanted to conquer his regard to Mrs. Pelham. He took a journey to London to try what absence would do—he went to the opera—to the Lord Mayor's feast, and to other public entertainments, and at last vainly thought he had got rid of his love notions—on his return, visiting his mother, she in Nancy's absence took occasion to speak of her, intending to engage his good opinion and so his help, (after her death) in case Nancy should need it. This set all a moving again—it oiled the wheels, and the machine flew swift. Lady Trenchard soon after this grew worse daily, he therefore visited her often in a day, and as Nancy was constantly attending her, he could not but observe her lovely behaviour—the tenderness, the alacrity, the delight she took in ministering to her dear lady. He never saw her there but his passion gained new strength. He now found it in vain to resist, and he fell a willing victim to the power of female worth.

In this posture he continued till it issued in a fixed determination to make his addresses to her in proper time; and then he felt ease, for he judged there would be no difficulty in gaining her for his wife, from his circumstances and rank. Had his mother been well, he would have let her know his mind, but he thought her too weak to be acquainted with such a tender point, imagining that neither she nor his father would approve of it at first; he therefore kept it wholly to himself—The day before she died, she sent for him to give him her solemn charges, warnings, and blessing. It was a tender scene, Nancy was present, and was equally affected—When his mother had done—he said within himself, “O cruel arbitrary custom! why is this distinction of wealth and title that keeps souls asunder? was it not for thee, we might jointly have partaken of the parent's blessing; I as a son, she as a daughter, both dear to the best of parents.—Was it not for thee, hand in hand we might embrace the departing mother!”

After her death he found by the paper she gave him, what generous bequests she had left Nancy, and what testimony living and dying she gave to her worth; he also saw how Mrs Masham valued her, but how much more Dr. Butler, Dr. Price, and their ladies made of her; he was highly pleased to find his opinion corroborated by such able judges; he was easy in the belief he should possess her, but he thought it decent not to begin his address till the time of wearing mourning was ended, which at W—n B—h was six months. He wanted not any body to suspect his design except Nancy, but he desired to be more familiar with her, yet could not with prudence, as she always sat in the women's chamber.—Sometimes he had not a glimpse of her for a week, or ten days; he went at last and asked her to put his mother's books in order, and offered her the choice of any, but the modest cautious girl declined—he insisted; she observed his emotions, but imagined it was displeasure when it was real affection. He presented her with a curious and valuable purse which he found in his mother's casket, and added twenty guineas to her legacy, and sent it as his mother's—this he did, because he thought she ought to have had equal to Mrs. Wilson the house-keeper, to whom Lady Trenchard left fifty guineas, not thinking that the other valuables which Nancy had, were equal to three times fifty guineas.

Thus he rested easy, until Mrs. Butler from Mrs. Pelham made the motion for Nancy's return home—then his fears and feelings were inexpressible. He in a few days tried for an opportunity to speak to Nancy alone—he tried repeatedly, but she evidently avoided him—he was startled; he went into the women's room, on pretence of taking Mrs. Wilson's advice about some new night-gowns (though he wanted none) he went several times about these trifles. He saw Nancy was easy and cheerful there, if he happened to see her in the garden, or adjusting things in the other rooms (which her lady used to direct her to supervise once or twice a week and place in nice arrangement) she would be gone in an instant, or if he said any thing to detain her, she had a reason at once, that she was wanted elsewhere, must finish such a thing, or Katy was waiting, or something would spoil. These notices alarmed him. Soon after this he had a suitor, as Miss Collet had told him. This hint from Mr. Harmel, that Nancy had a item roused him; he was anxious to know the truth of it, but he dared not shew his anxiety. He happened also to hear Mrs. Wilson and Katy, a worthy young woman, that lived in the family, speaking of it, which added to his distress. He was now resolved to give Nancy reason enough to suspect his design, and since she would not give him an opportunity to be alone with her, he thought on a scheme which would bring him into her presence—he had seen some of the fine work that she had done for his aunt Masham, and he asked her to work two pair of ruffles for himself in the best manner. She undertook it, and he made errands often to look on her work, telling her as he had heard she was fond of poetry, he would shew her a book in manuscript, and should be glad of her opinion of the piece. They were his own compositions. He addressed one to Amanda under the character of nymph, and subscribed Strephon, the name he always bore among his poetical friends, and he artfully artfully contrived Nancy should know that was the name he always signed; he hoped to discover by her looks whether she saw his design, but he was still in the dark. By this time, Nancy had insensibly entertained a liking to Mr. Trenchard, but she thought it was no other than a regard for him as the beloved son of Lady Trenchard, whom he much resembled in his looks, and generous disposition. The tender concern he shewed for his mother while living, attached her esteem, and his just grief on her death rivetted that esteem, and arose to a sympathetic feeling; but the notice he had lately taken of her, added to the warnings and cautions of her mother in her late letters, made her fear he had some unworthy end in view, as she could not but see he was trying to bring himself on her notice. She could not imagine he had any thoughts of her for a wife, the disparity in their circumstances were so great; besides, if his views were honourable, why should he behave with more distance while her lady lived, and never seek an intimacy 'till after her death, whose favourite, all the family, and he also, knew she was? These reflections caused her much concern, and she began to apprehend herself in danger. This concern increased, and was visible to the women. Nancy was pensive, often in deep thought, never would sit alone, though ever fond of books and retirement; would not stir out of an evening, not even to Miss Collet's or Miss Harmel's without Katy would go with her, and what the matter was they did not know, nor would Nancy reveal. She was far from a suspicious temper, but his conduct put her on thinking. So many little reasons were assigned for his getting into her company from time to time in the women's chamber, as seemed unaccountable to her. She felt distressed, and earnestly wished herself in her father's house: but how could she go without assigning the reason? that would be very imprudent. She could not say a word to Mrs. Wilton, for Mrs. Wilton admired Mr. Trenchard. She could not to Mrs. Butler, for she would think her vain and conceited, and she dared not to any one else; yet she always felt a certain pleasure while he was with her and any-body was by. She saw his eyes full of glowing pleasure, when she was in conversation obliged to look on him, and her eye met his. Still his carriage was so decent and winning, his looks and conversation so innocent, that few young women but the modest, the humble, the cautious, and prudent Nancy Pe ham, but would have thought themselves secure of a conquest, and prided themselves in it.

Mrs. Wilton had not suspected him as yet, but Katy Nelson had (she was satisfied) made a discovery of his passion, and after a few weeks watching, she was strengthened in it, and gave Mrs. Wilton an item, putting her in mind of several incidents that passed before her, and of many other while she was below stairs. The worthy woman was concerned, and determined to try both of them; to him she hinted an alteration in Nancy, "that she was very dull, yet would not own it, and she was concerned to see her so." He said little, but looked grieved and anxious. They both bantered Nancy about Mr. Tait, whom they knew she had dismissed, and could not like. At other times they hinted at Mr. Trenchard's frequent coming there; she wished he would not, and wondered he could not say what he wanted to Mrs. Wilton, in her room below, or send for her into the parlour. Katy intimated that his errands were not to Mrs. Wilton, only in pretence. Nancy was the real one. At this she wept. They told her she was not dull while he sat there; she took unkindly the suggestion. They loved her too well to distress her, but were afraid she was caught by the little blind idol, and said no more. Soon after this, his father and aunt proposed a match to him of a young lady of fortune at B——h; he knew the lady, but he could think of none but Nancy. His father was in earnest, and invited her guardian to dine, with a view to bring it on. Nancy now grew very uneasy, and got Mrs. Wilton to ask Sir William to let her go and see her mother; he consented, and told Mrs. Wilton when he was gone to London to take the chaise and go with her, the ride would do her good, and that Billings should ride by their side, and bade her carry some good things, as rich cordials, fruits, and wines for a present to Nancy's mother, and he gave her a guinea to carry to Nancy to buy any trifles she wanted for the journey.

In a week Sir William and his son set out for London; the night before, he met her in the Green-walk with Katy, and sought to retain her, but she was on her guard, and kept close with her mate. Nancy now was easy, and the day was spent very agreeably by her with Mrs. Wilton and Katy. She went out in the forenoon to call on Miss Collet, Miss Harmel, Miss Rolfe, and to take leave of them, as she intended to go home the next day. These young ladies being very fond of her company, charged her not to stay long at E——n, for they now expected more of her company; as she had nothing to keep her immured in Trenchard manor, they intended to share her among them, and "Nancy (said Miss Collet) you need not be shy of coming here now on Mr. Trenchard's account. My word for it, he will be among the first of us to court your conversation." Nancy replied, "I don't understand you, Miss Collet, you affect to talk in the clouds." No matter, said Polly, observing Nancy to look confused, "the clouds will soon disappear when the sun arises; you may be Lady T——d yet" Nancy beg'd she would not banter her, as her spirits were too low to jest. "going to leave my friends here, said she, and know not whether ever I shall see them again!" A sigh and a tear then started, but she suppressed them, and said, "adieu, Miss Collet." "Stop, a word in your ear, Miss Pelham; Mr. Harmel tells me Mr. Trenchard is certainly in love; he hates the words fortune, family, birth, titles, &c. and wishes there was common sense enough in the world to banish such idle distinctions. This he said a few club nights ago to Jack Denham, to my brother, and Mr. Harmel, but he never mentioned it to any but me; adding, that he said he would lay a hundred guineas my Amanda had made herself mistress of his Strephon." Nancy was then in the gate-way, and went out without making any other reply than, "It is all a chimera, Mr. Harmel is vastly out in his guess, I can assure him."

In the afternoon she sat with the women. Towards night they wanted to go on some errands, and as Nancy was in haste to finish some work she was doing for Mrs. Butler, she chose to stay alone, which she could do without fear, as Mr. Trenchard was gone his journey, intending to take leave of Mrs. Butler in the morning before she went. As Sir William and Mr. Trenchard were out of town, Mrs. Wilton thought it proper for her to keep below, the better to guard the house; so they all sat in the little parlour, which used to be the lady's adjoining to the dining room. There Nancy was sitting alone at her work with an easier mind than she had been mistress of for many weeks, when suddenly a person's voice aroused her with the words, "Where are all the folks?" The parlour door opened, and Mr. Trenchard entered in his riding dress. He was rejoiced to find her alone, and with a pleasant voice asked her how she did, and threw himself on the settee where she was. She trembled, turned pale, and her work fell from her fingers. He took her by the hand with a respectful though free air, and desired her to sit, for she rose to go out, but he prevented her by retaining her hand. Her terror, he saw, but did not once guess the cause; he begged her to be composed, and give him her ear, told her that he came back on her account to open his mind and his heart to her; he had sought an opportunity long, but she had cruelly prevented him, and he must avail himself of this opportunity; he could not be happy without her, and she must be his unless she was engaged elsewhere; he was going on from these general declarations to explain his meaning, but she fearing the worst, besought him with tears to have regard to himself, his deceased mother, his family, his own credit, and not take advantage of her youth, low fortune, and dependant state. He was moved, but not thinking she meant to doubt his honour, proceeded and told her, he chose her before all her sex, and he should be always miserable if he did not attain her; he valued not fortune; he wanted nothing but her, and she and only she could content him. She modestly replied, she was astonished; she could not yet entertain a thought of the nature, and begged with earnestness he would say nothing of this kind, but let her retire. He saw her distressed, and yielded to her request on her engaging to return to supper at his desire, saying, "Mrs. Wilton and Katy shall sup with us." After she went up, the women came in, and were much surprised to find him at home. Mrs. Wilton expressed it to him, and he told her "he found there were some company to be of the party that were not agreeable to him, and so he chose to come back." He ordered a table to be set for four, saying, "it is dull to eat alone." When supper was on table he asked for Nancy, and was told, "she was ill and gone to bed;" this hint suggested to him the cause of her distress. The next morning as they all breakfasted together, she could not avoid going in, but was easier in her mind, as Mrs. Wilton now knew her situation, and was her kind friend, assuring her of her protection and vigilant care: for upon going up the last night after supper to see what was the matter with Nancy, and finding her on the bed in bitter agony, she insisted on knowing the cause, which she was at first afraid to reveal, but Mrs. Wilton suggesting to her that she believed she could guess, and asking her if Mr. Trenchard had seen her? she answered with tears, "O yes." Mrs. Wilton told her if any thing about him gave her uneasiness, she might with safety reveal it to her, and she would be in this and all other cases her steady friend; her honour was concerned in protecting her, as she had given her word to Mrs. Butler. This opened the way for Nancy to vent all her thoughts and fears. Mrs.

Wilton

Wilfon was equally alarmed, but told her, "Come don't let us judge too hastily; if he prevents your going to-morrow, as he now knows is your purpose, I shall be as afraid as you; in that case I would have you fly the house, go to Dr. Butler's, and from thence home in the stage immediately, this shall be a test." Nancy, as we may well judge, was unfit to appear at breakfast, but it was most prudent to go; she did, but said nothing all the time, until he asked her when she went to E—n; she answered to day. Upon which he turned to Mrs. Wilfon, and said, you can't to-day, for Billings must settle an affair for me, and it will be unsafe for you to go without him, but if you stay 'till to-morrow, he shall attend you, and you know there was a robbery near K—— Bridge a little while since." This, said with a sweet kind look, and so plausible, satisfied Mrs. Wilfon and Katy, but added to Nancy's fears, remembering Mr. Wilfon's remark, and the test as he called it the night before. She was so affected with her own apprehensions, that she could not quite refrain the crystal memorial. Upon breakfasting, she immediately withdrew. He staid below, he traversed the rooms, the gardens, and the walks; he roamed thro' the chambers in hopes of seeing her, not caring now to go into the women's apartments; he saw her kept at a distance, nor thought; he tried could he get at her speech. Nancy was so uneasy at his detaining them, notwithstanding Mrs. Wilfon thought he meant all in kindness (as he really did to her, and to answer his own purpose) that she resolved to go to Mrs. Butler's and spend the day there. Mrs. Wilfon told her, "she had better, since she was so uneasy, but begged her not to drop a hint there about these affairs. Mr. Trenchard's character ought not to be called in question but on full proof." Nancy had no thoughts of it, and eased Mrs. Wilfon on this head. She dressed and went down—but as she was passing to the common gate, Mr. Trenchard was on the front terrace, and saw her: he hastened through the court yard, which was separated from the other by Chinese railings (with arborets on each side for communications) and through one of the arborets, coming up to her spoke very familiarly, "where are you going so early, Miss Nancy?" She told him, to take leave of her friends, and spend the day with Mrs. Butler, before she went out of town. He begged "she would not stay the day." She said the most. "This is cruel, said he, when I told you I came home on your account. Why cannot you stay one day here where you have staid so many years?" He saw her moved, and thinking she was changing her purpose, said, "I wonder you cannot stay at home for one day. Why won't you?" She burst into tears, "because, Sir, I cannot bear the house." He wondering said, "why, what is the matter?" She was determined now to be open and replied, "not while you are in it, Mr. Trenchard, for I do not know but my honour, my virtue, and my peace, depend on one day there. What else, Sir, can I think of your conduct?" She turned pale and could say no more. He was tenderly astonished to see her grief and distress, and told her, "he had no views but honourable ones: if ever man was sincere in avowing a just regard to woman, he was the man. He never once thought of addressing her in another light; that she was the person he chose for his wife; had fought often and often for months past to acquaint her with it, but she had prevented his declaration. Adding it is very hard, Miss Nancy, that I can have no place in all this manor, but a common yard to pay my suit to you in." She now knew not what to say, nor what to think; but said, at last, "she must go and dine at Dr. Butler's, and wait on Dr. Brice's Lady, Madam Warburton, and Mrs. Bannister, or they would not forgive her." "Indeed you must not, unless you intend to insult me. If you have any regard to good manners, and they are essential to your character, I beg you to return before the day is gone." She then was forced to promise she would. She went and dined with Mrs. Butler, paid her respects to the other ladies, called at two or three of the tenant's houses, and got home before dark.

Of every one's thinking he has some Advantage over his Neighbour in some particular Point.

THOUGH nothing is so common as to find every man dissatisfied with the lot in which Providence has placed him, yet nothing is so certain as that no man, (take his situation all in all) would be his neighbour instead of himself. The great Father of the universe has graciously planted an inherent sort of pride in the breast of all his creatures, which exalts them in their own opinion, and gives him an advantage over the rest of the world in some particular point that compensates for a thousand inconveniences, and reconciles him to real or imaginary evils upon the whole.

If we examine the frame of the human mind, we shall immediately see that every man holds much the same opinion of himself self which he entertains of his country : he readily acknowledges, that in some particular circumstances such and such a person has an advantage over him ; but in the main thinks himself the superior, and looks down with an air of disdain upon all who are hardy enough to dispute his pretensions. A modern Author has not described this national vanity unhappily :

E'er the pale Russian shivering, as he lies

Beneath the horror of his bitterest skies,
While the loud tempest rattles o'er his head,

Or bursts all dreadful on his tott'ring shed,

Hugs a soft something closely to his soul,
Which soothes the cutting sharpness of the pole,

Elates his bosom with a conscious pride,
And smiles contempt on all the world beside.

But when we consider these foundations for happiness which Providence has placed in the minds of all his creatures, we cannot help admiring the goodness of the Divine Being, in making our very foibles a source of our felicity, and creating such fountains of satisfaction from such inconsiderable means. What gratitude is there not then due to so all-sufficiently wise and beneficent a hand? Devotion itself is lost in admiration in so stupendous a bounty, and scarcely knows which most to worship or adore.

But notwithstanding we derive so much pleasure from the indulgence of particular foibles, we ought always to be uncommonly careful how we take any satisfaction in indulging our faults. Those, though for a moment they may afford us some degree of felicity, are always productive of anxiety and wretchedness in the end. Unfashionable as the doctrine of virtue and morality may appear, experience however fully convinceth us, that nothing else can lay a solid foundation for happiness, and that every other basis is, literally speaking, building on the sand, and grasping alone at emptiness and air.

BRITISH and IRISH BIOGRAPHY,

Containing the Lives of the most eminent Natives of Great-Britain and Ireland, in an alphabetical Series. With a succinct Account of their Writings. (Continued from our last, p. 365.)

CHICHLEY, or Chichely (Henry) Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Henry V. and VI. was born of an obscure family at Higham Ferrers, in Northamptonshire. After being instructed in grammar learning at Winchester school, he became fellow of New college, in Oxford, where he took the degree of doctor in the civil and canon law. About the year 1402, he was appointed archdeacon of Salisbury; which preferment he exchanged two years after for the chancellorship of that diocese. In 1407, he was sent ambassador by king Henry IV. to congratulate Gregory XII. on his advancement to the papacy; and the bishopric of St. David's becoming vacant whilst he was at Rome, he was promoted to that see by the pope, who consecrated him with his own hands. In 1409, he assisted at the council of Pisa; and in 1414, upon the death of archbishop Arundel, was translated to the see of Canterbury. In a parliament held the same year at Leicester, he artfully persuaded Henry V. to engage in a war with France, which he thought would find sufficient employment for his ambitious and active spirit, and divert him from his purpose of seizing the revenues of the clergy. About the year 1424, our prelate founded a noble college at Higham-Ferrers, the place of his birth, in honour of the Blessed Virgin, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and king Edward the Confessor, for eight fellows, four clerks, and six choristers. He also built a spacious hospital for the poor of that place.

In 1437, archbishop Chichley caused a large and stately edifice to be erected in the north part of the suburbs of Oxford, which he designed for the college. But, when the work was almost finished, whether it was that he found fault with the structure, or did not like the situation of it, he changed his mind, and gave it to the monks of St. Bernard, for the reception of novices out of all the convents of that order, to study the arts and divinity. However, he chose another place for building a college, very commodious for the students, in the middle of the town, near St. Mary's church; and pulling down the houses which stood there, he laid out a square court. The walls of this new building were finished about the latter end of the year 1439, and the workmen had begun to lay the roof. The archbishop had purchased lands and manors for the perpetual maintenance thereof; and the king, upon the archbishop's application, by his letters patent, constituted this building a college, and granted it very ample privileges. The primate went the next year to Oxford, where he solemnly consecrated the chapel of his college, and made Richard Andrew, doctor of laws, and chancellor of Canterbury, warden of it. He also appointed twenty fellows out of the university, to whom he gave power to elect into their society twenty more; of which number he ordered, that twenty-four should study divinity and the liberal sciences, and the other sixteen the civil and canon law. He likewise commanded all the members of his foundation to pray for the souls of king Henry V. of Thomas duke of Clarence, and of the nobility and common soldiers who had been killed in the French war. For which reason he ordered his college to be called, The College of All Souls departed in the Faith. Besides these and other benefactions, he contributed largely to the building of Croydon church, and Rochester bridge. This eminent prelate died on the 12th of April, 1443, after having enjoyed the archiepiscopal see upwards of twenty-nine years; and was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury.

The Life of the Duke of Marlborough.

Churchill (John) duke of Marlborough, and prince of the holy Roman empire, was the eldest son of Sir Winston Churchill, and was born at Ashe, in Devonshire, on Midsummer-day, in the year 1650. A clergyman in the neighbourhood instructed him in the first principles of literature; but his father having other views than what a learned education afforded, carried him very early to court, where he was particularly favoured by James duke of York, when he was no more than twelve years of age. He had a pair of colours given him in the guards about the year 1666; and afterwards obtained permission to go over to Tangier, then in our hands, and besieged by the Moors; where he resided for some time, and cultivated with attention the science of arms. In 1672, the duke of Monmouth commanding a body of English auxiliaries in the service of France, Mr. Churchill attended him, and was soon after made a captain of grenadiers in the duke's own regiment. He had a share in all the actions of that famous campaign against the Dutch; and at the siege of Nimeguen distinguished himself so eminently, that he was particularly taken notice of by the celebrated Marshal Turenne, who bestowed on him the name of the Handsome Englishman. He shone out also with so much éclat at the reduction of Maeltricht, that the French king thanked him for his behaviour at the head of the line; and assured him, that he would acquaint his sovereign with it; which he did: and the duke of Monmouth, on his return to England, told the king his father, how much he had been indebted to the bravery of captain Churchill.

The laurels he brought from France very justly entitled him to preferment at home; his majesty therefore made him a lieutenant-colonel, and the duke of York appointed him gentleman of his bed-chamber, and soon after master of the robes. In 1682, he was created baron of Eymouth in Scotland, and colonel of the third troop of guards. He was continued in all his posts upon the coming of James II. to the crown, who sent him also his ambassador to France to notify his accession. On his return, he assisted at the coronation, on the 23d of April, 1685; and in May following was created a peer of England, by the title of baron Churchill, of Sandwich, in the county of Hertford. In June the same year, lord Churchill, being then lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, was ordered into the west to suppress the duke of Monmouth's rebellion; which he did in a month's time, with an inconsiderable body of horse, and took the duke himself prisoner. He was extremely well received by James at his return from this victory, but soon discovered, as it is said, the bad effects it produced, by confirming the king in an opinion, that, by virtue of a standing army, the religion and government of England might easily be changed. How far lord Churchill concurred with, or opposed the king, while he was forming this project, is not sufficiently known. He does not appear to have been guilty of any mean compliances, or to have had any concern in advising or executing the violent proceedings of that unhappy reign: on the contrary, bishop Burnet tells us, that, "he very prudently declined meddling much in business, spoke little except when his advice was asked, and then always recommended moderate measures." It is said, he declared very early to lord Galway, that, if his matter attempted to overturn the established religion, he would leave him; and that he signed the memorial transmitted to the prince and princess of Orange, by which they were invited to rescue this nation from popery and slavery. Be this as it will, it is certain that he remained with, and was entrusted by, the king, after the prince of Orange had landed in England. He attended king James, when he marched with his forces to oppose the prince, and had the command of five thousand men; but the earl of Feversham, suspecting his inclinations, advised the king to seize him. The king's affection to him was so great, that he could not be prevailed upon to do it; and this left him at liberty to go over to the prince; which he accordingly did, but without betraying any post, or carrying off any troops. Whoever considers the great obligations lord Churchill lay under to king James, must naturally conclude, that he could not take the resolution of deserting him, and withdrawing to the prince of Orange, but with infinite concern and regret; and that this was really the case, appears very evident from a letter which he left for the king, explaining the reasons of his conduct.

The prince and princess of Orange being declared king and queen of England, on the 13th of February, 1689, lord Churchill was, the next day, sworn one of their privy-council, and one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber; and on the 9th of April following, was raised to the dignity of earl of Marlborough. He assisted at the coronation of their majesties, and was soon after made commander in chief of the English forces sent over to Holland. He presided at the battle of Walcourt, which was fought on the 15th of August, 1689, and gave such extraordinary proofs of his skill, that prince Waldeck, speaking in his commendation to king William, declared, "that he saw more into the art of war in a day, than some generals in many years." In September, 1690, he arrived in Ireland with 5000 English troops, and being joined by the duke of Wirtemberg, laid siege to Cork, which was surrendered on the 28th of that month. In October following, he reduced the town of Kinsale, and then returned with his prisoners to England. These services, however, did not prevent his being disgraced in a very sudden manner; for being in waiting at court, as a gentleman of the bed-chamber, and having introduced to his majesty, lord George Hamilton, he was soon followed to his own house by that same lord, with this short and surprising message, "That the king had no further occasion for his service;" the more surprising, as his majesty, just before, had not discovered the least coldness or displeasure towards him. This cause of his disgrace is not even at present known; but only suspected to have proceeded from his too close attachment to the interest of the princess Anne. This strange and unexpected blow was followed by one much stranger; for, soon after he was committed to the Tower for high-treason, but was released, and acquitted, upon the whole being discovered to be nothing more than the effect of a vile conspiracy against him. After queen Mary's death, king William thought proper to recall the earl of Marlborough to his privy council; and, on the 19th of June, 1698, appointed him governor to the duke of Gloucester, with this extraordinary compliment, "My lord, make him but what you are, and my nephew will be all I wish to see him." His lordship continued in favour to the time of the king's death, as appears from his having been three times appointed one of the lords justices during his absence; namely, on the 16th of July, 1698; the 31st of May, 1699; and the 27th of June, 1700.

As soon as it was discerned, that the death of Charles II. of Spain, would become the occasion of another general war, the king sent a body of troops over to Holland, and made lord Marlborough commander in chief of them. He appointed him also ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the states-general, upon which he repaired immediately to Holland. The king following, and taking a view of the force, dined with the earl of Marlborough at his quarters on the 30th of September, 1701; and this was one of the last marks of honour and favour he received from king William, who died on the 8th of March following. About a week after the king's death, his lordship was honoured with the order of the garter; soon after which, he was declared captain-general of all her majesty's forces, and immediately sent over to the Hague with the same character as before. The states not only concurred in all that he proposed, but, of their own motion, constituted him captain-general of their forces, with an appointment of 100,000 florins per annum. On his return to England, he found the queen's council already divided; some being for carrying on the war as auxiliaries only; others for declaring against France and Spain immediately, and so becoming principals at once. The earl of Marlborough joined with the latter; and these carrying their point, war was declared on the 4th of May, 1702. His lordship took the command on the 20th of June; and, in the first campaign, made himself master of the castles of Gravenbroeck and Waerts, the towns of Venlo, Ruemond, and Stavenwaert, together with the city and citadel of Liege. The army separating on the third of November, the earl was taken next day, in his passage by water, by a party of thirty Frenchmen from the garrison at Guedres; when, by an admirable presence of mind, he shewed them an old passport belonging to his brother, which he happened to have in his pocket, and discovered so little concern, that he was suffered to proceed, and arrived at the Hague, to the inexpressible joy of the people, who were in the utmost consternation at the accident which had befallen him. On his return to England, he received the thanks of both houses of parliament, for his great and signal services, which were so acceptable to the queen, that she created him a duke, and gratified him with a pension of 5000*l.* per annum out of the post-office during her own life.

He was on the point of returning to Holland, when on the 8th of February, 1702-3, his only son the marquis of Blandford, died at Cambridge, at the age of eighteen. This afflicting accident did not, however, long retard his grace; but he passed over to Holland, and he arrived at the Hague in the beginning of April. The limits of our work will not suffer us to relate all the military actions in which the duke of Marlborough was engaged; it is sufficient to say, that, numerous as they were, they were all successful. When the campaign of the year 1703 was over, his grace went to Dusseldorp, to meet the late emperor, then styled Charles III. king of Spain, who made him a present of a rich sword from his side; and then returning to the Hague, after a very short stay, came over to England. On the 8th of April, 1704, he embarked for Holland, from whence in May following he began his march into Germany: and after a conference held with prince Eugene of Savoy, and Lewis Baden, he arrived in sight of the enemy at Schellenberg, whom, after a very obstinate and bloody engagement, he entirely routed on the 2d of July. On this occasion the emperor wrote him a letter of thanks, and offered him the title of a prince of the empire; which the duke modestly declined, till the queen afterwards commanded him to accept of it. On the 2d of August he gained the battle of Hochster, when the French and Bavarians were the greatest part of them killed or taken, and their commander, marshal Tallard, made a prisoner. After this glorious action, by which the empire was saved, and the whole electorate of Bavaria conquered, the duke pursued the enemy till he forced them to repass the Rhine. Then prince Lewis of Baden laid siege to Landau, while the duke and prince Eugene covered it, but it was not taken before the 12th of November. His grace made a tour alto to Berlin; and, by a short negotiation suspended the disputes between the king of Prussia and the Dutch, by which he gained the good will of both parties. When the campaign was over, he returned to Holland, and on the 14th of December, arrived in England. He brought with him marshal Tallard, and 26 other officers of distinction; 171 standards, and 129 colours; which, by her majesty's order, were put up in Westminster-hall. He was received by the queen and her royal consort, with the highest marks of esteem, and had the solemn thanks of both houses of parliament. The commons in address, besought her majesty to take some proper means to perpetuate the memory of the duke's great services; in consequence of which she granted the manor of Woodstock, with the hundred of Wotton, to him and his heirs for ever. On the 6th of January, his grace was entertained by the city; and, on the 8th of February, the commons addressed the queen to testify their thanks for the treaty which the duke had concluded with the court of Berlin, by which a large body of Prussian troops were sent to the assistance of the duke of Savoy.

In March following, 1705, he went over to Holland, with a design to execute some great schemes he had projected in the winter. The campaign was attended with some successes, which would have made a considerable figure in a campaign under any other general, but were scarcely worth mentioning where the duke of Marlborough commanded. He could not carry into execution his main project, on account of the impediments he met with from the allies; and in this respect was greatly disappointed. The season for action being over, he made a tour to the courts of Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover; at the first of which, he acquired the confidence and friendship of the new emperor Joseph, who presented him with the principality of Mindelheim. He then returned to the Hague, and, towards the close of the year, arrived in England. All things being concerted for rendering the next year's campaign more successful than the former, the duke, in the beginning of April, 1706, embarked for Holland. On the 12th of May, being Whitsunday, he gained the battle of Ramillies, in which 50 pieces of cannon were taken, and 120 standards and colours. The advantages gained by this victory were so much improved by the vigilance and wisdom of the duke, that Louvain, Brussels, Mechlin, Ghent, and Bruges, submitted to king Charles III. of Spain without a stroke; and Oudenarde surrendered on the first summons. The city of Antwerp followed this example. And thus, in the short space of a fortnight, the duke reduced all Brabant, and the marquisate of the holy empire, to the obedience of king Charles. He afterwards took the towns of Ostend, Menin, Dendermonde, and Aeth. He arrived at London on the 18th of November; and though at this time there was a party formed against him at court, yet the great services he had done the nation, and the personal esteem the queen always had for him, procured him an universal good reception. The house of commons, in their address to the queen, spoke of the success of the campaign in general, and of the duke of Marlborough's share in particular, in the strongest terms imaginable; and the day after unanimously voted him their thanks; and the lords did the same. The latter went still farther; for on the 17th of December, they addressed the the queen for leave to bring in a bill to settle the duke's honours on his posterity. This was granted; and Blenheim-house, with the manor of Woodstock, were, after the decease of the duchess, upon whom they were settled in jointure, entailed in the same manner with the honours. Two days after this, the standards and colours taken at Ramillies being carried in state through the city, in order to be hung up in Guildhall, his grace of Marlborough was invited to dine with the lord-mayor, which he accordingly did.

The campaign of the year 1707 proved the most barren one he ever made; which was chiefly owing to a failure on the part of the allies, who began to flag in supporting the common cause. Nor did things go on more to his mind at home; for, upon his return to England at the end of the campaign, he found that the fire, which he suspected the year before, had broke out in his absence; that the queen had a female favourite, who was in a fair way of supplanting his duchess; and that she listened to the insinuations of a statesman, who was no friend to him. He bore all this with firmness and patience, though he easily saw whither it tended; and went to Holland early in the spring of the year 1708, arriving at the Hague on the 19th of March. The ensuing campaign was carried on by the duke, in conjunction with prince Eugene, with such amazing success, that the French king thought proper, in the beginning of the year 1709, to set on foot a negotiation for peace; which, however, proved ineffectual. The house of commons this year gave an uncommon testimony of their respect for the duke of Marlborough; for, besides addressing the queen, they, on the 22d of January, 1708-9, unanimously voted thanks to his grace, and ordered them to be transmitted to him abroad by the speaker. The duke returned to England the 25th of February; and, on his first appearance in the house of lords, received the thanks of that august assembly. In the next campaign his grace took Tournay, and, on the 11th of September, the famous battle of Malplaquet was fought, in which, after a bloody engagement, the French were entirely defeated; and this victory was succeeded by the surrender of Mons. The duke arriving at St. James's the 10th of November, was soon after honoured with the thanks of both houses; and the queen appointed him lord-lieutenant and custos rotundorum of the county of Oxford. Towards the latter end of February 1710, his grace repaired to the Hague, where he met with prince Eugene; and these two famous generals set out together for the army, which was assembled in the neighbourhood of Tournay. This campaign was very successful, many towns and fortresses being reduced: notwithstanding which, when the duke came over to England, he found his interest declining, and his services set at nought. Upon the meeting of the parliament, no notice was taken in the addresses of the duke's success; an attempt, indeed, was made to procure him the thanks of the house of peers, but it was eagerly opposed by the duke of Argyle. His grace was kindly received by the queen, who seemed desirous of his living upon good terms with her new ministry; but this was thought impracticable. In January 1711, he carried the golden key, the ensign of the duchess of Marlborough's dignity, to the queen, and resigned all her employments with great duty and submission. He set out for Holland in February, to prepare for the next campaign, which, at the same time, he knew would be his last. He exerted himself to the utmost extent of his valour and capacity. He embarked for England when the campaign was over, and arrived there about the middle of November. He acquainted her majesty, in the audience he had at his arrival, that, as he could not concur in the measures of those who directed her councils, so he would not distract them by a fruitless opposition. Nevertheless, finding himself attacked in the house of lords, and loaded with the imputation of having protracted the war for his own private interest, he vindicated his conduct and character with great dignity and spirit: and, in a most pathetic speech, appealed to the queen his mistress, who was there incognito, for the falseness of that imputation; declaring that he was as much for peace as any man, provided it was such a peace as might be expected from a war undertaken on so just motives, and carried on with uninterrupted success. This had a great effect on that august assembly, and perhaps made some impression on the queen; but, at the same time, it gave such an edge to the resentment of his enemies, who were then in power, that they resolved, at all events, to remove him. Soon afterwards an enquiry was promoted in the house of commons, to fix a disgraceful imputation upon the duke, as if he had pocketed very large sums of public money. When a question to this purpose had been carried, her majesty, by letter, acquainted him that she had no farther occasion for his service, and dismissed him from all his employments. He was from this time exposed to a most painful persecution. On the one hand, he was attacked by the clamours of the populace, and by those licentious scribblers, who are always ready to espouse the quarrels of a ministry, and to insult, without mercy, whatever they know may be insulted with impunity. On the other hand, a prosecution was commenced against him by the attorney-general, for applying public money to his private use; and the workmen employed in building Blenheim-house, though set at work by the crown, were encouraged to sue his grace for the money that was due to them. All his actions were also shamefully misrepresented. Those uneasinesses, added to his grief for the death of the earl of Godolphin, inclined the duke to gratify his enemies by a voluntary exile. Accordingly, he embarked at Dover, on the 14th of November, 1712; and landing at Ostend, went from thence to Antwerp, and afterwards to Aix-la-Chapelle, being every where received with the honours due to his high rank and merit. His grace returned to England in the year 1714, arriving at London three days after the queen's death. He was received with all possible demonstrations of joy by those who were then entrusted with the government; and upon the arrival of king George I. was particularly distinguished by acts of royal favour; for he was again declared captain-general of all his majesty's land-forces, colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, and master of the ordnance. His advice was of great use in concerting those measures by which the rebellion in the year 1715 was crushed; and his advice on this occasion was the last effort he made in respect to public affairs; for his infirmities increasing with his years, he retired from business, and spent the greatest part of his time, during the remainder of his life, at one or other of his country-houses. He died on the 16th of June, 1722, in his seventy-third year, at Windford-lodge; and was interred in Westminster-abbey. To sum up his character, he was the most accomplished courtier of his time, an able statesman, and a consummate general. Besides the marquis of Blandford, whom we have already mentioned, his grace had four daughters, who married into some of the best families of the kingdom.

Life of Mr. Charles Churchill.

Churchill (Charles) a celebrated satirist, was the son of the reverend Mr. Charles Churchill, curate and lecturer of St. John's, Westminster, and was born in 1731. He was educated at Westminster-school; where having one day an exercise to make, and, through inattention or idleness, having failed to bring it at the appointed time, his master thought proper to chastise him severely, and even reproached him with stupidity: what the fear of stripes could not effect, the fear of shame soon produced, and he the next day brought his exercise finished in such a manner, that he received the public thanks of all the masters. He was afterwards refused admittance into the university of Oxford, for want of proper skill in the learned languages; and, in consequence of this repulse, was obliged to resume his studies at Westminster-school, where, at seventeen years of age, he contracted an intimacy with the lady whom he afterwards married. At the usual age of going into orders, Mr. Churchill was ordained by the late bishop of London, notwithstanding he had taken no degree, nor studied in either of our universities; and the first employment he had in the church, was a curacy of thirty pounds a year in Wales. To this remote part of the kingdom he carried his wife; they took a small house, and he passed through the duties of his station with assiduity and cheerfulness. He was beloved and esteemed by his parishioners, and though his sermons were above the level of his audience, they were commended and followed. In order to eke out his scanty finances, he entered into a branch of trade, which he thought might end in riches, but which involved him in debts that pressed him for some years after; this was no other than keeping a cyder cellar, and dealing in this liquor through that part of the country. A poet is but ill qualified for merchandise, where small gains are to be patiently expected, and carefully accumulated. He had neither patience for the one, nor economy for the other; and a sort of rural bankruptcy was the consequence of his attempt. Upon leaving Wales, he came to London, and his father dying soon after, he stept into the church in which that gentleman had officiated. In order to improve his income, which scarcely produced an hundred pounds a year, he undertook to teach young ladies to read and write English, and was employed for this purpose in the boarding-school of Mrs. Dennis, where he behaved with that decorum which was suitable to his profession. His method of living, however, bearing no proportion to his revenue, he contracted several debts in the city, which he found himself unable to pay; and a jail, the continual terror of indigent genius, seemed now ready to complete his misfortunes. From this wretched state of uneasiness he was relieved by the benevolence of Mr. Lloyd, father to the poet of that name, who paid his debts, or at least satisfied his creditors.

In the mean time, while Mr. Lloyd, the father, was thus relieving Mr. Churchill by his bounty, Mr. Lloyd, the son, began to excite him by his example. The Actor, a poem, written by this gentleman, and addressed to Bonnel Thornton, was read and approved by all the judges of poetical merit, and gave the author a distinguished place among the writers of his age. The reputation Mr. Lloyd acquired by this poem, induced his friend Churchill to write the celebrated Rosciad, which was received with great applause. The next performance of Mr. Churchill was his Apology to the Critical Reviewers, which also met with a favourable reception from the public. But while his writings thus amused the town, it was disgusted by his actions. He now quitted his wife, resigned his gown, and all clerical functions, commenced a complete man of the town, drank to excess, frequented stews, and, giddy with applause, seemed to think his talents a sufficient atonement for all the absurdities of his conduct. He now wrote a poem called Night, which was soon followed by the Ghost, the Prophecy of Famine, and other pieces. About the year 1764, he went over to Boulogne, on a visit to Mr. Wilkes, and was there attacked by a military fever, which carried him off in a few days. After his death, his poems were collected and printed together, in two volumes, octavo.

Life of Colley Cibber, Esq.

Cibber (Colley) Esq; a very eminent comedian and dramatic writer, was the son of Caius Gabriel Cibber, a native of Holstein, and was born at London on the 6th of November, 1671. In 1682 he was sent to the free-school of Grantham, in Lincolnshire; and having remained there about five years, was preparing to go to the university, in order to qualify himself for the church, when, in the year 1688, he was incited to take arms in favour of the prince of Orange, under the earl of Devonshire. Soon after this, he betook himself to the stage, for which he had conceived a very early inclination; but he did not meet with much encouragement at first, being full three quarters of a year before he obtained a salary of ten shillings per week. The first part in which he appeared with any glimpse of success, was the Chaplain in the Orphan; he then distinguished tinguished himself in the part of lord Touchwood, in Congreve's Double Dealer; and next in the character of Fondlewife, in the Old Bachelor. He was not, however, advanced in the manner he had reason to expect; and therefore, that he might appear in a new rank of distinction, he wrote his first play, called Love's last Shift, which was acted in 1695, wherein he performed the part of Sir Novelty Fashion. This comedy met with the success it deserved; and the character of the Pop was so admirably represented by Mr. Cibber, that he was thenceforward allowed to excel all other actors in parts of that cast. From this period he applied himself to the writing of plays; and "it is observable," says he, "that my muse and my ipouise were equally prolific; that the one was seldom the mother of a child, but in the same year the other made me the father of a play. I think we had a dozen of each sort between us, of both which kinds some died in their infancy, and near an equal number of each were alive when I quitted the theatre." Of all his plays, none was of more importance to the public and himself, than the Nonjuror, which was acted in 1717: it rendered him the constant butt of all the enemies of the government, and by laying the foundation of a misunderstanding between him and Mr. Pope, at length raised him to be the hero of the Dunciad. However, king George I. to whom it was dedicated, ordered Mr. Cibber two hundred pounds; and from the merit of this performance, he, in 1730, became poet laureat, which office he enjoyed till his death. He wrote, 1. The Careless Husband: 2. The Double Gallant: 3. The Lady's last Stake: 4. Perolla and Izadora: 5. The Refusal: 6. The Rival Fools: 7. The School-Boy: 8. She wou'd and she wou'd not: 9. Woman's Wit: 10. Venus and Adonis: 11. Love makes a Man: 12. The Comical Lovers: 13. Damon and Phillida; and many other dramatic pieces, besides some pamphlets. He died in December, 1757, at the age of eighty-six.

Life of Dr. Samuel Clarke.

Clarke (Dr. Samuel) one of the greatest divines that any age has produced, was born at Norwich on the 11th of October, 1675; his father, Edward Clarke, Esq; being alderman of that city, and one of its representatives in parliament. He was instructed in classical learning at the free-school of his native place; and, in 1691, removed from thence to Caius college, Cambridge, where his uncommon genius and abilities soon began to display themselves. He greatly contributed to the establishment of the Newtonian philosophy by an excellent translation of, and notes upon, Robault's Physics, which he finished before he had attained to the twenty-second year of his age. Having taken holy orders, he became chaplain to Dr. John Moore, bishop of Norwich, who gave him the rectory of Drayton in that diocese. In the years 1704 and 1705 he was appointed to preach Mr. Boyle's lecture. In 1706 he translated Sir Isaac Newton's Optics into elegant Latin; and, the same year, his patron, the bishop of Norwich, procured for him the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf. He was soon after made chaplain in ordinary to queen Anne, and, in 1709, was presented to the rectory of St. James's, Westminster. Upon his advancement to this station, he took the degree of doctor in divinity, and acquitted himself with great applause in the public exercise which he performed on that occasion. In 1712 he published a most beautiful and correct edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, dedicated to the duke of Marlborough; and in the same year appeared his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, which engaged him in a warm controversy. In the years 1715 and 1716 he was engaged in a dispute with Mr. Leibnitz, concerning the principles of natural philosophy and religion; and the letters which passed between them on that subject, were published at London in 1717. Upon the death of Sir Isaac Newton, in 1727, he was offered the place of master of the mint; but this he refused, as inconsistent with his character. In the beginning of the year 1729, he published the twelve first books of Homer's Iliad, with the Latin version accurately corrected, and learned notes; but before he had finished the rest, he was taken suddenly ill, and died on the 17th of May, in that year. His Exposition of the Church Catechism, and ten volumes of his sermons, were published after his death. His works, which are numerous, and of which those we have mentioned form but a part, will remain a perpetual monument of his learning and abilities. He was possessed of the most amiable disposition; his piety was manly and unaffected, and his charity as extensive as the whole rational creation.

Life of Sir Edward Coke.

Coke (Sir Edward) the great oracle of the law, and lord chief justice of the King's-Bench in the reign of James I. was the son of Robert Coke, Esq; of Mileham in the county of Norfolk, and was born at his father's seat in the year 1550. He received his education at the free-school of Norwich, and at Trinity-college in Cambridge. Having studied in the university about four years, he removed to Clifford's Inn, London; and was soon after entered a student of the Inner Temple. He had not been long in this last place before he gave a proof of his extraordinary abilities; a case relating to the cook of the Temple, which had puzzled all the lawyers, was stated by him in such a masterly manner, as attracted the admiration of the whole bench of judges. It was probably on account of this specimen of his abilities, that he was called to the bar when but of six years standing; and having married a lady of great fortune, he was soon advanced to the most considerable dignities. The cities of Norwich and Coventry chose him their recorder; the county of Norfolk elected him one of their representatives in parliament; and the House of Commons made him their speaker in the 35th year of queen Elizabeth. That princess appointed him her solicitor-general in 1592, and her attorney-general the year following. In May 1603, he was knighted by king James I. and in November the same year he managed the trial of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, whom, it must be confessed, he treated with a scurrility of language that can by no means be justified; calling him, with a virulence almost beyond example, traitor, monster, viper, and spider of hell. In 1606 he was appointed lord chief justice of the Common-Pleas; and, in 1613, lord chief justice of the King's Bench, and a member of the privy-council: but happening to give offence to the court, partly by a dispute which he had with the lord chancellor Egerton, concerning the jurisdiction of their respective courts, partly by his too eager prosecution of the murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury, and partly by an opinion he had delivered with regard to the king's power in ecclesiastical affairs; he was, in the year 1616, removed from the office of lord chief justice. In December 1621, Sir Edward, on account of his spirited opposition to the measures of the court in the House of Commons, was committed to the Tower. Upon the calling a new parliament in 1625, the ministry, to prevent his being chosen a member, took care that he should be appointed sheriff of the county of Buckingham. Nevertheless, he found means to procure a seat in the parliament of the year 1628, and acted in it with his usual spirit and vigour: he spoke warmly for the redress of grievances, argued boldly in defence of liberty, and strenuously supported the privileges of the House of Commons. After the dissolution of this parliament, which happened in March 1628-9, he retired to his house at Stoke-Pogeys, in Buckinghamshire, where he spent the remainder of his days, and died there on the third of September, 1634. His works are well known and greatly esteemed; particularly his Reports, and his Institutes of the Laws of England.

Life of Dr. John Colet.

Colet (Dr. John): founder of St. Paul's school, was the eldest son of Sir Henry Colet, knight; and was born at London in the year 1466. In 1483, he was sent to the university of Oxford; and two years after, was instituted to the rectory of Denington in Suffolk, which he enjoyed till his death. During his travels into France and Italy, he was made a prebendary of the cathedral church of York, and installed by proxy on the fifth of March, 1494. In December 1497, he was ordained deacon, and priest in July following. In 1504, he took the degree of doctor in divinity. On the fifth of May, 1505, he was instituted to a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul; and in the same year and month, was made dean of that church, without the least application of his own. Having inherited a very considerable estate by the death of his father, he resolved to consecrate it to some standing and perpetual benefaction; agreeable to which resolution, he founded St. Paul's school in London, for 153 scholars. This excellent man died on the sixteenth of September, 1519, in the 53d year of his age. He wrote, 1. Rudimenta Grammatices; 2. The Construction of the Eight Parts of Speech; 3. Daily Devotions; 4. Monition to a Godly Life; 5. Epistolæ ad Erasmus; and some other pieces. He was a tall, comely, graceful, well-bred man; and his learning and piety were uncommon.

"No higher testimony, says Mr. Granger, need to be given of the merit of Colet, than his great intimacy with Erasmus. There was a similitude of manners, of studies, and sentiments in religion, between these two illustrious men, who ventured to take off the veil from ignorance and superstition, and expose them to the eyes of the world; and to prepare men's minds for the reformation of religion, and reformation of learning."

Life of William Congreve, Esq.

Congreve (William) Esq; an eminent English dramatic writer, was born at a place called Barda, near Leeds, in Yorkshire, in 1672, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; after which he studied the law for a short time in the Middle Temple, London. His first production was a novel, entitled Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled; and he soon after began his comedy of the Old Bachelor, which, on its being acted, procured him many considerable friends, among whom was Mr. Montague, afterwards lord Halifax, who appointed him one of the commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches; then gave him a place in the pipe-office, and afterwards a post in the customs, worth 600l. per annum. It is no wonder that, after such encouragement, he should soon make his appearance again on the stage; and accordingly, the next year, he brought on the Double Dealer. Queen Mary dying in 1694, he wrote a pastoral on that occasion, entitled The Mourning Muse of Alexis; and in 1695 he produced his comedy of Love for Love. The same year he addressed to king William an ode upon the taking of Namur. Having established his reputation as a comic writer, he resolved to attempt a tragedy, and in 1697 was acted his Mourning Bride, which met with great applause. He was now called off to engage in another species of writing; Mr. Jeremy Collier attacked him as a dangerous immoral author. An answer was necessary, and therefore an answer was given, which, tho' it does not entirely justify Mr. Congreve, shews however great modesty and wit. This quarrel is thought to have given Mr. Congreve some distaste to the stage; yet he soon after brought on another comedy, entitled the Way of the World, the ill success of which completed his disgust to the theatre. He amused himself afterwards with composing original poems and translations, which he collected in one volume, and published in 1710. In 1718 he was appointed secretary of Jamaica. The greatest part of the last twenty years of his life was spent in ease and retirement; but towards the end of it, being much afflicted with the gout, he went to Bath for the benefit of the waters; where having the misfortune to be overturned in his chariot, he from that time complained of a pain in his side, supposed to arise from some inward bruise. Upon his return to London, his health continued to decline, and he died at his house in Surry-street, in the Strand, on the 19th of January, 1728-9. On the 26th of the same month, he was interred with great solemnity in Westminster-Abbey, the pall being supported by the duke of Bridgewater, the earl of Godolphin, lord Cobham, lord Wilmington, brigadier-general Churchill, and the honourable George Berkeley. Some time after, an elegant monument was erected to his memory, with the following inscription: "Mr. William Congreve, died January 19, 1728-9, aged fifty-six, and was buried near this place. To whose most valuable memory this monument is set up by Henrietta, dutchess of Marlborough, as a mark how dearly she remembers the happiness she enjoyed in the sincere friendship of so worthy and honest a man; whose virtue, candour, and wit, gained him the love and esteem of the present age; and whose writings will be the admiration of the future."

Voltaire, in his letters concerning the English nation, speaking of Mr. Congreve, says, "He raised the glory of comedy to a greater height, than any English writer before or since his time. He wrote only a few plays, but they are excellent in their kind. The laws of the drama are strictly observed in them. They abound with characters, all which are shadowed with the utmost delicacy; and we do not meet with so much as one low or coarse jest. The language is every where that of men of fashion, but their actions are those of knaves: a proof, that he was perfectly well acquainted with human nature, and frequented what we call polite company. He was infirm and came to the verge of life when I knew him. Mr. Congreve had one defect, which was his entertaining too mean an idea of his first profession, that of a writer; tho' it was to this he owed his fame and fortune. He spoke of his works as of trifles that were beneath him; and hinted to me in our first conversation, that I should visit him upon no other footing than that of a private gentleman, who led a life of plainness and simplicity. I answered, that had he been so unfortunate as to be a mere gentleman, I should never have troubled him with a visit; and I was very much disgusted at so unseasonable a piece of vanity."

Life of Anthony Ashley Cooper.

Cooper (Anthony Ashley) earl of Shaftesbury, one of the greatest politicians and most distinguished ministers of the last century, was the son of Sir John Cooper, and was born at Winborne St. Giles, in Dorsetshire, on the 22d of July, 1621. He was educated at Oxford, and from thence removed to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himself to the study of the law with such unwearied diligence, that he soon acquired a thorough knowledge of the English constitution. In 1640 he was chosen one of the representatives in parliament for the town of Tewksbury, in Gloucestershire. At the breaking out of the civil war, he offered his services to king Charles I. and projected a scheme for an accommodation, which he communicated to his majesty: but, this design proving abortive, and finding himself not treated with the confidence he expected, he entered into the parliament's service, accepted a commission, took Wareham by storm in 1644, and soon after reduced all the adjacent parts of Dorsetshire. Upon the restoration of Charles II. in promoting which he was greatly instrumental, he was sworn of the privy council, and, in April 1661, was created baron Ashley of Winborne St. Giles, and afterwards made chancellor and under-treasurer of the exchequer. In 1667 he was appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of high-treasurer; on the 23d of April, 1672, was created baron Cooper of Pawlet, and earl of Shaftesbury; and on the 4th of November following, was advanced to the post of lord high-chancellor of England, which he discharged with equal ability and integrity. He complied, however, a little too readily with the arbitrary measures of the court; but, upon his being deprived of the great seal in November 1673, he returned to his former connections, and continued thenceforward to be the very soul of the anti-ministerial party. He opposed the test, promoted the exclusion-bill, and, in short, acted in every thing with such vehemence, that he was twice committed to the Tower. The first time he was dismissed upon his submission: the second, the grand jury returned the bill ignoramus. Sensible, however, of the great danger that threatened him, as well from the power as the malice of his enemies, he thought proper to retire to Amsterdam, where he died on the 22d of January, 1682-3, in the 62d year of his age. His body was brought over to England, and interred at Winborne St. Giles among those of his ancestors.

"The great talents of the earl of Shaftesbury, and his exact knowledge of men and things, (says Mr. Granger) contributed to render him one of the first characters of his age: but the violence of his passions, and the flexibility of his principles, prompted him to act very different and even contrary parts. This was, in some measure, owing to the changes in the times in which he lived, but is more to be attributed to the mutability of his character, which ever varied with the interests of his ambition. When we consider him as sitting in the highest tribunal in the kingdom, explaining and correcting the laws, detecting fraud, and exerting all the powers of his eloquence on the side of justice; we admire the able lawyer, the commanding orator, and the upright judge: but when he enters into all the iniquitous measures of the Cabal, when he prostitutes his eloquence to enslave his country, and becomes the factious leader and the popular incendiary, we regard him with an equal mixture of horror and regret."

Life of Anthony Ashley Cooper, third Earl of Shaftesbury.

Cooper (Anthony Ashley) the third earl of Shaftesbury, and the celebrated author of the Characteristics, was born on the 26th of February, 1671, at Exeter house in London, the town residence of his grandfather Anthony, the first earl of Shaftesbury: who, from the time of his birth, conceived so strong an affection for him, that he undertook the care of his education; and resolving to have him thoroughly instructed in the learned languages, committed him to the tuition of a lady in his house, who was so perfect a mistress of the Greek and Latin Tongues, that she could speak either of them with the greatest fluency. By her instructions he profited so much, that by the time he attained to the eleventh year of his age, he could not only read, but even speak the Greek and Latin, with ease and accuracy. With the same rapidity he passed through a complete course of philosophical learning; and, in 1686, he began his travels under the care of a tutor. He returned to England in 1689; and upon the death of Sir John Trenchard, in 1695, was elected a burgess for Poole in Dorsetshire. At his first appearance in the house of commons, he had an opportunity of shewing that spirit of liberty, which he maintained to the end of his life, and by which he uniformly directed his conduct on all occasions. He had prepared a speech in favour of the bill for granting counsel to prisoners in cases of high treason; but when he rose to deliver it, he was so intimidated by the augustness of the assembly, that he lost all memory, and was unable to proceed. The house, after giving him some time to recover from his confusion, called loudly for him to go on; when he proceeded to this effect: "If I, Sir, (addressing himself to the speaker) who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded, that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say; what must the condition of that man be, who, without any assistance, is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it?" Upon the dissolution of the parliament in 1698, he repaired to Holland, where he contracted an acquaintance with Mr. Boyle, Mr. Le Clerc, and other learned and ingenious persons. Returning to England in the year 1699, he soon after became earl of Shaftesbury by the death of his father. He was offered by king William the post of secretary of state; but this he declined on account of his weak constitution. In 1703 he made a second voyage to Holland, from whence he returned in the year following. He had long been afflicted with an asthmatic disorder; and finding the disease still to increase upon him, he removed to Italy for the benefit of the air, in 1711; and died at Naples on the 4th of February, 1713. His writings are, 1. A Letter concerning Enthusiasm: 2. Sensus Communis; An Essay on the Freedom of Wit and Humour: 3. Soliloquy; or Advice to an Author: 4. An Inquiry concerning Virtue and Merit: 5. The Moralists; a philosophical Rhapsody: 6. Miscellaneous Reflections, &c. 7. A Notion of the Historical Draught, or Tablature of the Judgment of Hercules; and, 8. A Letter concerning Design. These treatises have been printed in three volumes, under the general title of Characteristics.

The Life of Abraham Cowley.

Cowley (Abraham) an eminent English poet, was born in Fleet-street, near the end of Chancery-lane, London, in the year 1618. His father, who was a grocer, dying before his birth, he was left to the care of his mother, who procured him to be admitted a scholar in Westminster-school; where he gave early proofs of his extraordinary genius. In 1633, when he was but fifteen years of age, he published a collection of poems, under the title of Poetical Blossoms; in which, says bishop Sprat, there are many things that might well become the vigour and force of a manly wit. Mr. Cowley himself tells us, that he had so defective a memory while at school, that he could never be brought to retain the ordinary rules of grammar; but this want he abundantly supplied by an intimate acquaintance with the books themselves from which those rules had been drawn. From Westminster-school he removed to Trinity-college, Cambridge, of which he was elected a scholar in 1636. In the year 1638, he published his Love's Riddle, a pastoral comedy, written while he was at Westminster; and also a Latin comedy, entitled, Naufragium Jocularé, or the Merry Shipwreck. In 1643, being then master of arts, he, among many others, was ejected from the university; upon which he retired to Oxford, and was entered of St. John's-college there. His affection to the royal cause engaged him in the service of the king; and he attended his majesty in several journeys and expeditions. During the heat of the civil war, he lived in the family of the earl of St. Alban's; and when the queen was obliged to retire into France, he accompanied her thither. For the space of ten years he was absent from his native country, and that time he employed either in bearing a share in the distresses of the royal family, or in labouring for their interest. In 1656, he was sent over to England with the uterine ferocity, in order to take cognizance of the state of affairs in this kingdom; but being discovered and seized, he was committed to close imprisonment, and it was with great difficulty that he obtained his liberty; after which he ventured back to France, and remained there till near the time of king Charles the Second's restoration. On the 21st of December, 1657, he was created doctor of physic at Oxford.

Soon after the restoration, Mr. Cowley obtained a considerable estate, through the favour of the duke of Buckingham and the earl of St. Alban's; and being now in the 42^d year of his age, he resolved to pass the remainder of his life in a studious retirement. For this purpose he withdrew first to Barn-Elms, and afterwards to Chertsey, where he died the 28th of July, 1667: on the 3^d of August following, he was interred in Westminster-abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory, in 1675, by the duke of Buckingham, with a Latin inscription by doctor Thomas Sprat, bishop of Rochester. When the news of our poet's death was communicated to king Charles II. that prince said, that "Mr. Cowley had not left a better man behind him in England." His character indeed was equally amiable and respectable; for he was as much distinguished by the goodness of his heart, and the sweetness of his temper, as by the extent of his learning, and the sublimity of his genius. He wrote a sacred poem called Davidides; Pindaric Odes; six books of Plants; the Mistress, a poem; eleven Anacreontics; Essays in prose and verse, &c. His Latin poems, which are esteemed the best of his works, are written in the various measures of the ancients, and have much of their unaffected beauty.

The Life of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury.

Cranmer (Thomas) archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from an ancient family in Nottinghamshire, and born at Aslacton, in that county, on the second of July, 1489. In 1503, he was admitted of Jesus-college, Cambridge, where he soon distinguished himself by his uncommon abilities and application; and, in 1523, commenced doctor in divinity. The immediate cause of his advancement in the church, was the opinion he gave with regard to king Henry the Eighth's divorce from Catharine of Arragon; viz. that the king should consult all the universities of Europe. Henry was no sooner informed of this opinion, than he exclaimed, "Aye, now we have the right sow by the ear." He immediately sent for Cranmer to court, made him his chaplain, and soon after presented him to the archdeaconry of Taunton.

In 1530, our divine was sent by the king into France, Italy, and Germany, to dispute against the validity of Henry's marriage. In 1533, he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury; and, in less than two months after his consecration, pronounced the sentence of divorce between king Henry and queen Catharine. He shewed himself a zealous promoter of the reformation; procured the bible to be translated into English; forwarded the suppression of the monasteries; and, in 1536, divorced king Henry from Anne Boleyn. In 1539, he opposed, with great vigour, the act of the Six Articles, commonly called the Bloody Statute. The next year, he was one of the commissioners appointed to inspect into matters of religion, and to explain some of its principal doctrines; and the book entitled, The necessary Erudition of a Christian Man, was the result of their commission. In 1542, he procured an act for the advancement of true religion, and the abolishment of the contrary. In the year following, he was exposed to some danger from the resentment of the Popish party, who drew up articles of accusation against him, and presented him to the king. Henry perceived their malice; and one evening, on pretence of diverting himself on the water, ordered his barge to be rowed towards Lambeth. The archbishop being informed of the king's arrival, came down to pay his respects, and was ordered by his majesty to come into the barge. Henry acquainted him with the accusations of heresy, faction, &c. which were laid against him; and spoke of his opposition to the Six Articles: the archbishop modestly replied, that, with respect to them, his sentiments still remained unaltered; but that he was not conscious of having offended against them. Then the king, assuming an air of pleasantry, asked him, If his Bed-chamber could stand the test of these articles? The archbishop confessed, that he was married in Germany, before his promotion; but assured the king, that on the passing of that act, he had parted with his wife, and sent her abroad to her friends. His majesty was so charmed with the openness and integrity of this excellent prelate, that he made him acquainted with the plot that was formed against him, gave him a ring of great value to produce upon a future emergency, and resolved to counterwork the malice of Cranmer's enemies; who summoned him, soon after, to appear before the council, suffered him to wait in the lobby among the servants, treated him on his admission with haughty contempt, and would have sent him to the Tower. But he produced a ring; and gained his enemies a severe reprimand from Henry, and himself the highest degree of security and favour.

Upon the decease of king Henry VIII. in January 1547, archbishop Cranmer was one of the executors of his will, and one of the regents of the kingdom: and, on the 20th of February following, he crowned king Edward VI. to whom he had been godfather. In 1550 a review was made of the book of common prayer, which by his care had been drawn up; and, in 1552, it was authorised by act of parliament. The next year, Cranmer opposed the new settlement of the crown upon lady Jane Grey; but was at length prevailed on to acquiesce in it. He appeared for that lady upon the death of Edward VI. and was one of her counsellors. Soon after the accession of queen Mary, he was committed to the Tower; and on the 3d of November, 1553, was tried and condemned for high treason, in acknowledging the sovereignty of Jane Grey. The queen, however, upon his humble and repeated application, pardoned him the treason: but at the same time, to gratify her implacable resentment against him for the part which he acted in her mother's divorce, she resolved that he should suffer death as an heretic. In April 1554, the archbishop, with his fellow-prisoners, Ridley and Latimer, were removed to Oxford, in order to hold a public disputation with the papists. In the course of their argumentation they were insulted, interrupted, and silenced; and on their refusing to subscribe the popish articles, they were condemned as heretics. But this sentence being void in law, as the pope's authority was wanting, a new commission was sent from Rome for the trial and conviction of Cranmer. Accordingly, on the 12th of September, 1555, he appeared before the commissioners in St. Mary's church, Oxford, where he was accused of blasphemy, heresy, perjury, and incontinence: of blasphemy and heresy, for what he had written and acted against popery; of perjury, for breaking his oath to the pope; and of incontinence, on account of his being married. He defended himself against these accusations; and was afterwards cited to appear at Rome within eighty days, to make his answer in person: but no care being taken to send him, he was, by an order from thence, degraded and deprived.

After the degradation of Cranmer, his popish persecutors used every artifice that could be thought of to shake his constancy. They were very desirous of prevailing on him to recant; as, if by any means they could do this, it would be a matter of great triumph to their party. He had now been two years and a half in confinement, and had been treated with extreme severity: but he had always hitherto discovered discovered great firmness of mind under his sufferings, and his enemies had found him unmoved by their threats, and steady to his principles. They resolved, therefore, to try whether more gentle usage would not operate more effectually upon the natural mildness of his temper. They removed him from the rigorous restraints of his prison to the deanery of Christ-church, where he was handsomely lodged, and elegantly entertained. They assailed him with the pleasures of life; they endeavoured to work upon him by the pleasing arguments of ease, of affluence, of station; they told him of the queen's personal esteem and regard for him; and reminded him of the respect and attention paid him, when in power. They told him, that he would be permitted to enjoy his former dignity in the church; or, if he liked it better, might lead a comfortable and peaceful life in privacy and safety. And all this only by setting his name to a piece of paper. They said, he was still strong and healthy, and might live many years more, if he did not voluntarily put a period to his own days, by the terrible death of burning. He resisted their temptations for a considerable time; but they continued to treat him with great apparent kindness and respect; they gave him liberty to take his pleasure in the open air; they flattered, they caressed him; and, in short, in an unguarded hour, they prevailed upon the archbishop to subscribe an abjuration, renouncing all the errors of Luther and Zuinglius, acknowledging the pope's supremacy, the seven sacraments, the corporal presence in the Eucharist, purgatory, prayer for departed souls, and the invocation of saints.

When the popish party had obtained this triumph over the unfortunate archbishop, they caused his recantation to be printed and dispersed with all possible expedition. It was, however, never intended that his life should be spared; and all the promises which had been made him of that kind, were only so many instances of the baseness and perfidiousness, as well as of the cruelty, of his persecutors. Nothing less than his death could satiate the revengeful queen; who said, that, "as he had been the great promoter of heresy, and the corrupter of the whole nation, the abjuration, which was sufficient in other cases, should not serve his turn; for she was resolved he should be burnt." On the day appointed for his execution, March 21, 1556, he was conducted to St. Mary's church, and placed on a kind of stage over-against the pulpit: then Dr. Cole, provost of Eton, preached a sermon, in which he magnified Cranmer's conversion as the immediate effect of God's inspiration. He exhorted the archbishop to bear up with resolution against the terrors of death; and assured him, that dirges and masses should be said for his soul in all the churches of Oxford. During the whole sermon, Cranmer discovered the utmost anxiety and internal agitation, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, shedding a torrent of tears, and groaning with unutterable anguish. When he was desired to declare his faith, he prayed with the most pathetic expressions of horror and remorse. He then made a short but moving exhortation to the people; repeated the Apostle's Creed; declared his belief of the Scriptures; and acknowledged that he had signed a paper contrary to his conscience, from the apprehension of death, for which reason, he said, the hand that subscribed the recantation should first feel the torture of the fire. He renounced the pope as the enemy of Christ, and professed the same opinion of the sacrament which he had published in a book written on that subject. Thunder-struck, as it were, at this unexpected declaration, the enraged papists called aloud to him to leave off dissembling; and pulling him down from the place on which he stood, led him immediately to the stake. When the fire was kindled, he stretched forth his right hand to the flame, and held it there unmoved (except that once he wiped his face with it) till it were entirely consumed; crying with a loud voice, "This hand hath offended;" and often repeating, "This unworthy right hand." At length the fire reaching his body, he in a short time expired, with the dying prayer of St. Stephen in his mouth, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." He burnt, to all appearance, without pain or motion, and seemed to reject the torture by mere strength of mind; shewing a repentance and a fortitude, that ought to cancel all reproach of timidity in his life.

Such was the undeserved fate of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, who, with a very small alloy of human weakness and irresolution, possessed all the candour, simplicity, meekness, and benevolence of a primitive Christian. He has been justly esteemed (says Mr. Granger) one of the greatest ornaments of our church and nation. He was a man of great learning, and wrote several works, among which are the following, viz. 1. A Treatise against Unwritten Verities; 2. A Defence of the true and catholic Doctrine of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ; 3. Preface to the English Translation of the Bible; 4. A Catechism, entitled, A short Instruction to Christian Religion, for the singular Profit of Children and young People; 5. The Examination of most Points of Religion; 6. Some Considerations offered to king Edward VI. to induce him to proceed to a further Reformation; 7. Letters to divers Persons; to king Henry VIII. Lord Cromwell, Sir William Cecil, and to foreign Divines. He had also a considerable hand in composing the Homilies.

Life of Mr. James Crichton.

Crichton (James) commonly called the Admirable Crichton, was descended from a very ancient family in Scotland, and was born at Clunie, in the shire of Perth. "This amazing genius (says Mr. Granger) seems to have surprised and astonished mankind, like a new northern star. He, together with an athletic strength, and singular elegance of form, possessed the various powers of the human mind in their full force, and almost every acquired talent that could recommend the man, or adorn the gentleman. If all that is said of him by authors of character be true, he is much better entitled to the appellation of Phoenix than Ichnus or Picus of Mirandula; but the elevation and ex-teation of the genius of this wonderful man appears to have been more a slight than a growth. If he had lived longer, and written more, it is probable that his works would not, like those of his countryman Buchanan, have continued unimpaired by time. Crichton shot up like the mountain pine; Buchanan rose slowly like the oak. The one is rather an object of temporary admiration; the other retains its strength and beauty, after it had stood the shock of ages. It is probable, that the great qualities of Crichton served to precipitate his fate. Vincent de Gonzaga, prince of Mantua, his pupil, prompted by jealousy or envy, basely attacked, and brutally murdered him in the street, in the time of Carnival, in the year 1583, and the 22d of his age*. If the reader should, in a collective view, consider what is said of him by Imperialis, in his Museum; by Mackenzie, in his History of Scotch Writers; by bishop Tanner, in his Bibliotheca; and by Dr. Hawkesworth, in the Adventurer; he will find full enough to exercise his faith, though mankind be naturally fond of the marvellous, and ever willing to stretch their faculties to the utmost, to reconcile it with truth." Biographical History of England.

Life of Thomas Cromwell.

Cromwell (Thomas) earl of Essex, an eminent statesman in the sixteenth century, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney in Surry. But notwithstanding this disadvantage of his birth, his industry and force of genius made way for his advancement. Having found means to travel into various countries, to learn their languages, and see their method of war, (being a soldier under the duke of Bourbon at the sack of Rome in 1527) upon his return to England he was taken into the service of cardinal Wolsey, as his solicitor, to whom he so approved himself by his fidelity and diligence, and whom he defended with such eloquence in the house of commons against the articles of impeachment, that the king, after the fall of the cardinal, esteeming him a proper agent for himself in more important affairs, voluntarily entertained him as his servant. In 1531, he was knighted, made a privy-counsellor, and master of the jewel-house: in 1532 he was appointed clerk of the hanaper, and chancellor of the exchequer; and, in 1534, principal secretary of state, and master of the rolls. He was the chief instrument in dissolving the abbeys and other religious houses; and laboured with indefatigable industry to promote the reformation. The papal authority being now abolished, and the king declared supreme head of the church, his majesty appointed him vicar-general over all the spiritualities under himself. He was likewise, on the 2d of July, 1536, made lord-keeper of the privy-seal, and on the 9th of the same month advanced to the dignity of a baron, by the title of lord Cromwell of Okeham in the county of Rutland; and the year following he was constituted chief justice itinerant of all the forests beyond the Trent. August 26, 1537, he was created knight of the garter. In 1538 he was made constable of Carisbrooke-castle in the Isle of Wight, and about the same time obtained a grant of the castle and lordship of Okeham, which was followed by many other grants from the crown. On the 17th of April, 1540, he was created earl of Essex, and soon after made lord high chamberlain of England.

The tide of prosperity, which had hitherto flowed in upon him, began now to take a turn. A scheme he laid to secure his greatness, proved his ruin; such is the weakness of human policy! he used his utmost endeavours to effect a match between king Henry VIII. and Anne of Cleves. As that lady and her friends were all Lutherans, he imagined it might tend to depress the popish party at court; and he expected a great support from a queen of his own making. But the capricious monarch being disgusted with her person at the very first sight, conceived an invincible aversion to the promoter of the marriage. Many circumstances concurred to his ruin. He was hated and envied as an upstart by the nobility in general, and detested by all the Roman-catholics, as the inveterate enemy of their religion. The king's discontent was artfully inflamed by the malicious insinuations of the duke of Norfolk and the bishop of Winchester; the former of whom was commissioned by his majesty to arrest the earl of Essex at the council-table, for high-treason; and he was immediately sent prisoner to the Tower. In his fall he had the common fate of all disgraced ministers, to be forsaken by his friends, and insulted by his enemies. Archbishop Cranmer however, with a friendship uncommon to courtiers, wrote earnestly to the king in his behalf, declaring that, in his opinion, no monarch of England had ever so valuable a servant. But his ruin was determined. He was accused of several crimes and misdemeanors, and of several heretical principles and practices; though some of them were improbable, and he might have cleared himself of others by producing the king's orders, he was not suffered to be heard even in his own defence, and was attainted of high treason and heresy. He used all his efforts to procure mercy; and, during his imprisonment, wrote to the king in such pathetic terms, that his majesty caused the letter to be thrice read, and seemed affected with it. But the solicitations of the duke of Norfolk and bishop Gardiner at length prevailed; and a warrant was granted for the execution of the unfortunate Cromwell. When he was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, the 28th of July, 1540, his affection for his son made him very cautious in what he said, and less careful to assert his own innocence. He thanked God for bringing him to that death for his transgressions; he acknowledged his offences against God and his sovereign; and declared that he died in the catholic faith. Then he desired the spectators to pray for the king, the prince, and for himself; and, having spent a little time in devotion, submitted his neck to the executioner, who mangled him in a terrible manner.

Thus fell this great minister, who had raised himself himself merely by the strength of his natural parts; for, as his extraction was mean, so his education was low; and his highest attainment in learning was the getting by heart Erasmus's Latin version of the New Testament. He behaved in his prosperity with uncommon moderation; was courteous and affable to persons of all ranks; and particularly grateful to those from whom he had received any obligations. His charity was very extensive, above two hundred poor people being plentifully relieved twice a day at his gates. And it deserves to be remembered, that he preferred more men of abilities and integrity, both ecclesiastics and laymen, than any one of his predecessors in power had ever done.

Whitehall, May 10, 1777.

Extract of a Letter from the Hon. General Sir Wm. Howe, to Lord Geo. Germaine, dated New-York, April 1, 1777.

THERE have not been many occurrences since my last worthy your Lordship's notice, excepting the success of a detachment of 500 men that I sent up the North River, in transports, on the 22d of March, conveyed by the Brune frigate, to destroy a considerable deposit of provisions and stores, which the enemy had made at Peek's Kill, near fifty miles distant from New-York. Lieutenant-Colonel Bird, of the 15th regiment, commanded the party. The Rebels stationed there, retiring upon his approach, he got easy possession of the post. Before their retreat they set fire to the principal storehouses, and thereby rendered useless the only wharf where it was practicable to embark the remaining stores in convenient time, which made it expedient to destroy the greater part. This was completely effected to the amount specified in the inclosed return: and the detachment, reimbarking without interruption, returned here the 26th.

Return of provisions, stores, &c. (for the use of the Rebel army) taken and destroyed by a detachment of the King's troops, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Bird, of the 15th Infantry, at Peek's Kill, upon the North River, the 23d and 24th of March, 1777.

Destroyed and burnt by the King's troops: 310 hogheads of rum, 150 hogheads of molasses, 800 barrels of flour, 150 barrels of biscuit, 170 barrels of pork, 30 barrels of beef, 17 barrels of pitch and tar, 800 bushels of oats, 2500 bushels of wheat, 800 bushels of buck-wheat, 12 casks of coffee, 9 casks of chocolate, 50 casks of tallow, 30 chests of candles, 15 barrels of salt, 200 iron pots and camp kettles, 500 canteens of wood and bowls, &c. 400 intrenching tools, 30 casks of nails, 150 waggons and carts with harness, one iron twelve-pounder on a field-carriage.

Destroyed and burnt by the Rebels: 100 hogheads of rum, 500 barrels of flour, 500 bundles of straw, one magazine of hay, 2000 bushels of wheat, one ammunition-wagon loaded.

Total: 410 hogheads of rum, 150 hogheads of molasses, 1300 barrels of flour, 150 barrels of biscuit, 170 barrels of pork, 30 barrels of beef, 17 barrels of pitch and tar, 500 bundles of straw, one magazine of hay, 800 bushels of oats, 4500 bushels of wheat, 800 bushels of buck-wheat, 12 casks of coffee, 9 casks of chocolate, 50 casks of tallow, 30 chests of candles, 15 barrels of salt, 200 iron pots and camp kettles, 15 canteens of wood and bowls, &c. 400 intrenching tools, 30 casks of nails, 150 waggons and carts with harness, one iron twelve-pounder on a field-carriage, one ammunition-wagon loaded.

N. B. Two piles of barracks for 1200 men, and seven store-houses, containing the above stores, and many other articles that cannot be justly ascertained, were burnt; also several sloops and pettiangers destroyed, laden with provisions.
